The Churchman.

SATURDAY, JULY 4, 1885.

THE Archbishop of Canterbury, in a very valuable address at the late yearly meeting of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, expressed his hope that the constitution of the Board of Missions of the American Church, by which the whole Church was its own missionary society, was a symptom that hereafter missions were to be carried on by Churches, instead of, as in the past, by individuals, or by nations, or by societies.

It is proposed to create a House of Laymen in the English Church. This body would be consultative, and form no constituent part of the Convocation. We think that in this the Church would be doing scant justice to the laity and scant justice to herself. The laity, who form a constituent part of the Church, could hardly be content to be an outside body whose counsels, though never so wise and opportune, might at all times be left out of the account. Their judgment is in many things too valuable to be made valueless on occasion, perhaps, through prejudice or caprice. On the other side, the Church would only benefit herself by taking the laity into her councils. The confidence she gave would be repaid in turn, together with an experience and judgment which the Church would find to be supplementary and indispensable. Such, at least, has been the result of making the laity a part of the Church's governing body in this country, and she would no more make them merely consultative than she would adopt the Roman system of reducing them to a cypher.

THE Rev. Henry Ward Beecher recently declared that the baptism of an infant can have no possible effect whatsoever upon the child. The declaration was one link in the chain of his argument. Baptism does nothing for the infant, because the infant needs nothing to be done for it. It is sinless, not through Christ's death, but by nature. We do not care to discuss Mr. Beecher's general views concerning sin. We only have this one question to ask: Did the Lord command His disciples through all time to observe a perfectly useless ceremony? We take it for granted (if everybody but the Anabaptists) that infant baptism was practised and taught by those who received their direct commission from the Saviour. This leaves the manifest dilemma before one that either He ordered a perfectly useless act, or that the disciples who were taught of Him, and on whom the Holy Ghost visibly rested, misunderstood His teaching on a vital point. This is where Mr. Beecher would land one who accepted the teaching of Plymouth pulpit.

We have only to add that this is perfectly consistent with Mr. Beecher's way of looking at Christianity. That way is not to regard it as revealed truth, but simply as a set of ideas which may be useful to men who are pleased to use them. It is religion from the subjective side only. If there is anything in the Bible which satisfies the moral consciousness of a man, well and good. If not, then well and good also. The sole criterion of the truth of Scripture is whether one likes to believe it or no. No one is to receive anything more than he pleases to receive. We can but ask, Where, then, is Christianity?

THE CONSECRATION OF BISHOP FERGUSON.

The consecration of the Missionary Bishop of Cape Palmas was calculated to make differing impressions. An act which attracted so many to Grace church presumably repelled others. Of those who witnessed it, it may well be believed that some could not sufficiently conquer an old-time prejudice to be specially interested in the proceedings. The man to be raised to the highest honors which the Church can bestow was a colored man. It is too much to suppose that in all cases the consecration of such an one was regarded with feelings unmingled with indifference, if even with strong aversion.

On the other side, it is safe to say that an impression of a very different kind was made on the majority of those who had come to take part in the ceremony. They knew no honor too high for a colored man and a minister withal, who was worthy to receive it, as they knew no work too Christly and too sacrificing for him to do. They were glad that nothing was wanting, whether a beautiful church, or fit attendants, or influential and honored bishops for the laying-on of hands. The idea of color was lost sight of, save that taking into account the race, what it had suffered and what it so urgently needs to be done for it, color rather perhaps entitled him to be made a bishop who thus far had spent his life in serving his own people in Africa, and who proposes to do so to the end. It was, possibly, not so much that he needed the office, as that the Church needed him.

In real truth the Church has now testified as publicly and beltingly as she can to her belief in the truth of Christ's teaching that "One is your Master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren." She bears witness that in Christ and in the Church of Christ there is neither Barbarian, Scythian, bond, nor free. White and black are equally entitled to her confidence and protection, to serve at her altars, to share in her honors and take part in her councils. In the matter of race and color she will be ruled by no prejudice, and, so far as she can, she rebukes it. She takes account of other and more weighty considerations, moves on a higher plane, and bears witness to a higher calling.

We trust that this public testimony of the Church's faith and fellowship may do much to allay that feeling which is still so prejudicial against the colored race. This was the real significance of Bishop Ferguson's consecration. The bishop may succeed or he may fail, but the Church has declared a principle and set an example which will not be changed. Other colored men will be raised to the episcopate if the occasion calls for it, and so the Church will give the lie to the slander that she is the Church of the rich or the Church of the white man.

We trust, too, that the Church will take account of the presiding bishop's sermon, and be more prompt to discharge her obligations to a race to which she is a debtor. Let the dead bury their dead, if need be, but the kingdom of God must be preached as an especial obligation to that people whose lot has been one of exceptional hardship. The Gospel surely means that, if it means anything. He who told the story of the Good Samaritan, and who was sent unto the lost, would surely rebuke, if not disown, a Church which should disdain to carry the Gospel to a race because it is the most unfortunate, degraded, and helpless. The Church, thank God, does not so mistake her calling and take so little account of her Lord's teaching and example.

CATHOLIC.

We presume that the word Catholic has been used for hundreds of years by millions who speak the English language at least once a week, and by a large proportion of them daily, in its only legitimate historical sense. The English Prayer Book is presumably a classic of the English language, and the writings of the great English divines of the seventeenth century may be supposed to have some place in English literature. The "Primate of all England," moreover, and the Bench of Bishops in the House of Lords, may be considered as capable of enlightening a lexicographer as to the meaning of ecclesiastical terms in the English language. What, then, are the claims to our confidence of a dictionary, purporting to be a dictionary of "the English language," and coming from the hands of professed "etymologists" and expounders of "scientific and other terms," who ignore the historical sources of information as to Church language, and draw upon their own imaginations for their definitions, calling in such external aid as nothing but the like imagination could invent with any authority?

These inquiries and remarks are à propos to the loud encomiums which are lavished by popular writers upon what is known as "Stormonth's Dictionary of the English Language," of which an admirable edition has been lately published in New York. Let us turn to the good old historic word "Catholic," which one might suppose would be defined somewhat as follows:

Catholic: universal, oecumenical, of the whole, i.e., the whole world, or the whole empire, supposed to be the world under the Caesars. An historical word in Christian literature, applied to the Christian Church in its primitive constitutions; to the doctrine of the same in the Nicene Creed, and to canons and constitutions of the general or oecumenical councils. More recently, 1, in vulgar use, improperly applied to the Churches of the West, with the prefix Roman, under the Bishop of Rome, claiming to be the universal bishop; 2, not local, etc.; 3, sometimes, improperly, used to express the idea of liberality or freedom from narrow-mindedness. The word is strictly ecclesiastical, and cannot be diverted from its ecclesiastical significance, without violence to its essential signification. Now let us turn to Stormonth. Eccolo!

Catholic: universal, general, liberal; not narrow-minded or bigoted; n. a name commonly applied to the adherents of the Church of Rome. Catholicise, v. to become a Roman Catholic; to convert to the Roman Catholic faith, etc.

Let us suppose a foreigner studying the English language in the English Prayer Book; he turns to Stormonth, and presto, he discovers that the Church of England professes the "Roman Catholic faith." He takes up the "Letter of Bishop Bull to Bossuet," and discovers that this venerated Englishman of the Caroline age had no idea of his own language. The English Canons Ecclesiastical are equally incapable of interpretation by this English Dictionary. Whence comes the illumination of its pages, however, on this and kindred terms? Here we have it, and let us be profoundly sensible of our obligations. See the Preface, p. viii., as follows:

"The author's thanks are particularly due to the late Archbishop Strain of Edinburgh (?), and to the Very Reverend Dr. Smith, Vicar Apostolic, for numerous acts of kindness and courtesy in affording him information regarding ecclesiastical, archaeological and other terms."

So it is that literature becomes sown with tares "while men sleep." Let us be more vigilant, and, like George Canning and his allies, in the anti-Jacobin conflict, let us "catch lice like rats" and kill them off, as gamekeepers do in England; always nailing up the carcasses to the nearest post, as a "terror to evil-doers."

ST. PAUL'S LITURGICAL QUOTATIONS.

A writer's grasp of his subject is shown often by the way in which he handles his authorities. If he is familiar with them, he treats them as easily and freely as he treats his friends. "Always verify your quotations" is an admirable rule, and its neglect is due usually to carelessness or ignorance. But there is a freedom in quotation which indicates no lack of care or of accurate scholarship, but quite the reverse. The scholar who knows his subject thoroughly will feel that he can take a certain amount of liberty with his authorities. He will give us the pith and substance of a paragraph in a single terse sentence. He will even sacrifice the letter for the sake of bringing out more clearly and forcibly the spirit of the passage.

Now this is just what we notice throughout all St. Paul's writings. He was emphatically a full man. He brought to the Master's work not only the faculties needed to make him an efficient workman, but also a great accumulation of facts. In reading his words we feel that they are the words not only of a close observer, a keen thinker, and a cogent reasoner, but also of one whose mind was a well-filled storehouse. For this reason he was able at all times to bring forth "out of his treasure things new and old."

There was, however, one field of knowledge in which St. Paul was perfectly at home. He knew the Scriptures. Probably, like Timothy, he had learned them first as a child at his mother's knee. Then, as a youth, he had sat at the feet of Gamaliel, till he had mastered all that the schools could teach him. Last of all, he had read and re-read them by the light of Christ's Resurrection, and under the guidance of God's Holy Spirit. One need but glance at his epistles to see how full and thorough was his knowledge of the earlier revelation. He refers to it at every turn. In many of his epistles he seldom writes more than four or five sentences without introducing some telling quotation from the Law and the Prophets.

Yet the number of St. Paul's quotations from the Old Testament does not impress us so much as the way in which he quotes the sacred oracles. He treats them as an authority so familiar both to himself and to his readers, that a hint or a passing allusion will be enough to recall an entire passage to their remembrance. Sometimes the apostle seems to quote directly from the Hebrew, but more often he appears to cite the Septuagint. Occasionally he seems to have had both before him, and to have combined the two in a single quotation. Repeatedly he quotes the substance of a passage in his own words, or so combines and blends together two or more passages, as to give us what is virtually a new message of the Spirit.

Naturally, therefore, it is by no means always easy to be absolutely certain just what words St. Paul had in his mind when he quotes a passage from the Old Testament. This is especially true when he is bringing forward some truth often referred to. Many writers explain in this way the familiar passage, "As it is written, Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him." (1. Cor. ii. 9.) Most commentators, as well as the margin of the English Bible, send us to Isaiah lxiiv. 4 as the source of this quotation. Now between St. Paul's quotation and the passage in Isaiah there is sufficient resemblance to satisfy the English reader that he has found the words which St. Paul meant to quote. But the student who turns either to the Septuagint or to the Hebrew to verify the quotation, finds no such verbal resemblance.

On the contrary, it is obvious that our translators adapted their rendering of the passage in Isaiah to make it correspond to St. Paul's quotation. Take the Septuagint, for instance. Literally translated the passage reads: "From the beginning we have not heard, neither have our eyes seen a God beside Thee, and Thy works, which Thou wilt do for them that wait for mercy." Obviously there is not much resemblance here, and yet there is still less between the Greek of the Septuagint and that of the Epistle. Neale, in his essay on "Liturgical Quotations," puts the two side by side, and then comments on them thus: "Observe that there is not one word, literally not one word, the same in Isaiah and in St. Paul."

Yet while there is little verbal resemblance between the two passages, there is at least a resemblance of thought, and no one would hesitate to admit that we have here another instance of St. Paul's habit of quoting the substance of a passage, were it not for one little fact. In the Greek of St. Paul there is a little word, which in the English is not translated for obvious reasons. St. Paul did not write "It is written, Eye hath not seen," etc., but "It is written, Which eye hath not seen," etc. In other words, the quotation in St. Paul is not a complete, independent sentence, but a dependent clause introduced by a relative. Now this may seem a trifle, but it has very important consequences. By all ordinary rules the clause must be regarded not as a free quotation, but as a textual one. Otherwise the apostle would not have lugged in this unnecessary relative, which has no antecedent and adds nothing to the meaning of the passage.

Now when Neale found in the Liturgy of St. James this passage, "Thy heavenly and eternal gifts, which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, etc.," he found what seemed to him a simple and easy solution of the whole difficulty. St. Paul had quoted the liturgy and not the prophet Isaiah. Subsequent research confirmed the impression, for he found the passage also in the Second Epistle of St. Clement and in the "Martyrdom of Polycarp." Moreover, in both these places the passage is not a broken and disconnected clause such as we have in St. Paul's epistle; but the relative has its proper antecedent. The conclusion which Neale reached was this: "Whenever two passages occur in the same words—on the one hand in the Liturgy of St. James—or rather in its Anaphora—and on the other in the epistles to the Corinthians, or in any later epistles, St. Paul quotes the liturgy." (Neale's Essays, p. 117).

Well might Neale call this a tremendous conclusion; but it will be accepted by very few scholars. There are very grave objections not only to this sweeping assertion, but even to the far more guarded statement that in this one passage St. Paul is quoting the Liturgy of St. James. Two strong objections to any such a view have been brought forward by the writer in THE CHURCHMAN. First, the uncertainty of the date of the Liturgy, and, second, the fact that St. Clement quotes the same passage in a way to connect it with the words of Isaiah. There is, however, a far more serious objection. St. Paul introduces his quotation with the words "It is written." Now, there can be no question as to the ordinary meaning of this phrase. "The Scripture" in the New Testament has a very definite meaning. Every Jew understood by it not simply a written authority, but the one definite authority, the Law of God, the Holy Scriptures. Take Young's "Concordance" and run down the references under "Scripture," and then the still longer list under "Written," and the force and weight of this objection will be manifest. It is almost inconceivable that St. Paul could have meant to quote from any authority but God's written word, and yet have introduced his quotation by these words "It is written."

So cogent is the force of all these converging lines of thought, that it is difficult to resist the conclusion that Neale was hasty in forming his opinion. St. Paul did not quote the Liturgy of St. James, for the apostle could not quote what was not in existence, and he would not have quoted any uninspired authority as "the Scripture." Even the grammatical irregularity, striking as it is, can not override such facts as these. Were we then compelled to choose between the two horns of the dilemma, we would say at once that the Liturgy of St. James quoted St. Paul. But there is no such necessity.

The Liturgy of St. James was not written, in all human probability, earlier than the beginning of the third century; but then it is representative of something far older. The Creed of Nicea dates from 325, but its substance goes back to those days when the creed was not written, for fear that it should fall into the hands of the heathen. Eusebius tells us that he had learned the Nicene Creed as a child, and that it was to all intents and purposes the creed which had been handed down in the venerable Church of Caesarea from apostolic days. So it was also with the Liturgy. The Liturgy of St. James is simply one of those four early liturgies, whose close resemblance proclaims their common origin from the one liturgical type. No matter when the liturgy was written, its use was apostolic. From the very beginning there had been a common form. Each Church felt at liberty to vary and adapt it; but each held firmly to what were regarded as its central and essential features.

Now this fact suggests a very simple explanation of all our difficulties. Remember what they are. We have seen that St. Paul must have quoted the words "which eye hath not seen," etc., as a part of Holy Scripture; yet the quotation does not seem to have come directly either from the Hebrew or the Greek. There are grave objections also to the idea that the passage is simply a free quotation from the Septuagint. On the other hand, Neale's opinion is clearly inadmissible. St. Paul did not quote the Liturgy of St. James. Yet it does not follow therefore, that the Liturgy of St. James took the words from St. Paul. May there not have been a third source from which both St. Paul and the liturgy quoted the words? The repeated use of this one short text in so many fragments of those early days suggests that this must have been a very familiar passage. Moreover, while in almost every instance we find the passage in substantially the shape in which it appears in St. Paul, yet there are just the little variations which we should expect to find in writers who were quoting something learned by heart. Add one more fact. The text was, Bishop Lightfoot says, a favorite with the early Gnostic heretics, and in frequent use by them.

Bring all these lines together, and we are led to the conclusion that St. Paul quoted the words from the liturgy of his own day, where they formed a part of a solemn prayer familiar to all his readers. Moreover, the apostle knew well that it was a part of God's Word, that it was simply a free rendering of the passage in Isaiah. In other words, he quoted it just as we would quote "the comfortable words": "Come unto Me all ye that travail and are heavy laden, and I will refresh you." None of us would hesitate to quote these words as Holy Writ, yet every one would know that the quotation was also from the Liturgy.

It is not wise perhaps to be too dogmatic on such a point; but he who reads with care Neale's "Essay," with Moullie's Appendix, and then examines Field's "Apostolic Liturgy," will feel that our conclusion is supported by very strong arguments. It meets all the facts in the case. It removes difficulties which have perplexed the commentator ever since the days of Chrysostom and Jerome. Moreover, this passage does not stand alone, but there are others also which seem to have been taken from the prayers and praises of God's Church.

ENGLAND.

THE REV. DR. PHILLIPS BROOKS at WESTMINSTER ABBEY. — There was a very large congregation at Westminster Abbey on the evening of Sunday, June 7th. Among those present were Archbishop Trench, the Bishop of Ripon, the Bishop-designate of Brisbane and others. The Rev. Dr. Phillips Brooks of Boston occupied the pulpit. His text was St. Luke ii. 49, his subject being the feelings which inspired the Blessed Virgin to ask her Divine Son why He had left her and St. Joseph on the return from Jerusalem to Nazareth, which, he said, revealed the expression of the human heart in every age, which identified causes with their own work for them, and failed to realize the Fatherhood of God, and were consequently jealous when a work passed beyond their control. He illustrated this idea in the cases of a boy growing out of parental control, and inter alia in the case of the abolition of slavery in his own country, where some could not rejoice because it was not brought about exactly in their own way, and of a political party who placed its own fortunes before the good of the country in the very cause it had espoused. He showed how when men were interested for the good of others, whose cases seemed especially committed to them, they could not realize God using other agencies than their own; and so in the larger questions of truth, sympathy was too often limited to a particular Church.

THE ENGLISH CHURCH UNION.—The English Church Union held its twenty-sixth annual meeting on Wednesday, June 10th. The president, Mr. C. L. Wood, made a spirited address, in which he stated that the need of the day was the proclaiming what the Church is, what the morals she inculcates, and the sacraments she administers, what she teaches as the duty and true end of man, and what the life she holds up as worthy of the highest honor. He spoke earnestly in denunciation of the Liverpool Ritual prosecution, and said that such proceedings will result in spreading the faith they are designed to suppress. He concluded with an earnest plea for unity.

After the adoption of the report of the council, the president and council were re-elected.

A resolution of sympathy with the Rev. J. Bell Cox and his congregation was unanimously adopted, assuring them of support in their refusal to acknowledge the authority of the Privy Council and the courts in spiritual matters.

The consideration of the report of the Convocation of Canterbury with regard to the House of Laymen was favorably commended to the several branches of the union.

THE LIVERPOOL RITUAL CASE.—At the adjourned hearing of the Liverpool Ritual case, in York, on Thursday, June 4th, the vicar-choral of York Minster acted as surrogate for Lord Penance. The defendant, the Rev. J. Bell Cox, was thrice called, but did not appear. At the petition of the complainant a probationary term was opened for the defendant, and letters compulsory were decreed returnable June 18th, when an application for the examination of witnesses will be made.

There seems to be but little general interest taken in this case, but what is expressed is chiefly against the prosecution as unnecessary and persecuting in its character.

CONSECRATION OF THE BISHOP OF BRISBANE.—On Thursday, June 11th, the Rev. Dr. W. T. Thornhill Webber was consecrated as Bishop of Brisbane at St. Paul's Cathedral, London. The officiating bishops were the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of London and Carlisle, Bishop Turfnel (the first Bishop of Brisbane), and Bishop Mitchinson (late Bishop of Barbadoes). The sermon was preached by the Rev. J. W. Shepard, of Balliol College, Oxford. The new bishop's robes were presented by the teachers of the London School Board, of which he is a member.

IRELAND.

THE BISHOPRIC OF MEATH.—The Archbishop of Armagh issued a commission for a new election in the synod of Meath for a bishop, to be held on June 15th, under the presidency of the Bishop of Down, Connor, and Dromore. The result of the election has not yet reached us; but it is thought that Dr. Bell, who had a majority at the last election, will also head the list at this.

GREECE.

VISITATION OF THE BISHOP OF GIBRALTAR.—The Bishop of Gibraltar held confirmations on Whitsunday and Trinity Sunday at Corfu and world's darkness, all Christians are enlisted under the banners of the great Captain of Salvation, pledged in their baptism to be Christ's faithful soldiers and servants unto their life's end. Our industries are placed in the front of the battle. They incur manifold privations and dangers—nay, count not their lives dear unto themselves, so that they may "finish their course with joy and the ministry which they have received from the Lord Jesus to testify not only of the grace of God." It is at the cost of many lives that the warfare is waged. While we admire the self-sacrificing courage of the patriot soldiers, shall we be insensible to the endurance and devotedness of those who show us that the real and love and fearless devotion of the early Christians are not things of the past!

But why is it more their cause than ours in which they endure hardness? Has the Lord Jesus Christ done less for us than for them? Was not the same blood shed for us all? The same Holy Spirit purchased? Is not the same grace extended to us? We rejoice in the liberty, the hope, the consolation the joy of Christ's salvation, because his servants aforesaid paid this debt to our fathers, and we inherit the blessing. We claim our part in the Saviour's benediction. "Lo, I am with you always unto the end of the world." We rejoice in the liberty of His constant presence, what would our worship, rites, sacraments be worth! All would be lifeless, empty, profitless—the casket without the jewel—the candlestick without the light. But in the same sentence in which the Lord promises to be with His Church he enjoins: "Go ye and do likewise." The promise and the duty are bound up together. They cannot be divorced one from the other. We cannot cling to the grace and refuse the charge. We cannot hope to retain the blessing while we disown the obligation. "Be ye as I am." Jesus is with us now, hearing the suppliant, pardoning the sinner, strengthening the weak, securing the tempted, cheering the living, sustaining the dying, then we must confess also that Jesus is saying, "Let your light so shine before men" "freely ye have received, freely give." You are Messengers to those who are sitting in darkness and the shadow of death. You are required by your own mouth, or by those whom you lead forth, to proclaim liberty to the captives of sin and the opening of the prison to them that are bound. The world is astir and waiting. Nations are ready to be evangelized. Old barriers are falling. Massive and buttressed walls are crumbling. Idol shrines are going to decay. New forces and agencies are at your command. Steam and electricity wait your bidding. The wonderful instruments of the great God are waiting in your aid. Seize these amazing helps—prove these propitious hours. Thus equipped and provided, hasten to save and rescue them that are ready to perish.

There is promised a blessed era in the future, when "they shall no more teach every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord: for they shall all know Me from the least to the greatest." It is not for us to know how near that period may be—peradventure, nearer than we imagine—but, unfeignedly, it has not yet come. The long night of ignorance and sin still hangs over a large portion of the globe. On this spot and on that fall sunbeams. The mountain tops glow and redden; but even in the most favored climes the shadows are but partially dispelled, and over large portions of the earth still mantles a thick pall of murkiness and gloom. Never was the call upon the Church to go forth on this errand of mercy so pressing, nor the openings more inviting, nor the encouragements more evident. The power of the Gospel to elevate the most degraded, often and humanize the most ferocious, purify and cleanse the vilest, is no untried experiment, no problem yet unsolved. Where it is faithfully preached it shows its inherent divinity, its transforming, uplifting, sanctifying influence. "The weapons of our warfare are not carnal, but mighty through God to the pulling down of strongholds." "I am a debtor both to the Greeks and to the barbarians." There is a great debt owing to the destitute and sinful in our midst. But not to them alone. Shall I fold my hands and shut up my sympathies from the distant heathen? and say, "Who is my neighbor?" The Lord has answered the question—any one whom I have wronged. He is waiting for me, wherever I am geographically, but the agencies of Christian benevolence bring him near. My missionary brother is on the ground, gathering in the outcasts and binding up the sore, gaping wounds. I can sustain him while he is doing Christ's work, provide for his wants, give him what is indispensable for his continuance there. It is just as feasible to send the Gospel to another hemisphere as to give bread at our own door. And what we do for the servant we do for the Lord. Who more truly represent Jesus Christ than those who go forth into the world to do His bidding, to heal the sick with flesh and blood, to save those for whom He laid down His own life? "Inasmuch as he did it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye did it unto Me."

While the debt owing to the unevangelized by the whole Church is world-wide and general, the debt to the Church must be met out of the great field upon which its efforts are to be expended. The providence of God may open this door or that, or the convictions of duty may point with special urgency in certain directions. Are there not considerations, grave and weighty, that commend to our attention the African mission? As citizens of the United States we find in our midst millions of African descent. How came they here? Not of their own will, nor are they the descendants of voluntary emigrants. Their ancestors were forcibly torn from their native land and transported across the ocean with most cruel indifference to their anguish and suffering; and those who survived the horrors of the passage were doomed to wear out their lives in hopeless servitude, and bequeath to their children an inheritance of bondage and degradation. It is not for us now to apportion the measure of guilt and accountability incurred by governments or people, or to boast that if we had lived in the days of our fathers we would not have been partakers with them in this inhuman traffic. Men's minds have greatly changed within the last hundred years upon almost every other question, and it may be thanked that in some things certainly the world has been advancing, and that the claims of justice, mercy, and human brotherhood are better understood. We desire not to revive painful memories in the way of stigma and denunciation. But there is one point of view in which it becomes us to look back at the past. Is it in the power of this generation to do something to redress this great wrong, and to repay this immense debt?

By the unrequited labors of those who were brought here manacled captives, and of their descendants, immense tracts of our country have upon the most careful calculation been reaped and garnered. There has been a prodigious development of our resources, and the benefits have been confined to one section of the land. How great a proportion of the wealth of which the nation boasts accrued from the toil of this people God only knows. We, at the present day, cannot obliterate the past, or undo the wrong, or recall to life the sufferers, or return the debt in kind. But what we can do is to send heaven's choicest gift, the knowledge that maketh wise unto salvation, to the shores where once the slave-trader embarked his living cargo, and thus show charity blessings to the kindred and countrymen of those who toiled and died in a land of strangers. To the millions of this race among ourselves, as well as to those beyond the sea, we should count ourselves debtors. If any branch of the evangelistic work of our Church be secular and sacred claims, and if we have support, it seems to me to be our African mission, as well as our home missions among our colored people. With glad and ready heart should we enter this open door. With free and unenclosed hand should we pour our gifts into the Lord's treasury. And when we read with averted eye the shocking details of former injustice and inhumanity, well may we thank God that He has shewn us a way in which we may send back to those sunny climes the beneficence, the value of which cannot be told.

On the present occasion, when, in obedience to the mandate of our Church, we are assembled for the purpose of conferring the highest office in her gift upon a representative of this race, and clothing him with authority to preach the Word and to commission others to preach it, to build up and govern the Church of Christ on that continent, we may well be stimulated by the history of the past. It is our privilege to send the messenger of glad tidings, the harbinger of peace. Swift-winged ships now traverse the ocean, bearing not the robber and the pirate, but the evangelist and teacher, the helper and healer.

Over those immense regions which stretch from the Mediterranean far into the Southern Ocean there still prevails, with little exception, the unbroken reign of Satan and death. Scarcely a human being is to be seen. Loveliness and grandeur are devastated by incessant wars and appalling cruelties. The groans of the wretched are rising in agony and despair from burning villages and tortured captives. Sorcery and superstition poison the charities of social intercourse, and the living drag on their existence in constant terror. Oh! if there be a debt owing from happy and favored people to the crushed and wretched, it is nowhere more evident and imperative.

In helping us to do something in this regard of Christian love, we call upon you, brother beloved in the Lord, to be our agent and co-operator. The fullest authority of the Gospel ministry is now to be confided to you. Great is the trust, arduous the work, wide the field. For the wise discharge of your important duties, and their effectiveness and success, you will need, in no small measure, those gifts which our ascended Saviour bestowed upon His ministry, and for which our united prayers will now be offered.

While we deplore the past wrongs and existing miseries of the vast continent upon whose shores you will lift up the standard, we cherish the hope that some great and daring thing, the veil that has hung for ages over that land of mystery and terror is being lifted up. Those long unknown and inaccessible regions are now penetrated by the adventurer, the man of science and the missionary. There are revealed to the entranced eyes of the wandering explorer broad lakes, towering mountains, majestic streams and fertile plains of unlimited expansion. Christendom is startled and aroused by these wondrous disclosures. Africa is not to be forever the land of barbarism and fetichism, the prey of the robber and tyrant. The waves of civilization are breaking higher and higher upon her shores, and flowing up her grand rivers. Oh, that the waters of salvation, the Gospel of peace and goodwill to men may come in with this rushing tide. Oh, that the throne of the Lord Jesus may be prepared where Satan's seat has been so long and so strongly established. Envious is the privilege, my brother, of bearing a part, however humble, in such an enterprise—of doing something to help forward and hasten the regeneration of Africa. It was a son of Africa who bore the Saviour's cross on the way to Calvary, and patiently and lovingly to carry the same hallowed burden for the same dear Master. The task of Simon the Cyrenian is not yet done. We rejoice in the belief that you are here to-day in obedience to a higher call than that of a man. Trusting that you will be cheered by the smile of our gracious Saviour, and that with enlarged powers abundant success will crown your efforts, we this day devoutly wish you God speed.

After the sermon the bishop-elect was presented by the Assistant-Bishop of New York and the Bishop of Northern New Jersey. The testimonials were read by the Rev. Dr. Wm. Tatlock, Secretary of the House of Bishops, and the Rev. George F. Fichtner, Secretary of the Domestic Missionary Committee. The Litany was said by the Bishop of Northern New Jersey.

ceeded to the examination of the bishop-elect, the latter answering the questions in a clear and audible voice. The bishop elect, with the assistance of the attending presbyters, then put on the rest of the episcopal habit, and the Veni Creator Spiritus was said by the bishops and clergy.

The bishops assisting the Presiding Bishop in the Act of Consecration were the Bishops of Pennsylvania and Long Island. The Bishop of Pennsylvania then concluded the Communion Office. The offerings were for Bishop Ferguson's work at Cape Palmas.

The Rev. Dr. Samuel David Ferguson, upon whom the theological faculty of Gambier College, Ohio, conferred the degree of Doctor in Divinity, on June 18th, was born in Charleston, S. C., in 1842, was baptized by Bishop Gadsden, emigrated with his parents to Liberia, when six years old, and was educated in the mission schools under Bishop Payne, by whom, also, he was ordained deacon in 1865, and priest in 1868. At that time he became rector of St. Mark's parish, Harper, and continued so till elected to the position he now occupies. Bishop Ferguson has under him eleven clergymen, all of whom were raised up in the field, one foreign lady, six lay readers, two business agents, and twenty catechists and teachers. For a long time he has been president of the Standing Committee, for two or three years the business agent of the mission, as also the Superintendent of the Cape Palmas Female Orphan Asylum and Girls' School.

NEW YORK.—The Sheltering Arms.—An abstract of the report of the president of this institution, the Rev. Dr. T. M. Peters, is presented as follows: Since the Sheltering Arms began, twenty-one years ago, 1,347 children had shared in its benefits. Twenty-one lots had been purchased, and the various buildings capable of accommodating nearly two hundred children had been erected and paid for.

The charges for maintaining the establishment had ranged from $6,000 a year at the beginning to $28,000 at the present time. These charges had been met by donations—excepting a deficit of $5,000 accruing in the years 1882 and 1883, and $70,849.42 in gifts and legacies had been invested for the purposes of endowment. Much remained to be done, and there was now needed an increased income to warrant the filling up of empty beds and to restore the deprecation of fifteen years' wear.

There was room in all the cottages for 190 children, but the last year's receipts were sufficient to support only 160. With the Little May fund there was now, including a pledge of $10,000 for the Furniss Cottage, an endowment sufficient to maintain thirty beds, leaving 160 to be supported by the annual donations, or to be left unoccupied.

During the twelve months past one bed had endowed by one of the trustees, another by his wife, and a third by Mrs. Williams. There had also been some smaller contributions. The increase of this endowment fund would insure the permanent maintenance of as many children as might be thus provided for, and would also greatly relieve the financial pressure and consequent anxiety.

An apportionment from the excise fund, amounting in 1884 to $1,675, had been diverted by the Legislature to other objects, and an especial appeal was made for donations to counterbalance the withdrawal of the excise money.

The institution had reached the close of the year with $61.03 of cash in hand. This was the first treasurer's report since the opening of the Furniss Cottage, in which there had been no deficit in the current expense account.

The Wolfe Cottage had been thoroughly renovated and fitted up for a family of girls by money kindly given by Miss Wolfe for that purpose. The expenditure amounted to $1,281.90. The Wolfe Cottage had been taken possession of by the Cooper girls. The cottage occupied by the latter was now awaiting repairs, and there was now demanded, on account of wear and tear of this, as also the Montgomery Cottage, together with the fences, the sum of $4,100, in addition to the year's current expenses. Whence the money was to come did not yet appear. It is solicited, as unavoidably necessary.

Since the last report the Moore Cottage had been fitted up and furnished as a hospital at a cost of $880. It had rooms in abundance for as many of the sick as the institution was likely to have at any time. The old hospital had been altered into a dwelling and rented out.

One hopeful sign in the financial record of the year had been the increase in the number of contributing Sunday-schools, and in the amount thus secured. The care of children ought to be the children's work, and it was hoped that they would be able henceforth to report a continued growth of interest in the Sheltering Arms among the younger of Christ's disciples.

There had been from May 1st, 1884, to April 30th, 1885, 596 applications for admission; 40 children had entered, and 45 had been discharged, leaving the present number 161, of whom 72 were boys and 89 girls. Five hundred and forty-six of those seeking admission had been necessarily turned away, thus repeating the mournful story of many a past year. A correspondence, however, had been opened between the Sheltering Arms and other institutions, by means of which room had been found elsewhere for a much larger number than the Sheltering Arms could take in.

The family system early adopted by the Sheltering Arms daily commended itself more and more by its results. One high in authority in the charitable department of the State had written, saying he had seen no institution among the children of the city that interested him more than the Sheltering Arms. The cottage plan was undoubtedly the right one. This system, it was added, the Sheltering Arms proposes to pursue both there and at Mt. Minurn. To its influences were largely owing the freedom from care and the unstrained manners so often remarked upon by visitors. The attendance at public school brought the inmates of the institution in contact with the outside world, and had plainly done its share in bringing about this result.

All but ten of the smallest girls were taught to sew. The Little May girls did all their own work of every kind, in kitchen, sewing-room and laundry, with no help but from the house-mother; and the Furniss boys were kept busy, out of school, except during the hours of play, at the needle, in the kitchen or in the carpenter's shop. For many good suggestions regarding these boys, as well as for the changes for the carpenter, Mr. Nöe, who instructed them, they were indebted to Miss Furniss. She spared neither time nor money for what might tend to their advantage or enjoyment, or add to their presentable appearance.

Sewing classes were held at the house by four ladies from the Church of the Holy Trinity, Harlem, two from St. Andrew's, and one each from the Pilgrim congregation of St. Michael's. The Decorative Art Society continued its most acceptable and useful lessons in drawing and fine sewing, and the teachers express satisfaction with their pupils' progress.

Fifteen Sunday-school classes had been taught by three ladies from the Church of the Holy Trinity, two from St. Michael's, one from St. Mary's, five of the graduates of the Sheltering Arms, and four ladies of the house. Grateful mention is made of all this ready help.

It was recorded that not a single death had occurred for upwards of two years, and that there had been during the year covered by this report but two children seriously ill, both cases of pneumonia.

Members of the executive committee appointed to take charge of the institution had made, each week, several visits to the cottages, superintending the expenditures and giving necessary directions and advice. Miss Richmond and the ladies associated with her had cordially co-operated in carrying out the wishes of the teachers. To these faithful fellow-laborers was due the unflinching good order which delighted every visitor. Drs. Rodenstein, Pooley and O'Brien continued to give their voluntary services.

The Ladies' Association had collected and paid into the treasury towards the support of its cottages, $2,107.53. Its members also dressed the tree for the Christmas festival in the original cottages.

The clergy of St. Michael's visited the house for the purpose of giving religious instruction to the children. There were now in course of preparation for confirmation thirteen boys and twelve girls, who gave good evidence of deep interest in spiritual things. A number of the larger children attended service at St. Michael's, and as many as could be accommodated in St. Mary's attended there each Sunday morning. Its rector, the Rev. Dr. Adams, courteously offered the use of the church building whenever it might be wanted.

The Sheltering Arms' monthly paper, now in its eighteenth year, continued its useful course. Its benefits were shared and appreciated by many other charities, eighty-eight hundred copies of each issue being distributed widely throughout the land.

Since the last meeting of the trustees, Mr. Frederick S. Winston, first vice-president of the society, had finished a life full of good works, and noted, above all else, for its long continued and profound interest in children. His presence was light to the heart of childhood, and until the present generation of children had gone, Mr. Winston's memory would be affectionately cherished.

The property at Mt. Minurn, Westchester county, remained as at the last report, no funds having been received to warrant the commencement of operations there.

The trustees in concluding their report, heartily thanked all who had furthered their labors by word or deed, and trusted for a continuance of their willing aid.

NEW YORK.—St. Ignatius' Church.—The assistant-bishop visited this church (the Rev. Arthur Ritchie, rector), on the evening of Thursday, June 25th, and confirmed twenty-two persons presented by the rector.

WESTCHESTER.—Memorial at St. Peter's Church.—In the vestry-room of St. Peter's church, Westchester, (the Rev. J. H. Johnson, rector), is a collection of articles of interest gathered from the descendants of former rectors of the church, and tastefully arranged for future preservation. On one of the walls is a hanging cabinet beautifully made of polished oak, and of an antique pattern, which harmonizes with the architecture of the church. It contains three shelves, on which are arranged a variety of souvenirs given as heirlooms to the corporation of St. Peter's church to be held in trust for all time. The cabinet is closed by a door fitted with a heavy plate-glass panel, and the hinges and mountings are of heavy and handsome brass. Exposed to view are the Prayer Book owned and used by the founder and first rector of the church, the Rev. John Bartow, whose ministrations covered nearly a quarter of a century, from 1702 to 1726. The Prayer Book shows excellent preservation, and the page exposed to view states that it was "printed for Cave Pullen, London, 1686." A manuscript sermon, yellow with age, written by the Rev. John Bartow, may also be seen. In addition to the text, written on an outer leaf, it bears his indorsements as having been preached from by him at "W. C.," (Westchester), "E. C.," (Eastchester), and "N. R.," (New Rochelle,) with the months and years added to the initials of the towns.

There is also a piece of window-glass with the name of "Isaac Wilkins, August 23d, 1770," scratched on the glass with a diamond. This signature of one of the former rectors of St. Peter's was taken from an old house on Castle Hill, near Westchester, that was owned and occupied by the Rev. Isaac Wilkins, and when it is considered the War of the Revolution made the entire country neutral ground, that was successively overrun by Cow Boys and Skinners, and that nearly every house was plundered, the recent removal of this autographic pane of glass from the window-sash to be placed in a receptacle of honor, tells a wonderful story of the care used for so many years in washing the window and of the vigilance exercised for its preservation. Besides these, there is a very odd book-mark with the figure of the Virgin Mary embroidered upon it, and an old letter written by the Rev. William Powell, one of the former rectors of the parish. Also a manuscript sermon written by the Rev. Charles D. Jackson, the predecessor of the late Rev. Dr. Christopher B. Wyatt.

The Rev. Joseph H. Johnson is the present incumbent, to whose efforts and good taste the church is indebted for this exhibit.

The lower portion of the cabinet is formed by an open shelf, where, protected by a heavy and handsome brass band and padlock, rest two copies of the old Hugh Gaine edition of the "Book of Common Prayer." This edition is of great value, as only a few copies are now in existence, and they are of considerable age. The books are very large and printed in beautiful type, and are copies of the official Prayer Book, "As given to the Church in the United States of America by the House of Bishops, in convention assembled, on the 16th day of October, 1789, printed by Hugh Gaine in New York, by direction of the General Convention, MDCCLXXXV."

On the western wall of the vestry-room, in a handsome frame, hangs the very rare and large engraving of the Rt. Rev. Samuel Seabury, by the celebrated engraver, W. Sharp, of London, from the painting by Thomas S. Duche. Mr. Seabury was the third rector of St. Peter's, from 1796 until the breaking out of the War of the Revolution, and, as is well known, was afterwards Bishop of Connecticut, and the first ordained Episcopal bishop in the United States.

On the opposite side of the wall is a collection of small engravings grouped in a frame made from the oak timber of the first St. Peter's church, built at Westchester in A. D. 1700. The old church was used until the War of the Revolution, when the seats were taken out and it was converted into a hospital. After the war it was sold to Mrs. Sarah Ferris, and removed to her lot, adjoining the churchyard, where it was converted into a barn, and the heavy timber frame of the old church still remains as the central part of a large barn, all but the heavy frame having been supplied with new timbers and planking. In this frame of venerable wood may be seen pictures of especial interest relating to the life of the first rector of St. Peter's church, such as the parish church at Pampisford, Cambridgeshire, England, of which the Rev. John Bartow was curate or vicar before he came to America; Christ College, Cambridge, of which he was a graduate, and the ancient costumes worn there by the students and professors; the great stone Church of the Holy Cross, at Crediton, in Devon, which he attended with his parents in boyhood, and in whose churchyard his father, Doctor Thomas Bartow, and his mother, Grace Bartow, and his younger brother, Anthony, are buried; and the church records of the Crediton church give the dates of the births and deaths; a beautiful print of the arrest of Charles the First of England, for whom Peter Bartow, the grandfather of the Rev. John Bartow, fought against Cromwell and the Parliament, and for which he was heavily fined and paroled by the joint action of the House of Lords and Commons; an etching of Thomas Tenson, Archbishop of Canterbury, who was the President of the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts at the time it sent the Rev. John Bartow as one of its first missionaries to America; a beautiful little engraving of the Rt. Rev. Symon Patrick, D.D., Bishop of Ely, who especially recommended the Rev. John Bartow to the society for a missionary, and one of Henry Compton, Lord Bishop of London, who signed his credentials to America, and a picture of the bishop's palace at Fulham, on the River Thames, where the credentials were dated; also the scarce engraving of the Hon. Colonel Caleb Heathcote, through whose influence with Lord Cornbury, then Colonial Governor of New York, the young English missionary, Bartow, was settled over the "Church of England" at Westchester, in the Province of New York, i. e. St. Peter's; then an engraving of Queen Mary the Second of England, with whom the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel originated, and King William the Third of England, who granted its charter; and one of Queen Anne, who presented the silver chalice and paten that is so prized as a relic, and has been used in the administration of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper in St. Peter's church from the early ministrations of the Rev. John Bartow, who received it from Queen Anne, down to the present time.

There is also the printed "Pedigree of Bartow, of Westchester," taken from the latest edition of Bolton's "History of Westchester County, New York," showing that the Bartow family have given six ministers to the Episcopal Church in America, and that six of its female descendants have married Episcopal clergymen. The Bartows are of Huguenot origin, their ancestors having fled from France into Holland after the massacre of St. Bartholomew, from whence the family went to England and settled near Exeter, in Devon, where the name became anglicized to Bartow, being written in English very nearly as it is pronounced in French, which name has been given to a railway station near Westchester on the Harlem River branch of the New York and New Haven Railway, and to a county in Georgia and to several Southern towns.

St. Peter's church at Westchester is one of the most beautiful country churches in the United States.

CENTRAL NEW YORK.

WATERTOWN—Grace Church.—The repairs and improvements on this church (the Rev. Dr. Albert Danker, rector,) which have been in progress for two or three weeks, have been completed, and the sacred edifice presents a neat and handsome appearance. The main walls of the nave are colored in a light and tasteful tint, and the ceiling is paneled and bordered with gilt bands. The chancel is also painted throughout, the ceiling a bright blue with handsome frescoed border and ornaments around the windows. The church has been recarpeted, and the pews retained and lacquered, and the whole church has been re-roofed.

The services on the Third Sunday after Trinity, June 21st, were appropriate to the occasion. The church was beautifully decorated, and the music very fine. There was a celebration of the Holy Eucharist with numerous communicants. The rector preached from Genesis xxviii. 17. The subject was "The Beautiful Gate," and was an argument for the sanctity of places of Christian worship.

NORTHERN NEW JERSEY.

NEWARK—Christ Church.—At morning service in this church on Sunday, June 21st, the rector (the Rev. J. N. Stansbury) made an interesting report of the condition of the church, in which he set forth that there had been more money subscribed by his congregation during the past year than ever before, and that there are now attached to the church 180 communicants. He also alluded to the various guilds connected with the church, and announced that the Women's Guild alone has succeeded in raising over $500, a portion of which went toward building the iron fence on the Congress-street side of the church grounds.

HALEDON—St. Mary's Church.—On Sunday, June 21st, a large and beautiful altar cross was placed in this church (the Rev. J. C. Hall, rector). It is beautifully wrought in an ivy-leaf pattern, with the Chi Rho at the intersection of the arms, and is surrounded by a halo, handsomely chased. It is a thank-offering from Mrs. W. S. Hudson. A number of handsome gifts have also been made to the parish, including a retable, an altar desk, altar linen and a prayer desk.

PENNSYLVANIA.

PHILADELPHIA—St. John Baptist's Church, Germantown.—The feast of St. John Baptist was becomingly observed in this church (the Rev. C. H. Hibbard, rector,) on Wednesday, June 24th. There was a plain celebration of the Holy Eucharist at 7 A. M. At 8 P. M. there was a full choral festival Evensong, according to the English use, rendered with the surpliced choir, who entered the church from the parish house, preceded by a banner. The rector acted as precentor, and the Rev. Dr. L. L. Nicholson read the lesson. Mendelssohn's anthem, "The Righteous Live Forever," and Barnby's Magnificat were sung, and the Te Deum followed as an act of thanksgiving, the clergy and chorists facing eastward.

PHILADELPHIA—Death of Mr. James S. McCalla.—Mr. James S. McCalla, a prominent printer and publisher of this city, died on Friday, June 26th, in his seventy-sixth year. Mr. McCalla was the head of the well known Church publishing house of McCalla & Stavelly. He was proprietor and publisher of The Episcopal Recorder until 1865, when it was sold out, and in 1870 he started The Episcopal Register, which last year was merged in The Churchman. Mr. McCalla was a prominent Churchman. He was for some years warden of St. Matthew's church, a delegate to the diocesan convention, and a member of the Board of Missions.

BRIISTOL—Church of St. James the Greater.—This parish (the Rev. Joseph W. Lee, rector,) has lately sustained a loss by the death of Mrs. Maria Morris, who has passed to her rest in Paradise in the advanced age of eighty years. Long an active member of St. James's, leading in works of charity, considerate of the poor, and efficient in Sunday-school labor, she was one who contributed largely to the prosperity and usefulness of the church. During the War of the Rebellion she devoted herself voluntarily with much self denial to the care of the suffering soldiers in the hospital at Washington.

St. James's church is one of the oldest parishes in this diocese, having been founded more than two centuries ago. It was organized first of all the religious bodies of this ancient town. The house of worship is a substantial edifice of stone, erected about thirty years ago. Somewhat recently the ladies of the parish secured funds and built a beautiful chapel, which provides excellent accommodations for the Sunday-school, with its infant and Bible classes, and for Lenten and other special services. The Sunday-school is under the lay superintendency of A. Weir Gilkeson, and numbers some three hundred members. The church and chapel stand in a large enclosure, laid out in lawns shaded by fine old trees, and having many graves, some very old. It is proposed in the near future to materially improve the Church building, which needs considerable repair and interior adornment. The Rev. John H. Drumm, D.D., now deceased, widely known in the controversies of the past, was for ten years rector of this parish. The present rector has been in charge nearly seven years, and is permitted to see the parish sustaining a vigorous life.

CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA.

POTTSVILLE—Ordination at Trinity Church.—On Sunday, June 21st, the bishop of the diocese visited this parish (the Rev. J. F. Powers, rector), and ordained to the diaconate Mr. James Powers Hawkes, the nephew of the rector. There was a large congregation present. The bishop preached the ordination sermon, and was assisted in the services by the rector, and the Rev. Messrs. B. W. Atwell and E. J. Koona.

The newly ordained deacon will remain in the parish, doing work as assistant-minister. The parish has four mission chapels under its care.

MARYLAND.

BALTIMORE—St. Bartholomew's Parish.—Dr. N. L. Dashiell and wife have deeded to the rector, wardens, and vestry of this parish a lot of ground in this city, thirty by one hundred feet, and valued at $4,000, as a site for a rectory. It adjoins the parish church on North Avenue. The vestry have arranged for an expensive pipe organ to be manufactured in New York. These are among some of the fruits of the rectorship of the Rev. Edward H. Ingle, lately assuming charge.

HYATTSVILLE—St. Matthew's Parish.—The sum of $173 has been raised toward the purchase of a lot in this village for a new church.

The place is one of growing importance, and for some years past the need of church accommodations has been apparent.

BALTIMORE—Grace Church.—The vestry of this church have elected the Rev. Dr. Henry A. Coit, principal of St. Paul's School, Concord, N. H., as rector. Dr. Coit has not yet signified his acceptance or declination of the election.

BALTIMORE—Resignation of the Rev. Dr. Rankin.—The Rev. Dr. Charles W. Rankin, rector of St. Luke's church, has tendered his resignation on account of declining health. Dr. Rankin has been rector of this congregation for thirty-two years, having come here from St. Peter's church, Morristown, N. J. He is the senior rector of the city, and has always maintained a high degree of respect and popularity among all classes of people.

NORTH CAROLINA.

RALEIGH—St. Mary's School.—Among the numerous Church schools whose commencement exercises are noticed at this season of the year, it would seem that St. Mary's, Raleigh, N. C., should claim special attention. Her seniority among her sister schools gives her the prestige of a long-established and successful reputation; her course of study is progressive and thorough; her standard of scholarship is unsurpassed; her pupils enjoy unusual advantages for the study of music, art and modern languages; and, as her crown of completeness, she has a noble record as a training school for the daughters of the Church in sound Catholic doctrine, and in the development of their spiritual life and the cultivation of those "good works" which are its outward manifestation. What more could be desired in selecting a school for the education of our children?

Previous to 1842 there was not in all the South Atlantic and Gulf States a single Church school for girls. The want of one in his own diocese was deeply felt by Bishop Ives, and his heart was made glad in that year when the Rev. Aldert Smedes of New York City came to Raleigh, and there laid broad and deep the foundations of an institution which was destined to become a centre of "higher education" in the best sense of the term, from which would radiate theories of Churchly teaching and missionary zeal and religious influence whose value to society and to the Church of Christ cannot be duly estimated.

Throughout the length and breadth of our Southern States (though by no means confined to their limits) the alumnae of St. Mary's are found, everywhere conspicuous among women for earnestness in the duties of life, for loyalty to the Church of their love, and for gentle and refining influence in the social circle. The sons of many of them now minister at the altar; scores of parishes have been founded and churches built by the efforts of others; sisterhoods and struggling parishes and mission fields at home and abroad number among their best workers many whose loving hearts and hands were directed in the right way by St. Mary's precepts and example.

In 1877, after thirty-five years of toil in the vineyard, the venerable founder, beloved and revered by his flock, as few of God's saints are on earth, answered to his Master's call, and passed into the rest of Paradise. His son, the Rev. Bennett Smedes, took up the prophet's mantle, and still conducts the school as its rector and principal, assisted by a lady principal of rare talent and attainments, and with a corps of teachers in every department as able as the country can afford, he carries on the work as though "a double portion of the father's spirit" rested on him; and so, "with words of wisdom on her lips and the law of kindness in her heart," St. Mary's still wins her children's love, and leads them through the gates of knowledge and religion into paths of holy usefulness in every state of life to which God's providence shall call them.

About the beloved chapel centre the fondest affections of all who love the dear old school. For nearly half a century the daily round of service and of holy teaching have continued there. On Sundays, when the holy feast is spread, scarcely a girl who has reached years of discretion fails to come forward for its reception. From the little font the waters of baptism have been poured upon many a young girl's head, admitting her into the fold of Christ. Here are received the alms and contributions of the school for charitable and missionary purposes. The poor of Raleigh, St. John's Hospital, sundry needy parishes, the Aldert Smedes Scholarship in China were all mentioned this year as having been remembered in the distribution of the funds.

The patronage of St. Mary's, as has been said, is not limited to the Southern States. She has warm and devoted friends both North and West. To Church girls, who would exchange the long severe Northern winters for the balmy climate of the sunny South, she offers peculiar advantages, scholastic and art privileges unsurpassed by any they may leave behind, combined with the refined surroundings and elevating influence of a cultivated happy home.

FLORIDA.

ORANGE LAKE—Acknowledgment of Gifts.—In a private letter to the rector of St. Matthew's church, Jersey City, N. J., the warden of the church at Orange Lake says: "I am so late about writing to you particularly of the beautiful gifts sent to our church on Orange Lake by friends in the North, incited to the good deeds by your never-forgetful interest for me, that I fear you have doubted our appreciation and gratitude. For the windows particularly, so much more beautiful than anything we had planned for; for the solid walnut chancel furniture, a pleasant contrast with the hard pine and red bay finish of the church interior, please present our grateful and hearty thanks to each and every one who contributed, little or much, to make up the gifts, which, together, make such a perfect completion to what you so faithfully and persistently pushed so near to a finish while here."

TENNESSEE.

DIOCESAN CONVENTION.—The fifty-third annual convention met in St. Paul's church, Seawane (the Rev. Dr. F. A. Shoup, rector). The Litany was said at 9 a.m. by the Rev. G. W. Dumbell. The Holy Communion was then celebrated, the Bishop of Texas being celebrant, assisted by the bishop of the diocese and the rector of the parish.

On calling the convention to order, the bishop made an address of welcome to the Bishop of Texas, who returned his thanks.

The Rev. Dr. T. F. Gailor was re-elected secretary.

A picture of the late Bishop Otey, the first bishop of the diocese, was now brought in, by direction of the bishop, and exhibited. The convention purchased the portrait, and presented the same to the University of the South. Bishops Otey, Elliott, and Polk were the original founders of the university.

The bishop read his annual address. "The Book Annexed" was referred to a special committee, with the bishop as chairman, to report to the next convention.

The thanks of the convention were extended to the Rev. Dr. George White of Memphis for his "History of the Church in Tennessee."

This being the twentieth year of the bishop's episcopate, an address was presented him containing a review of his long and earnest labors, and the convention, by a unanimous rising vote, requested the bishop to take six months rest in order that his health, now seriously impaired, may be restored.

The Diocesan Missionary Committee having asked for three hundred dollars, it was resolved to raise the amount desired.

The following officers were elected: Standing Committee—the Rev. Dr. G. White, the Rev. Messrs. W. Klein, and D. Sessums, and Messrs. S. Lamb and D. M. Scales; treasurer, Mr. E. F. Sevier; registrar, the Rev. T. Hodgson.

The venerable Bishop of Mississippi was introduced and welcomed by the convention.

A resolution was adopted "That the Church in Tennessee sympathizes with the movement of the Church Temperance Society, and will cordially welcome a branch of the society in Tennessee."

A committee was appointed to prepare an address to the diocese on the subject of the support of the theological department at Sewanee.

It was resolved to hold the next convention in St. Ann's church, Edgefield, on May 19th, 1886.

After the usual resolutions the convention adjourned on Friday.

SEWANEE—Ordination.—On Thursday, June 15th, the bishop held an ordination in St. Augustine's chapel of the University of the South. The diocesan convention being in session, it adjourned for the occasion, and attended the service. There were present the bishop of the diocese, the Bishops of Mississippi and Texas, and a large number of clergy and laity. The service was choral. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Davis Sessums. The bishop was assisted by the two visiting bishops and the vice-chancellor of the university. Messrs. Hale, Biddell, Sharp, Griffin, and Taylor were admitted to the diaconate, and the Rev. Messrs. H. P. L. Graham and J. Blacklock were advanced to the priesthood.

After the service the bishops, clergy, and delegates inspected St. Luke's Hall.

WISCONSIN.

STANDING COMMITTEE.—The Standing Committee elected at the annual council was incorrectly given in our last issue. The committee elected was the following: The Rev. Drs. W. B. Ashley, L. A. Kemper and E. P. Wright, the Rev. F. Royce, and Messrs. E. P. Brockway, D. G. Hooker, W. Smith and M. M. Welles. The Rev. J. M. Francis was elected registrar.

MINNESOTA.

DIOCESAN COUNCIL.—The twenty-eighth annual council met in the cathedral church of Our Merciful Saviour, Faribault, on Wednesday, June 10th. Morning Prayer was said by the Rev. Messrs. M. N. Gilbert, A. J. Graham, W. Gardam and A. R. Graves. After Morning Prayer the bishop proceeded to the celebration of the Holy Communion, in which he was assisted by the Rev. Drs. F. J. Hawley and E. S. Thomas and the Rev. Messrs. G. C. Tanner and E. Livermore. The sermon was preached by the Rev. E. J. Purdy.

Immediately after the service the council was called to order, and organized by the re-election of the Rev. F. L. Cole as secretary. Mr. H. P. Hoppin was also re-elected treasurer.

The bishop then appointed the Standing Committee of the council.

The report of the Minnesota Church Fund was read and referred to the Finance Committee.

A special committee was appointed to arrange for the legal incorporation of the diocese in accordance with the recent act of the Legislature.

"The Book Annexed" was, on motion, referred to a committee of four clergymen and three laymen, to report to the next council.

On motion, a special committee of four clergymen and three laymen was appointed to report to this council some plan for the relief of the bishop in his arduous labors, either by the election of an assistant-bishop, by the division of the diocese, or in such other way as may be deemed best.

The treasurer's report was read and referred. The reports of the Deans of Convocations were presented and read.

The Standing Committee was re-elected as follows: The Rev. Drs. E. S. Thomas and T. B. Wells, the Rev. G. B. Whipple and Messrs. I. Atwater, J. Gillilan and H. T. Welles.

The report of the Committee on the Incorporation of the Diocese was presented and discussed, and the form of incorporation was adopted and ordered to be filed with the State authorities.

The bishop read his annual address, in which he spoke of methods of systematic giving, of a more generous support from the laity, not merely in money, but in assisting in the upbuilding of the Church. He spoke of the necessity of an assistant-bishop, and gave a summary of episcopal acts: Ordinations, 4; confirmations, 453; churches consecrated, 4.

Committees were appointed on the establishment of an Indian School in Faribault and on Systematic Offerings.

The report of the Standing Committee was presented and read.

The Committee on the Relief of the Bishop reported resolutions that the election of an assistant-bishop is the best means of relieving the bishop of part of the burdens of his great labors, and that the bishop call a special council for this purpose on or before November 1st. These resolutions, after some discussion, were unanimously adopted.

The Committee on Systematic Offerings reported in favor of the appointment of a layman from each parish, who shall collect all mission funds and report the same to a central treasury. The report was adopted.

The report of the Board of Missions showed an excellent condition of the treasury, and was generally encouraging.

The Special Committee reported adversely to the establishment of an Indian school in Faribault.

After the usual resolutions, the council adjourned on Thursday, June 11th.

The next annual council will meet in Gethsemane church, Minneapolis.

FARIBAULT—Seabury Divinity Hall.—The graduating exercises of this institution took place on the evening of Tuesday, June 9th, in the cathedral of Our Merciful Saviour. The address by the Bishop of Missouri was eminently practical and incisive. It was designed to show to the young men how much St. Paul was a model after which they might shape their lives. At the close of the exercises the alumni held their annual dinner at the Brunswick House.

The ordination was held in the cathedral on Sunday, June 14th. The bishop and clergy, preceded by the candidates, entered the cathedral in procession, the bishop's cross being borne by the Rev. Dr. T. C. Yarnall. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Yarnall. Messrs. G. H. Yarnall, S. R. Jeffords, A. B. Hill, E. H. Clark and Robert Coles were admitted to the diaconate, and the Rev. Messrs. P. B. Peabody, C. E. Hixon and W. B. Hamilton were advanced to the priesthood.

IOWA.

BUFFALO—St. John's Mission.—The bishop of the diocese made a visitation of this mission (the Rev. E. H. Downing in charge) and confirmed three persons. The little temporary church was crowded. Buffalo is distant from Davenport about ten miles. It is slowly but surely prospering under many adverse circumstances. A building belonging to Capt. Clark is used for the services, and fitted up by the few ladies of the mission.

MISSOURI.

ST. LOUIS—Women's Auxiliary.—The annual meeting of the Missouri Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary was held in Christ church, St. Louis, (the Rev. Dr. M. Schuyler, rector,) on Friday, May 29th. The Rev. Dr. Clinton Locke gave the address on "Woman's Work," taking woman as a citizen for his theme. Luncheon was served in the parish guild room to one hundred and thirty persons. Nearly all the city clergy were present, and a number of others remained after convention closed to attend this meeting.

At the afternoon session the Rev. Benjamin E. Reed spoke in behalf of foreign missions, and the Rev. William L. Gibbens in behalf of diocesan missions.

The secretary's report was then read. Twenty-five missionary boxes had been sent, valued at $1,027.65, and for different missionary objects $256.75 was given, making a total of $1,284.35.

Mrs. Clinton Locke gave an interesting account of the Chicago branch of the auxiliary.

The officers elected for the ensuing year are: President, Mrs. Maria Perrino; Vice-President, Miss Annie Bennek; Secretary, Miss Mary W. Triplett; Treasurer, Mrs. Robert M. Wilson.

ST. LOUIS—St. Peter's Church.—This church (the Rev. Herbert Asheton, rector,) received a mark of distinction recently, in the shape of a jewelled altar cross, presented by the Princess of Wales. The cross is of brass, handsomely engraved and ornamented. In the centre is a large and valuable garnet. There is a base of three steps, on which is engraved: "To the Rector and Directory of St. Peter's Episcopal Church. Presented by the Princess of Wales, Great Britain, and Ireland."

OREGON.

ANNUAL CONVOCATION.—The annual convocation of this jurisdiction met in Trinity church, Portland, (the Rev. G. W. Foote, rector,) on Thursday, June 11th.

On Evening Prayer the missionary bishop delivered his annual address. He spoke encouragingly of the work of the diocesan schools, and especially of the establishment of two new schools, one for boys and one for girls, at the Cove in Eastern Oregon. He dwelt at some length on the importance of increasing the Episcopal Fund, and urged that the convocation take some definite action. He spoke of the work in the diocese, and closed with a few earnest words to the clergy.

On Friday morning the convocation organized by the re-election of the Rev. J. W. Sellwood as secretary, who appointed as his assistant the Rev. M. D. Wilson.

At the afternoon session the bishop called on the clergy for an account of work in their respective fields of labor. The clergy made their reports in alphabetical order, and this feature of the convocation was a very interesting and instructive one.

The bishop made the following appointments: Standing Committee, the Rev. Messrs. G. W. Foote and J. W. Sellwood, and Messrs. R. Glisan and J. F. Brown. Board of Mis-

TENURE OF OFFICE FOR TEACHERS.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

May I ask what grounds you have for saying so positively that the "competent teacher is reappointed as surely as if he or she had a five or ten years' contract"? As I write two most competent teachers—not in this neighborhood—have had notice that they had better apply for new schools, as their positions will be filled up by others, relatives of the trustee. The future teachers in this case, I may add, are raw recruits, young and inexperienced, one of whom obtained her certificate by a private examination; the other had here endorsed by a commissioner, who knew nothing of her save that her certificate was good in an adjacent county—better, some say, than her management of her school. In another instance, the two lady teachers will certainly not be re-appointed, if a certain local politician is elected trustee. In the first place, they are respectively the daughters of two men whose political opinions do not jump with his, and in the second, he has a niece and a distant relative—the latter a novice—whom he intends to appoint. In the case of the ladies who are thus to be dispossessed, the religious element also comes in. He is a very bigoted Presbyterian. One of the leaders in the Methodist Episcopal Church, the other a Presbyterian, has shown a disposition to conform to the Church. In neither instance have the people of the district any objection to these teachers. On the contrary, they say they are the best they have had for years, but they are powerless to resist a politico-religious conspiracy, especially when nepotism comes in as a powerful factor. In another case precisely the same state of things is in possibility, the differentiating factor being jealousy and female influence. It is, however, quite likely that this would-be autocratic trustee may be ousted this August—yet great is the power of heer politiek. Another case is not precisely similar, but evidences the evil of yearly elections. It is that of a first-class male teacher, who was promised an increase of $200 this year on his salary. He was given the choice of being re-elected at the old figure, or of seeing a young, untried woman—the daughter of one of the directors—put in his place, and he had to say he submitted to the virtual reduction, rather than run the risk of not obtaining any school elsewhere, or undergo the fatigue and humiliation of canvassing for another situation. In the city of Pittsburg, Pa., last year, personal spite, beer influence, and political rancor deprived one of the largest and most important schools of the services of a man whose equal could not be found, and secured those of a lady who, however excellent, was utterly unable to maintain the necessary discipline. All these instances have occurred within my own personal knowledge, during my short residence in the United States this summer. To me, as an outsider, a system that will admit of such abuses is radically wrong, its tendency being, me judio, to discourage the painstaking, conscientious teacher, to render them utterly indifferent, and to encourage wire-pulling and religious, political, or family influence to the detriment of sound learning and thorough education, and the total subversion of all discipline.

"PAINS OF DEATH."

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

A correspondent of THE CHURCHMAN speaks of the origin of this phrase. In the preface to the first series of Catherine Winkworth's "Lyra Germanica" it is said: "The hymn, 'In the midst of Life,' is one of those founded on a more ancient hymn, the 'Media in Vita' of Notker, a learned Benedictine of St. Gall, who died in 912. He is said to have composed it while watching some workmen, who were building the bridge of Martinsbruck at the peril of their lives. It was soon set to music, and became universally known; indeed it was used as a battle-song, until the custom was forbidden on account of its being supposed to exercise magical influences. In a German version it formed part of the service for the burial of the dead as early as the thirteenth century, and is still preserved in an unmetrical form in the Burial Service of our own Church."

The hymn is given under the head "For the Sick and Dying," on page 235 of "Lyra Germanica," beginning:

"In the midst of life, behold,
Death has gird us round.

Holy Lord and God:
Strong and Holy God:
Majestic and Holy Saviour!
Eternal God!
Sink us not beneath
Bitter pain of endless death,
Kyrie eleison.

This is Luther's translation.

St. Gallus, as it is now called, being named from St. Gallus, its founder, an Irish monk, who died on the Lake of Constance. There is a fine church there, with beautiful wood carvings by the Benedictines. The suppressed abbey was an important seat of learning from the eighth to the tenth century. The library, lately restored, has a "Psalter of Notker" of the tenth century in golden letters, and called the "Golden Psalter." There is a book of hymns by Notker. Notker was called the "stutterer," from his slow and awkward manner of speaking. He saw one of the workmen at the bridge accidentally killed, hence he wrote the lines on the nearness of death to life. Notker is said to have been skilful in church music, though humble and retiring. He was called by Pope John II. and was therefore on the list of saints. A modern traveler (E. T. D.) having visited the monastery, has collected the particulars here given, with some traditions which are not so important.

THE PAINS OF DEATH.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

The discussion thus far appears to me unsatisfactory.

Has not this petition its origin, or at least its adoption into the English Burial Service in times when every Christian man, however great or humble his station, might be called upon to choose between apostasy or death?

In the ninth century, when its origin is laid, the missionaries and their converts were certainly confronted almost hourly with this dread alternative. They were surrounded by paganism, heathenism, and idolatry, equally appropriate in the mouth of every Englishman in the sixteenth century when at home and abroad he was exposed to Roman intolerance.

Was it not an appropriate prayer in Cranmer's mouth? Was it not an appropriate prayer to be said over his mortal remains, and over the remains of every one who departed in the true faith at that time!

The English sailor every time he left his native shore had the inquisition, or the infidel, or the "salvages" ever in his mind. If he fell into the hands of the Spaniard, or the Moroese, or the salvage men, he had need to have this prayer ever on his lips. Thousands of English captives were put the death, and compelled to make the election—apostasy or death.

Kingsley puts it into the mouth of one of his Devoushiremen in "Westward Ho!" and it was ever on the lips of Englishmen in those most glorious and stirring times. Gilbert and Sullivan knew exactly what it was in the Burial Service.

Shall we mutilate this most worthy anthem because in a period of the Church's deep security we have ceased to understand its high import!

Let it remain. With many another petition of peace and defense from enemies, now barely understood, the Church will yet use it with high feeling and deep appreciation.

POINTING OF THE PSALTER.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

The communication of the Rev. J. D. Herron, in the last number, emboldens me to ask through your columns if there be not some standard to the pointing of the canticles.

In training Sunday-school scholars to chant, I have found as the easiest and most practicable the arrangement as set forth in the "Trinity Psalter." I prepared a compendium of the canticles thus arranged, with suitable music, and this was published. To make sure of the correctness of my views, I consulted the best authorities, and found a strange diversity of opinion.

Trinity church of New York uses neither the accenting nor the pointing of the "Trinity Psalter." St. George's uses neither that of Trinity church nor the "Psalter."

The Rev. C. L. Hutchins, in the last edition of the Hymnal, discards all accented words, and in a private letter says: "I also omitted the italicizing of words or syllables, because there is a tendency to prolong those words, and produces a monotonous and drawing effect. The most recent of the best Psalters in England omit the emphasized words altogether."

Now, I find, in consulting the standard English authorities, the same difference of opinion.

In "The Canticles," edited by Sir Gore Ouseley and Edw. Monk, the pointing authorized by the Archbishop of York, only four words in the Venite emphasized, and the pointing peculiar, and unlike anything I have seen here. In the "Cathedral Psalter," by Messrs. Jones, Troutbeck, Turle, Stainer, and Barry, accented words are used throughout, and the pointing is with few exceptions, identical with that in the "Trinity Psalter." I refer, of course, only to the canticles.

Among so many authorities, no two of which agree, which might be considered in general use, or should every choir-master be a law unto himself!

A GOOD OPPORTUNITY.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

The Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad Company is establishing reading rooms at the ends of divisions, along the line of their great road.

This road now extends from the Missouri river to the Pacific Ocean, with branches to Denver, the City of Mexico, and the Gulf of California. It is the shortest route to the Pacific coast, and from its central position is alike free from the extreme heat of the South and the snow blockades of lines farther North.

The great corporation—this one has a soul—has also erected hospitals for the employees of the company. At present I am especially interested in the reading rooms. These will be of much service in furnishing entertainment for the men and keeping them away from temptation. I have myself given some books to the one in Las Vegas. I write to suggest that you give such books as they can spare to the same object. Histories, biographies, travels, novels, and religious books on practical subjects would be suitable. Send to Mr. W. J. Way, Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad Office, Topeka, Kansas, by the American Express Company—not prepaid, the road will not accept it, and Mr. Way will know how to distribute them.

I would be obliged if persons sending would mention me as having made the suggestion, as I am under many obligations to the road, not only personally, but also for my clergy, which has helped me much in pushing my missionary work.

"THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND" IN APPLETON'S ENCYCLOPEDIA.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

In a recent communication to THE CHURCHMAN, on the subject of Appleton's Encyclopedia, it was stated that the Rev. A. A. Spencer, D.D., was the author of the article, "Church of England," in the Encyclopedia. My authority was Messrs. Appleton's general manager for Missouri, and their printed prospectus of the Encyclopedia. In a note received to day from Dr. Spencer he says: "There is an error in stating that I wrote the article on the "Church of England." I did not do this, nor do I know who was the writer." If my previous communication is not in print, please correct by striking out the part referring to Dr. Spencer. If it is too late to remedy in that way, please insert the substance of this as a "correction." SAM'L N. WATSON.

NEW BOOKS.

EARTH'S EARLIER AGES, and Their Connection With Modern Spirituality and Theosophy. By G. H. Pember, M.A., Author of "The Great Prophecies," etc. [New York: A. C. Armstrong & Son.] pp. 85.

Probably some of our readers would dissent to the propositions of this book. It is certainly uncompromising in its exposition of Scripture. It claims for the Book of Genesis absolute truth, and endeavors to reconcile it with the discoveries of science. According to the rule of interpretation, in which we were taught, viz., that an indefinite interval exists between the creation of matter and the creation of the earth that now is, there seems no difficulty in accepting Mr. Pember's theories. His belief concerning evil spirits is more absolute and daring than that of most men, but he certainly has a very strong support in Scripture. In fact, one can hardly get away from his conclusions, except by allegorizing to a dangerous degree, or by the modern hypothesis that our Lord and His apostles spoke according to the current beliefs of their time. Either of these alternatives seems to us less reasonable and probable than to accept Scripture as it is, and to believe it to be true. The latter portion of the book is devoted to an attack on Spiritualism and its kindred beliefs. These Mr. Pember considers as the direct tampering with evil spirits. Of course this depends upon the question whether or not the "manifestations" alleged are true or are impostures. We know that so many of these are nothing but the most vulgar and cheap trickery, that we are still in great doubt whether any of them are otherwise. If they are not impostures, then it is not easy to evade Mr. Pember's conclusions, but as yet there is no evidence strong enough to overthrow the impression which repeated exposure of the tricks of "professional spiritualists" leads to. The trouble is that the "genuine" displays (if any there be) demand exactly the same apparatus and surroundings as those in which imposture has been fully detected.

We do not say this as intending to detract from the value of Mr. Pember's book. We have been very greatly pleased with his general tone of Scripture interpretation. If we do not receive it in every particular it is only that he is more positive in one or two places than the text seems to warrant; but we must admit that he is consistent throughout, and that we merely hold back from full acceptance while we by no means deny. We consider that this book deserves a thoughtful study, especially from the clergy; and we like it none the less because it is perfectly outspoken upon some points of doctrine where the mind of the Church has indeed been fully expressed, but where the lax believers of the present day are often at sea. In fact, the positions of Mr. Pember are easier to sneer at than to answer, and he is certainly too well up in the scientific knowledge of the day to be put off with any convenient generalizations.

We need not say that he is no evolutionist, and that in his mind the idea of a Simian ancestry is simply destructive of the truth of Scripture. It is refreshing to meet with such a firm believer in these days when men, who have never verified a single fact of science, blindly accept the widest theories put forth in its name so long as these are sufficiently opposed to the Bible. There are many men of science who are incapable of drawing a correct inference, save in the matter of the pettiest details, but the man of all men, who leaves reason out of the question, is the clerical rationalist who forsakes the faith in which he has been reared and is pledged to defend, simply because he is told to do so by the pseudo experts of half discovered truths.

MEMOIRS. By Mark Pattison, late Rector of Lincoln College, Oxford. [London and New York: Macmillan & Co.] pp. 391. Price $2.50.

"Memoirs" is here another name for "autobiography." It is a book full of interest, first because it is an account of a very curious and marked mental and moral history, very graphically told, and next because it gives a picture of the "Oxford Movement," so called, by one who was in the heart of it. It is given with a frankness and unreserve which is very unusual. The author criticises his own past with the same vigor as he applauds his own progress. It is the life of a student and university man exclusively.

At the time of Cardinal Newman's famous mission to Rome, Pattison was one of those who might have been expected to follow him almost immediately. Only for the fact that Newman's personal influence with him was less intimate and prevailing than it was in the case of others, he would have gone blindly into the abyss. Instead of that he followed the reactionary tendency toward a "Broad Church" standard, and finally seems to have reached what has been designated as "The All-Broad Church" platform. About one thing he was always terribly in earnest, and that was the elevation of the university standard in life, morals, discipline, and instruction. No one can read this very entertaining book without getting many new and valuable ideas, and without also feeling that Pattison was a pleasant man to meet in a book than he might have been to his contemporaries in real life. Pattison was the author of the sixth paper in "Essays and Reviews" on "The Tendencies of Religious Thought in England from 1688 to 1750." This, of course, belongs to the period when he threw off the influence of Newman and Pusey. Certainly these "Memoirs" are a contribution to the history of the great ecclesiastical revival of this century, and as such will be interesting reading, and we do not think they will be in any way likely to disturb the religious balance of the reader. They show one thing at least, if nothing more, and that is the exact point at which the "Oxford Movement" went astray, and that was due to the inherent skeptical tendencies of the brothers Newman. It was the agony of irrefragable doubt which drove the cardinal into the arms of Rome.

THE POWER AND AUTHORITY OF SCHOOL OFFICERS AND TEACHERS in the Management and Government of Public Schools and over pupils out of school, as determined by the Courts of the several States. By a member of the Massachusetts Bar. [New York: Harper & Brothers.] pp. 181.

Many years ago, when the New England Lyceum flourished, a distinguished lawyer of Boston was invited to deliver two lectures in a country town. He took for his subjects, "The Law of Husband and Wife," and "The Law of Parent and Child, Master and Apprentice." In a quiet, easy, and familiar way he gave a general outline, illustrated by experiences of his own practice, and a general reference to cases, of these two topics, and probably not one person of his audiences but went away with clearer ideas and better knowledge than before. This little book undertakes to do very much the same thing regarding the relations of teacher and pupil. There are two opposed views regarding common schools, both of which are erroneous. One is the teacher's view, that of absolute power and discretion in regard to school life; the other the parent's and pupil's view, that of a very wide freedom in the exercise of their own preferences. This little treatise shows what is the true condition of things, as determined by judicial decisions. Of course there is some surface conflict of laws, arising from the fact that each State tribunal is independent of those of other States, but the general principles are fairly deducible that the teacher is to be sustained in all regulations not in themselves unreasonable, unless in cases where the reserved and paramount right of the parent comes in. Thus, where there is a choice of studies allowed, the parent is permitted to judge of the child's capacity, but not to interfere so far as to break in upon the orderly working necessary to the progress of the whole school. The general common law principle seems to be "ut res valeat, magis quam pereat," viz., that the great end of properly educating in common the children of a community should be kept in view.

It is not often that we are called upon to notice a reference book so valuable as this "Dictionary of English History." It supplies a real want, long felt, and it has been surprising that we have had to wait so long for it. We often need to refer to some historical subject or event, or to some noted person connected with it, and for any adequate idea of either one or the other, we have been compelled to search through one or more volumes of history, at a considerable loss of time. In this volume the work is done to our hand in a brief, condensed form, and there are few subjects, events, or persons of English history, or rather of the history of Great Britain and Ireland, which are not sufficiently discussed in this volume for purposes of reference, and they are all arranged in alphabetical order. It is, in fact, a dictionary of biographical, chronological, and historical information on the subject of which it treats. It is not an encyclopedia, nor intended to be—some things are necessarily omitted; but it is not often that the general reader will consult it in vain. As a matter of course it is condensed; but it has been done by skilled hands, by those who knew what to omit and what to use, and the very best judgment has been shown in the space proportioned to its topics. Many of the articles are written by specialists, whose names give assurance of accuracy, and besides the article by Bass Ballinger on "Authorities on English History," references and authorities are appended to the other articles. No pains have been spared to make the work complete in itself, and a good index is given of subjects not specially treated. It is a royal octavo volume, printed in double columns, and we can cordially commend it to our readers as a safe book to buy and use, and one whose title is no misnomer. It does what it professes to do, and does it well.

THE CATHARIN'S PORTRAIT. By Alexander Macleod, D.D. [New York: Robert Carter & Brothers.] pp. 37.

"And that he may know these things the better, ye shall call upon him to hear sermons." This sentence out of the address to godparents in the baptismal office almost always brings to our mind the thought that it is incumbent on the minister who utters it to provide sermons for the child when brought. Yet this is no easy thing to do, especially to do it as well as Dr. Macleod has in this volume. Many of them are exceedingly lovely—sweet and touching stories, especially that of "Lizzie Laird," and, what is remarkable, of a very wide range and variety. We have but one criticism to make, and that is that we question the wisdom of telling stories that are not certainly true without due caution to that effect. There are several of the monastic legends which the doctor uses that are very excellent in their way as illustrations or parables, but which we do not think he himself believed ever to have happened. These should be told simply as legends, and not in the same way as the stories of the colliers and peasants whom the doctor knew. A grown-up person makes the distinction and says, "si non e vero, e ben trovato," but a child cannot. In fact our own advice would be to leave out the mediæval legend altogether when it occupies the debatable land between allegory and fact. For instance, the story of the Abbot Trithemius is given exactly as if it were a true one; it is told in the same way as that of the little boy who was tempted to run away from his duty of watching his baby sister. We say this because (with these exceptions) we should advise any rector who cannot furnish his children with sermons to make use of this admirable volume, at any rate to take it as a pattern for constructing others. Once a month, at least, the children have their rights, and it is a great pity that parents and sponsors do not see that these are enforced.

The name of Bishop Gobat was for years a watchword of controversy. There were strong opinions held by English Churchmen as to the propriety of the Anglo-Prussian "Concordat," and the introduction of an English prelate into the field of the Eastern Churches. To one party the canonical and ecclesiastical principle involved was indisputable; to the other it was equally clear that the Christianity of the Eastern Churches in Palestine was in practice a nullity. It is well, therefore, to see what the actual experience of the attempt came to, and how far practical results justified either view.

The life of Bishop Gobat (apart from his position) is certainly one to be read. There is a charming simplicity and earnestness about his own account of himself, which gives reality to what might otherwise seem the conventional language of religion. In contrast with many books we have read upon African Missions, the account of the work in Abyssinia is full of interest. The book is in two parts, the first being entirely autobiographical, the second largely compiled from his journals and letters.

THE SECRET OF DEATH. (From the Sandstr.) With Some Collected Poems. By Edwin Arnold, M.A. Author of "The Light of Asia," etc. [Boston: Robert's Brothers.] pp. 292. Price 81c.

"The Secret of Death" is the leading poem in this volume, but occupies only some thirty odd of the two hundred and fifty pages of the book. The rest is made up of short poems, quite unequal in value, and evidently written at very different times. Many are translations, and some of these are exceedingly spirited. There is a very strong Oriental flavor about the most of them, almost too strong for one whose tastes are not Oriental, and some of the verses have that dreamy "impressionist" vagueness against which we protest, although it is the favorite style of almost all the latest poetry. We believe it to be a mere cover for laziness or weakness of thought in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred. Having said this much, we can conscientiously say that there is also much fine poetry in Mr. Arnold's verses, and while we do not think that, on the whole, this volume equals "The Light of Asia," yet it is pretty sure of public favor.

THE VOCALIST, FOR USE IN Social Assemblies, Seminars, and Graded Schools. By James E. Ryan. [New York: A. S. Barnes & Co. 1885.] pp. 210.

The elements of music given as an introduction to this work are an exposition of the system in use in the public schools of Brooklyn, but so modified as to be in correspondence with staff notation, and there is added to it a series of exercises on the diatonic scale. There are in the book many compositions by well-known masters of music in Germany and England, and it consists largely of part songs for equal voices, solos or chorus, and for both sexes. The selections have good melodies, with appropriate supporting parts within the compass of most voices, and the harmonies are carefully arranged. The words, in some cases, original or adopted, are chosen with reference to the music. Of the hundred selections, twenty are hymns for chapel exercises. The work will serve a useful purpose to the classes for whom it is prepared.

ACROSS THE CHAIN. [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.] pp. 310. Price 41c.

The authoress of this is said to be a Southern lady, and we feel it our duty to speak of her work as remarkably good. It is a striking study of character, and it brings out the points of difference between the Northern and Southern natures with marked skill. But we are most pleased with the high ideal of manly and womanly refinement here insisted upon. The impress of a genuine love of nobleness in thought, word and deed is set upon every line of the story without being exaggerated into any romantic impossibilities. The artistic unfolding of the novel is very well managed. There is no diffuseness, no redundancy, and no attempt at sensational incident. The story is as simply and directly told as if it were a record of actual experience; and it seems to us likely to help in the good work of closing up "the chasm," by giving to both North and South a better idea of each other's best qualities.

MIND READING AND BEYOND. By William A. Hovey. [Boston: Lee & Shepard.] pp. 301.

We are disposed to welcome this as an attempt to submit to a fair and candid examination the mental phenomena involved in magnetism, hypnotism and the like. If there is anything in the facts, they should be treated scientifically; if they are tricks, let them be exposed; if they are delusions, let them be done away; if they are truths in whole or in part, let the true and the false be separated. The only question in our mind as to the statements of the present volume is as to how far they have been colored by a strongly favorable prepossession. They appear to be fairly given by Mr. Hovey, and there is no savor of charlatanism in his pages. Still, we know well the extreme power of a foregone conclusion upon minds not habituated to the study of evidence. Nothing short of demonstration will do in dealing with a matter in which deception, intentional or accidental, is so easy.

THE DIAMOND LOSS, with Other Stories. By Fitz-James O'Brien. Collected and Edited with a Sketch of the Author by William Winter. A New Edition. [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.] Pp. 287. Price 10 cents.

Many of these stories—they are thirteen in number—are well known to the readers of magazines. They are all of that grotesque order in which Poe and Hawthorne wrote, and turn principally upon the possibility of some occult discovery or weird fancy. The best of them is, we think, "The Golden Ingot," which is entirely natural and tragically pathetic. Most of the others are only entertaining because of the wild fancy displayed. All of them are clever, but not likely to take very deep hold of the reader. The sketch of the author's life is an interesting bit of biography, a little glimpse into the rien en Bohème, of which there is probably less now than in the days when O'Brien wrote. He himself was a true son of Bohemia.

QUEER BESS; or, What's in a Name? By Marian Shaw. [New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons.] pp. 301.

"What's in a Name?" fairly describes this story, since it all turns upon the fact that the heroine bears at different times, yet in a perfectly natural manner, two quite unlike names. There is some quite clever writing in this novel, and if it is, as we think, a first attempt, it promises very well. There is a specimen of a school newspaper which is so fairly done that we fancy it is "drawn from the life." We think the conclusion is needlessly protracted, and there are some other marks of unpractised work, but, on the whole, "Queen Bess" is quite above the average of "first attempts."

ROBERT GRABAM'S PROMISE. A Story for Boys. By the Author of "The Wise and West Story." [New York: Robert Carter & Brothers.] pp. 321. Price 11.25.

Old pupils of "Phillips Academy, Andover," will probably without difficulty recognize in "Alertton," where the scene of this story is laid, the home of their school-days. We have only to say that either the writers who picture boy-life from this author's point of view, or the boy-life itself, if accurately described, or both together, are not to our taste. The adult standard is painfully apparent, and the book is therefore unreal. It is a story for boys that we have here, not a story of boys.

GREAT HEART: or, Sermons to Children. By William Wilburforce Newton. [New York: Robert Carter & Brothers.] pp. 348. Price 81.25.

Mr. Newton comes legitimately by the gift of talking well to children. These sermons are founded on "The Pilgrim's Progress." They are rather longer than the measure which seems to us sufficient, and they are quite as secular in tone as is desirable, but they are lively and spirited, and to the point, which is the main thing. When we say "secular," we mean that there are passages intended to raise a laugh, and we doubt whether that is a safe experiment with children.

LITERATURE.

BISHOP LYMAN'S convention address has been printed, for wider circulation, separately from the Journal.

MISS ROSE G. KINGSLEY, who writes on "George Eliot's County" in the Century, is a daughter of Charles Kingsley.

"THINE FOREVER" is the title of a practical, short tract issued by Mr. Whittaker, which the clergy will find serviceable for distribution.

The June number of the Art Age is printed in three colors, and has a portrait head by Miss Eleanor C. Bannister, photo-engraved. The Art Age improves with every number.

In the Unitarian Review for June there are five articles, besides the editor's note-book and the review of current literature. It is ably conducted, and appeals to intelligent readers.

The Rev. Dr. Geo. H. Houghton's sermon, "A Good Degree," delivered at St. Paul's School, on occasion of the ordination to the diaconate of Charles W. Coit, is published by Theo. L. DeVinne & Co. in this city.

"EXPOSITIONS," by Samuel Cox, D.D., late editor of the Expositor, is announced by Mr. Whittaker. The essays are original, and not reprints from the Expositor. Dr. Cox is well known as the author of "Salvator Mundi," and "Expositions" is meeting a large sale in London.

The Indian Rights Association has published at Philadelphia their action in reference to Crow Creek Reservation, Dakota, with opinions of the press West and East as to its occupation by white settlers. We like the name of the association, Indian Rights. It may yet bring the topic.

The July Eclectic Magazine has for a frontispiece an elegant engraving, "The Neapolitan Girl." There are twenty selections from fourteen of the current periodicals and reviews.

Two of the articles are upon General Gordon. The Eclectic gives multum in parvo, and will make a pleasant companion for the country side.

The July Magazine of American History is almost entirely devoted to reminiscences of the late war. There are illustrated papers by Generals Stone, Jordan, Meredith Read, Vele, Col. Jones, Geo. R. Gilson, Horatio King, and others, and it is a number of unusual interest. For a frontispiece it has a portrait of President Lincoln.

"The Witness of the Church to Christian Faith," a volume of sermons by the Rev. James Malchabey, D.D., one of the assistant-ministers of Trinity church, is announced as in press by James Felt & Co., and will appear early in the fall. It will endeavor to show that "Christian truth, and that alone, is the salvation of the world," and will be found to be both able and timely.

The Atlantic for July is one of its brightest numbers. Holmes contributes to it, and Whittier writes for it, called "The Two Elizabeths." (Miss) Charles Egbert Cradock—the recently discovered identity of this author lends additional interest to her writings—contributes two chapters to her new serial, "The Prophet of the Great Smoky Mountains." Nora Perry, Mrs. Oliphant, Olive Thorne Miller, Charles Dudley Warner, and Edward Everett Hale have all something of interest to say in their happiest vein.

St. NICHOLAS is always welcome. To establish the reputation of a magazine as bright, entertaining, useful, and instructive is one thing; to keep the magazine up to this same standard is quite another—a serious problem, not easily solved. But the editors of St. Nicholas are well up in literary arithmetic of this nature, and in consequence the question as to how the reputation and charm of St. Nicholas shall be maintained each month is ably answered. The illustrations, stories, and verses continue to be the best.

L'ART, No. 504, has an account of the Salon of 1885, by Eugene Véron, and the third bronze gate of the Baptistery of Florence, by Charles Perkins. The latter paper has nine illustrations of the sculptural scenes carved upon the gate, and the former a number of reproductions of paintings in the Salon, two of them full page. The etching of the number is by Daniel Mordant, from a picture "Prayer," by Jean Béraud. No. 505 continues Eugene Véron's account of the Salon of 1885, with two full-page illustrations and others besides, and there is an etching by A. Masson, after L'Homme a la Manche Jaune of Th. Ribot. Charles Yriarte has a paper on the Chateau Chantilly, illustrated. With these two numbers of L'Art came the Courrier de L'Art for May, which would seem indispensable to one who desires to be informed about current art in Europe. One of the numbers of the Courrier contains a catalogue of the pictures in the Salon.

"Zoroaster" is a strong novel, and is to be the best of Mr. Crawford's writings. It would be difficult to point to a modern novel in which the widely differing qualities of human character are more powerfully and really portrayed than in the persons of Nehahai and Atoom, Darius and Zoroaster.—The Churchman.

A record of extraordinary achievements... An important contribution to the world's history, all the more valuable as being written by the man who has himself made that portion of history.—Graphic, London.

The great book of the season... The story of the romantic narrative of the discovery and founding of the Congo State.—JOSEPH HARTON in the Boston Herald.

Quite as much as the most thrilling romance, the book claims attention from the first page to the last. Literary World, London.

Thoughtful and ably-written volumes, which combine with the fascination of stories of travel among strange people humanitarian lessons fraught with good for the scattered tribes of Africa.—London Daily Chronicle.

Mr. Stanley's work on the Congo may justly be regarded as the book of the season... No other volumes which have appeared within the present year comprise the history of so many, so important, or such varied achievements.—London Standard.

Proves to the full as vivid, as graphic, as interesting as anything we have had from the pen of the most daring and intrepid explorer. The reader will turn over its pages with delight.—Full Mail Gazette, London.

The book is at once a romance and a mastery history of the most romantic undertaking our generation has known.—London Daily Telegraph. Sufficient in itself to have founded a great reputation.—London Daily News.

IN MEMORY

OF THE MEN WHOSE CAUSE IS DEAD, BUT WHOSE DEEDS LIVE ON.

A Memorial Ode Delivered at Norfolk, Va.,
 Memorial Day, June 14th, 1865, by the Rev. B. D.
 Tucker, Rector of Old St. Paul's Protestant Episcopal Church.

[PUBLISHED BY SPECIAL REQUEST.]

Vineti Sed Victores.

From hearts of men, from off the country's face,
 Whose beauty once the stains of blood did mar,
 Long years of peace have labored to efface
 The cruel tracks and vestiges of war.

Each Spring has brought its tender wealth of green
 To hide the gory battlements of earth, Till now the barren mounds, that once had been
 The place of death, to flowers and grass give birth.

The dusty plains once tramped by the feet Of angry hosts, whose battle shout was heard
 Above the cannon's din, are fields of wheat,
 Or meadows where we list the song of bird.

On ships that sail the seas, in churches' busy marts, in country and in town,
 They meet and greet, with kindly words and smiles.
 Who once in battle faced, with warlike frown.

To God be praise! for Passion yields her sway,
 And cloud no longer veils the sky above,
 As storm to calm, and night to day gives way,
 So war gives place to peace, and hate to love!

Gone is the bitterness that once we knew,
 Tho' still the woe is traced in many eyes;
 Gone are the dreams of yore, and ended, too,
 The old heroic life of sacrifice!

Gone, like a meteor thro' the cloudless skies,
 The hopes with which we sought the stubborn fray;

Gone, like the music when the singer dies,
 The fancies which beguiled us for a day!

Gone, like a harvest swept by cruel hail,
 The hard-won fruits of each victorious fight—
 Aye, country, flag, and cause! gone, like a sail
 That dots the seas, and passes out of sight!

Is this, then, all that's left—these many graves,
 Which, far and wide, are found in mount and plain,
 In valleys fair, and where the ocean waves
 Sing requiem—do these alone remain?

Nay, surely, nay, but like as Samson drew
 The honey from the lion he had slain,
 So from our lion, war, we, comrades, too,
 May draw the strong and sweet, ah! not in vain.

'Twas not in vain that these undying men
 With Lee and Jackson charged thro' storms of lead;
 A page they wrote, with sword more strong than pen,
 Which long shall teach in dnty's path to tread!

'Twas not in vain that these in camp and field,
 And women brave as they, 'mid dark'ning skies, Endured and suffered, would not cringe, nor yield,
 But gave their all, and taught of sacrifice!

More fair these fruits we gather from defeat Than some which grows on Vict'ry's highest tree,
 That duty's self, that sacrifice is sweet—
 Ah! this to learn is more than victory!

This much is left of all our fateful strife,
 These names that shine in Honor's glorious sky,
 These dead to teach us how to live our life,
 Or show us how, if duty call, to die!

And now, because they dying left this gift
 Of names untarnished and of memories bright,
 Whose glory made in leaden skies a rift,
 And bathed fore'er our Southern land in light;

Because they give us all they could, we bring This tribute wrought of flow'rs, of verse, of tears,
 And vow to keep from dark Oblivion's wing
 Their names and deeds thro' all the changing years.

BY ROSA NOUICHETTE CAREY.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Down on the Stairs.

"She has an eye that can speak Though her tongue were silent."
 —Aaron Hill.

"Sometimes when hard need has pressed me
 To bow down where I despise,
 I have read stern words of counsel
 In those sad reproachful eyes."
 —Adelaide Anne Proctor.

Meanwhile the shirt-making progressed most satisfactorily; but, alas, Belle was not among the workers.

Ever since the day of her hysterical attack a gradual, and at first scarcely perceptible change had come over her; the strange wanness and shlow that Rotha had noticed became more marked; day by day she grew thinner and paler; the pain in the side was almost constant now. Rotha sometimes met her on the stairs laboring as though for breath. Now and then Mary started and changed color at the sound of her sister's hard dry cough. She and the vicar were growing seriously uneasy; but still Belle, rigid in her waywardness, would have it that nothing ailed her.

"I am only so tired—so very tired," she would say when Mary with tears in her eyes implored her to spare herself. "I think I took cold that night at church. I shall have to give up evening service this bitter weather, that is all."

Poor Belle! Evening service was not the only thing she gave up. One by one her duties were laid aside; Rotha had her dis-triction; she never went among her poor people.

"When the spring comes I must take up my work again," she said to Rotha. But she never told her that the day before she had tried to creep to the nearest cottage and had failed.

She was more alone than ever now.
 Working made the pain in her side worse, and after a time she found it impossible to conceal her sufferings. She would lie for hours on the little square couch in the drawing-room, looking out vacantly at the blue tops of the Leatham hills; but she never cared for Mary or Rotha to keep her company. The morbid reserve that seemed inherent in her nature grew upon her with indulgence. She never seemed to talk much to any one but Robert.

"It only makes me cough," she said fretfully, when Mary's affectionate re-proaches were unusually urgent. "I am so tired, and I want to be quiet and get rested for the evening."

"But you are always tired, Belle!" Mary would reply. "It seems to me you are more tired every day. I wish Robert could see you now; he would not think that Austin and I were making a fuss about nothing."

Belle shivered slightly at the mention of Robert.

By what superhuman exertions she continued to blind him was known best to herself. He was the only one who was ignorant of the real state of the case. Mary, with all her efforts, failed to enlighten him.

"Belle has never been strong," he would say, "and this cold she has caught hangs about her and keeps her weak;" and he would go about his daily work quite cheerfully. "She will be better when this damp raw weather is over," he would think as he went to and fro through the slushy streets.
 He always believed Belle's version of herself.

"She was better," she would assure him,
 "much better, only she was so tired, and her cough was still troublesome." He knew nothing about those long mornings and afternoons on the couch. She had always a bright color of an evening. No matter how ill she had been that day, she would creep down from her room to meet him, looking lovelier than ever.

"Mary tells me you have been worse today," he would say sometimes, looking at her anxiously; but she always contrived to evade his inquiries. As she sat talking to him he would wonder at the brilliancy of her beauty. How was he to know that her eyes were bright with repressed fever, and that it was only his presence that stimulated her to such exertion? How was he to know? She was never pale or silent with him.

She was always so ready with her excuses, too. "Where is your opal ring?" he asked her once, rather reproachfully, and she had returned him an evasive answer;
 she never told him the ring had dropped so repeatedly from her wasted hand that she feared to lose it. Soon after this she borrowed a certain old-fashioned keeper that Mary wore on her little finger; the next day the opals shone in their accustomed place.

With her strong will she was blinding herself and him; she would go up-stairs to her own room when her lover had said good-night, carefully closing the door behind her; but if any one had seen her holding on with her frail strength to the balustrade and coughing at every step! The vicarage walls were unapparently thick. Belle never spoke of the slow torture of those long wakeful nights, of the restlessness and burning fever that consumed her, and so no one knew why nature took its revenge in added prostration in the morning. Mary declared that anxiety about her sister was aging her. One day she came down half crying to the vicar to avow her belief that Belle was using rouge to deceive her lover.

Rotha, who was doing some copying work in the study, quite started at the idea.

"She was as white as that cloth, quite ghastly ten minutes ago," reiterated Mary; "and I gave her some sal volatile, but when Robert came in just now she begged me quite in a flurry to go down to him, and when she came into the room a few minutes afterwards her cheeks had a fixed red in them, quite a spot of color, just as though they were painted. You know yourself, Austin, Belle never had a high color."

"No, Mary, you were the blooming one," returned the vicar lightly. "Do you remember when I used to compare you to a pink apple-blossom?" and then as she persisted in her uneasy suspicion he grew serious, and muttered something about "hectic" and "fever." By and by he told Mary that he was determined to speak very firmly to Belle, and insist on her seeing a doctor.

Rotha was obliged to leave early that evening, but the next morning she learnt from Mrs. Ord that the vicar's firmness had been unavailing. Belle seemed to have a rooted antipathy to the very idea. "Austin had been very stern," Mary added, "and Belle had been hysterical." Next day the doctor had come to the house by the vicar's express orders, and Belle had locked herself up in her room, and had refused to see him, and the vicar was very angry.

Robert was angry, too. He thought it very childish of Belle; but he added in the same breath that in his opinion Mary and Austin were teasing her unnecessarily. "If she were really ill she would be only too glad to see a doctor," he said. "Why not leave her alone a little? It is this dreary weather that tries her. I really thought she looked much better last evening till Austin upset her; he had no right to issue his commands like that."

Mary, as she heard him, could have wrung her hands over his blindness and her sister's obstinacy. In her eyes it was little short of suicidal; but Rotha, though she would not have hinted at it for worlds, had a dim suspicion of the real state of the case. She was sure that Belle's refusal to see a doctor of her brother-in-law's providing was based upon far different motives, and that she knew more about herself than any one guessed.

One raw November day she had come upon Belle within a stone's throw of the Blackscarf Infirmary, and Belle had a little white parcel in her hand very much resembling a bottle of medicine. Rotha had not seemed to notice, however; but shortly after she had questioned one of the nurses whom she knew, and had learnt that Miss Clinton often visited the infirmary, and that to her knowledge she was more than once closeted a long time with Mr. Greenock, the house surgeon, so that it was very probable she was on the list of out-patients.

Rotha would have given words to have shared this knowledge with her friends, but on reflection she dared not; her quick intuition had instantly divined that there was a twofold motive for this secrecy. Doubtless, in the first instance, Belle's unselfish generosity had induced her to take this step, fearing that her brother-in-law would incur serious expense by her constant ill health; the other motive, too, it was not difficult to guess.

Rotha was sure that Belle was uneasy about herself; at times there had been a haggardness and despondency about her for which there would seem no adequate reason. Rotha noticed she never spoke of the future. There seemed no buoyancy of hope in her life when Robert talked of the summer and of the pleasant holiday he hoped to have, and how he meant to take her and Mary for a week to ramble along the glens of Burnley-upon-sea. Burnley-upon-sea, where the cows walked over the sands at evening, and the long green woods stretched dimly down to the shore. Belle would turn away her head to hide the tears in her eyes; she would choke something down as she tried to return a cheerful answer.

"Do sing something lively," she would say of an evening when Mrs. Carruthers sat down to play one of her glorious symphonies; a terrible weariness would be on her when Meg sang some of her old favorites—"Eve's Lament" or "Angels ever bright and fair"—but no one could get Meg to lay aside her sacred music now. Rotha would take her place sometimes and sing old-fashioned ballads in her fresh young voice; it came somewhat flatly after Meg's grand music, to be sure. "It is rather like hearing the twittering of birds after service," the vicar would say in his droll way, but I rather think they all loved the girl's voice. Belle would ask faintly for "Auld Robin Gray" or "My mother bids me bind my hair" the last she was never tired of hearing. "Those are not very gay songs, Bella darling," Robert would say with a smile; he rather preferred Meg's selections. Rotha would go back to the music-stool again and again; she knew why Meg's anthems jarred on the sick nerves. What if no chord of Belle's nature thrilled in unison with their sublime lessons of faith and resignation, still clinging as she was with a breaking heart to the objects of her earthly love?

"Will any one sing?" It grew a habit with her to say this, and so it came to pass that Rotha no longer needed the vicar's invitation; and even Robert looked to her presence of an evening as a necessary ingredient to Belle's pleasure—Belle, who, since the day of their reconciliation, had never repelled her advances.

Rotha was able to watch her very closely therefore, and this was the result of her watching. She was convinced that up to a certain point Belle knew the truth about herself, and that she was bent on concealing her knowledge for some purpose of her own. Rotha shuddered at the thought of those dreary pilgrimages to the infirmary; she used to wonder how Belle got there. Mr. Greenock had the reputation of being a very clever man, but, as he said himself, he was no alarmist. It was just possible, therefore, he might confirm Belle in her blindness, and that she might scarcely know the extent of her danger. But if this were not so, and Belle really understood the grave nature of her symptoms, she might possibly be deriving great benefit from the proper remedies, which the surgeon's skill would be sure to devise.

To betray this secret of Belle's seemed to Rotha perfectly useless. She knew her quite well enough by this time to be sure that such interference on her part would never be forgiven. Not that such a motive alone would have influenced her; but she knew that if she told Mrs. Ord, Mary would at once inform the vicar and Robert. Every one would be up in arms; Mr. Greenock would be consulted; the real nature of the mysterious malady would certainly be known; but the result would be such a fit of angry obstinacy on Belle's part that it would be doubtful where the mischief would end. No, no; she must let things take their course a little longer; if matters grew worse, she might take upon herself to speak.

Rotha's intention was good, but it was the reasoning of inexperience. She was ignorant of the nature of Belle's disease; it never occurred to her that contact with the sharp northern breezes was as injurious to her physical frame as the secret strain on her spirits was to her mental frame. It might be that the doctor's skill would be brought to bear in vain on the overwrought mind and body, reacting on each other so lamentably. If Rotha had spoken out, doubtless the result would have been exactly as she prophesied, and there would have been much bitter work to go through with Belle, but it would have answered better in the end; a great deal of precious time would not have been lost, and Robert Ord would have been spared the heavy remorse that was to embitter his life for so long.

But, if Rotha made this mistake, she was nobly to atone for it; her secret uneasiness and a few words that Mrs. Ord had dropped in her trouble led her to form all sorts of impracticable and generous projects for Belle's relief; till at last, one of those appearing rather more tangible and worthy of trial than the others, it was determined to put it to the proof without delay.

"If things are allowed to go on like this," Mrs. Ord had said to her, "I shall not have a sister long; Belle will go into a decline."

And it was during the long, sorrowful conversation that followed these words that Rotha proposed that change of scene and a milder climate should be tried for Belle.

"If I can only get your brother-in-law's consent," finished Rotha, "the thing can be done without delay. She will not listen to such a plan from us, I know, but a word from him will do it."

"Yes; if he will only say the word," sighed Mary.

"He will if you put it before him properly; could not the vicar speak to him, dear Mrs. Ord? He might tell him that we would go wherever he thought best—the Isle of Wight, or Devonshire, or even the south of France, and if you liked Laurie might go with us too;" for just now Mary chose to believe that Laurie was delicate.

"Oh, Rotha, how good you are!" said the mother, gratefully, and then there was an instant's silence, during which Mary turned over the project in her mind; in her eyes it seemed without a single flaw.

"But I shall never dare to speak to Robert," she said, shaking her head mournfully. "I have no influence over him now. The time was when he would listen to a word from 'Mother Mary,' as he called me; that was when Belle and he were first engaged, and I used to think him the dearest fellow in the world; but now—oh, Rotha, I never saw a man so altered;" and Mary looked so sad and so unlike herself that Rotha hastened to console her.

"Never mind about speaking to him," she said; "perhaps it would be better for me to do the whole thing myself; a stranger can sometimes put a thing more strongly, and I think he is too just to let his personal dislike interfere with Belle's good."

"But supposing he does not consider it for her good?" interrupted Mary; she was very despondent about the whole affair. "He is as blind now as a man in his proper senses can be, and he is just as likely to throw cold water on your generous offer as mine. Talk of pride—the proudest Ord that ever lived could not hold a candle to him."

"Never mind, I will try," returned Rotha, bravely; she was very frightened at the thought of the task she had undertaken, but she would not hear of cold water for a moment. "I suppose I would as soon take a hull by the horns," she finished, with an attempt at a smile; "but I mean to carry it through."

Rotha spoke of her plan very quietly in discussing it with Mrs. Ord, but it was the greatest sacrifice she had made in her life. Kirby was just now especially dear to her, and the thought of leaving it, perhaps for months, was very bitter; it was simply banishment from all she loved, and that was not all—the charge she contemplated was in itself somewhat overwhelming; how was she to nurse a person of Belle's unhappy disposition? and yet she would be responsible for such nursing. Belle was at all times difficult to manage, and Rotha had very honest doubts as to her own powers of management.

"Perhaps, when we are alone together, she might be more sociable and allow me to do things for her," she said to herself, as she pondered over these difficulties; "but anyhow I am the only one who can go with her. I wish I were more fit for such a responsibility."

"Poor generous-hearted Rotha—but it was just these things which tested the girl's nobleness—the basis of her whole nature was self-sacrifice."

The woman who, if she had had the power would most certainly have had the magnanimity to boggar herself for her enemies would assuredly not scruple at any personal self-denial that might benefit her friends. To see a duty clearly and to try and perform it was a natural sequence with Rotha. It was this singleness of aim, this great-heartedness—if there be such a word—that first won the vicar's respect for her. He told Mary one day that she was at once the weakest and the strongest woman he had ever seen.

It had come into her heart to return good for evil in her dealings with Robert Ord, and no amount of ill usage upon his part could move her from her purpose. Robert Ord's pride literally shrank from the scorching of her coals of fire; her gentleness was pitiless cruelty to him. It was this recognition of her strength for good that brought out all his latent obstinacy. It grew to be a neck-and-neck race between them; but as the stars of heaven fought against Siera, so circumstances fought against Robert Ord and forced him to succumb at last to a woman's hand—when his will was divided against itself, and the man sat down in his weakness and gloried in it.

Rotha said nothing about her regrets to Mary. A little shrinking consciousness kept her silent on that point; but she put the whole scheme in such a bright light that Mrs. Ord was quite cheered. The only difficulty was in the impossibility of Rotha ever finding an opportunity for a private talk with Robert. He never came to the vicarage till tea was over, and then he went straight into the drawing-room, where they were all assembled. Rotha could neither seek him at his own house nor ask him to Bryn.

"I am sure I don't know how we are to manage it," said Mrs. Ord helplessly, "unless you are to waylay him in the passage;" but Rotha had a better plan than that. She knew he came home from Thornborough on Saturday at an early hour in the afternoon, and she resolved to go and meet him.

"I think the sea-wall would be a better place of rendezvous than the draughty passage," she said, trying to look very brave; but she felt rather like a mouse trying on a lion's skin—it was such a gigantic purpose, and then the skin was such a tough one.

How she hated the very thought of Saturday; but she was not going to flinch for all that. Every time Belle coughed she felt convinced her plan was a wise one.

"She wants sunshine and change of air," she thought. "It is so dreadfully bleak up here."

At the appointed hour she was pacing up and down the sea-wall like a sentinel on duty, and looking not very unlike a mouse—with plenty of soft fur outside and many inward shivers within. She had a fresh shiver every time she saw a tall man in the distance, and then she chafed and grew hot because he was late. She knew that he always came home by the way of the sea-wall. She had kept a strict look-out, but yet she feared she had missed him. No; there he was, in his brown overcoat, looking straight before him, as he always did, as though he were challenging some distant object.

Of course he stopped to accost her, and of course Rotha stopped too; the time had gone by when he would pass her with a slight bow; since then there had been much surface intercourse between them, and Robert was always extremely civil—he was very civil now, exceedingly so.

"It is rather a cold afternoon for a walk," he remarked, with a smile. Rotha, when she was more than usually provoked, always said Robert had a special smile for her. When asked to describe it, she would turn round and demand "if you had seen an icicle trying to thaw—and failing?" she would add when particularly severe. This frosty smile was a matter of course, but that he should add that she looked pale and tired was rather surprising—it almost took her breath away.

"I suppose I am somewhat tired," she returned hurriedly; "I have been waiting for you such a long time." It was his turn now to look astounded.

"Waiting for me! Is anything the matter?" as a sudden thought turned him chill.

"Anything the matter—no, not more than usual. It is only a slight favor that I am going to ask you. Do you mind returning by the sands, there are so many people about here?" She spoke in a quick, nervous manner, as she often did to him, but her movement left him no choice. When a lady tells a gentleman that there are so many people about, he may be sure she has something very important for his private ear; and therefore, much as he disliked having business with Miss Maturin, he could do no less than assist her civilly down the sandy bank and wait for her to explain herself; he could not well remonstrate in words, whatever he might do in manner.

"Don't you find this soft sand very unpleasant?" he remarked in a voice that told Rotha very plainly that he did. He had promised Belle an afternoon's reading, and he had brought a book by her favorite author, and this lengthened detour by the sea did not please him at all; but Rotha pointed to a crisp line lying apparently right out to sea. "The sand is quite hard and firm out there, and the tide is going out. I never walk in these sandy ruts if I can help it," and she began to walk very quickly and decidedly towards a range of salt-water pools with rugged stepping stones thrown in here and there. Robert Ord, as he followed her, felt compelled to admire the agility with which she sprang over the slippery rocks. "Now we are on terra firma, and I can talk," she said as they gained the slip of sand. They were on a long island now; the waves came lapping in with a little splash and gurgle; a gray line of sea closed in everywhere; the sky overhead had a faint red light in it. In the west a great crimson sun hung like a ball of fire; a rough wind swept over the surface of the slungish pools; black driets of seaweed lay everywhere. Rotha, walking very swiftly, turned her face to him and began:

"I darsay you thnk it very strange of me to waylay you like this; I never can do things as other people do, however much I try." Then Robert essayed another frosty smile—a gentleman cannot always say the truth to a lady; nevertheless, he thought it very strange indeed.

"I had no other opportunity of speaking to you alone, and every day is so important, and then one cannot ask such a favor as that in a moment."

"I thought you said it was a slight one," he retorted. He could not resist the pleasure of taking up her words, though he knew it made her nervous—it made her nervous now.

"I suppose it is a great one, after all," she returned very humbly; "for I am going to ask you to entrust something very precious to me. Mr. Ord—we are all growing so very anxious about Belle."

Now, if he had not flurried her so, Rotha would hardly have constructed her sentence in that way. One cannot pick and choose one's words in a flurry. Of course he took umbrage at her calling Miss Clinton Belle, and still more at her using the pronoun "we." "She seems determined to make herself one of the family," was his inward comment. "I wonder if she thinks we are all as blind as he is," which enigmatical thought must be unriddled by and by.

"About Belle?" he repeated, elongating every letter till it seemed a separate syllable—"anxious about B-e-l-l-e?"

Rotha, who felt she had compromised herself in some way, went on hurriedly, "Is it possible, Mr. Ord, that you do not see how really ill she is? I know she tries to conceal her sufferings from you; but, indeed, you must not allow yourself to be so blinded." Her tone was very earnest, almost solemn, but Robert interrupted her angrily:

"Blinded! That is just what Mary says. How one woman will use another woman's words! If you listen to all Mary's exaggerations you will have enough to do, Miss Maturin. I suppose she has asked you to come and tell me this; but I warn you that I am not easily frightened."

"I can see that you consider it a liberty," returned Rotha, in a low voice. "You are always so ready to misunderstand me, Mrs. Ord has not sent me; I have come of my own accord, because I thought that a stranger"—laying emphasis on the word—"might more easily open your eyes."

"You mean cure my blindness?" returned Robert sarcastically.

"Yes, if you prefer that term," and then she hesitated for a moment, as though at a loss how to proceed. "You are making my task a very difficult one for me; but I expected that. I knew you would resent my interference; but I have begun to love Miss Clinton very dearly, and I have grown to be so very, very sorry for her that I could no longer keep silence."

"Belle ought to be very much obliged," began Rotha, in the same sarcastic tone; but Rotha stopped him.

"Belle understands me now. She will know I mean kindly. Mr. Ord, please do this in my favor. Try to forget that it is I who am speaking to you, and listen to me, if it be only for her sake. I do fear—I begin to fear greatly—that she is more ill than you believe her to be."

"There I differ from you," he returned decidedly. "Miss Maturin, I put it to your good sense—if Belle were as ill as you make out, would she refuse to see a doctor?"

Rotha paused. What would he say if he knew that Belle was an out-patient of the Blackcar Infirmary?

"I don't think your criterion is a good one," she replied at last. "Miss Clinton is one who would endure a martyrdom rather than own her own sufferings. I have heard of certain animals who always hide away from their kind when they are wounded. I think Miss Clinton would do the same."

"She is not a woman who complains if her finger aches," returned Robert sharply. Rotha sighed at his evident incredulity.

"No; she never complains. You are right there. It is only we who have watched her know that she has sleepless nights; that she eats next to nothing; that the pain in her side is at times infernal; and that she can get no rest by night and day from her harassing cough. Mr. Ord, you say you are not easily frightened; I think you would be if you saw how ghastly she looks sometimes."

"Mary has contrived to frighten you, that is certain," he returned somewhat impatiently. "Poor Belle! I don't think she would thank you for exaggerating all her little symptoms to me, Miss Maturin. I am sure you mean it kindly; but you do not know Belle as well as I do. She has never been strong."

"Never, Mr. Ord!"

"No, not for many years. I suppose circumstances have somewhat tried her; but she never lost her spirits so completely till this summer. To add to her depression she has a bad feverish cold. I think that is about the long and short of it."

Rotha shook her head.

"You have not accounted for the pain in her side, Mr. Ord."

"She has had that for years," he returned eagerly. "It is only rather worse lately. You talk of her sleepless nights and loss of appetite. Belle never was a good sleeper, she is nervous, too, and her close confinement to the house these last few weeks has destroyed her appetite. Her malady is a bad feverish cold, you may depend upon it."

"Cannot you induce her to see a doctor?" pleaded Rotha. Like Mary, she could have wrung her hands over his blindness.

"By and by," was the somewhat evasive answer.

Then, in despair, Rotha tried upon another tack.

"I think Blackcar does not suit her," she said presently; "these northern winds are so piercing." And Rotha gave a little shiver.

"That is because you are not acclimated," was the response. "Belle has lived here more than half her life. She likes a bracing atmosphere; I have often heard her say so."

"People do not know what is best for them," said Rotha quickly. "One may get uneasy even about a feverish cold. I will not heat about the bush any more, Mr. Ord, for it seems that we can never agree. I am not very old, and I do not understand nursing; but, nevertheless, I am going to ask you to trust Miss Clinton to me for a little while."

"To you?" he repeated in a tone of displeased astonishment.

"Yes; to me. I wanted Mrs. Ord to tell you all about our plans, and she would not; she thought I ought to speak to you myself. We would go anywhere you wished, Mr. Ord—to Ventnor or Torquay, or to the south of France; it does not matter where, so that you will let her go. I promise you I would care for her; I would indeed, as though she were my own sister."

"This is a very extraordinary proposal," muttered Robert, and then he walked on in displeased silence. Would she never understand that he loathed her gifts and her kindness? He knew all about Tyler & Tyler's now. She was going to surfeit them with her patronage—them, the Ords! It would not be too much to say that the coal-bill literally suffocated him; and now she wanted to extend her patronage to him and Belle. Belle's ill health was to make his life a burthen to him; she would take her to the south of France, anywhere—to Madeira, perhaps, or Mentone. What was money and time to her?

"Well?" said Rotha, wearily. She had only been a short half-hour with him, but her face was utterly changed, the freshness and dimples all faded—she looked, as she felt, sick at heart; they had passed the chain of pools now and were toiling up the sandy ruts by the rabbit-warren. "Well?" she reiterated, and then he forced himself to speak.

"I cannot say that I quite approve of your plan," he returned coldly; "but, all the same, I feel I ought to thank you."

"Why do you not approve of it?" she inquired; then again he was silent.

"Is it because you are afraid to trust Miss Clinton to my care—that you are unwilling to part with her? Mr. Ord, I did not think you could be so selfish."

That stung him in a moment.

"You have no right to say that," he returned angrily. "I am not thinking of myself. Miss Clinton may go if she please."

"Do you think she will go against your wishes?"

"You must take your chance of that," he replied coldly; "I shall certainly not argue against my conscience. I do not believe Miss Clinton to be as ill as you and Mary make out. I suppose I have my own opinion, and my opinion is that her disease is partly mental. I don't think a prolonged absence from those she loves best, and the society of strangers"—again a stress on the word—"will conduce materially to her well-being; but I have no objection to her trying it."

"You have every objection, you mean," exclaimed Rotha indignantly; she could not quite keep her temper—never had he been so provoking. "Why do you not say at once that none of your belongings shall ever be entrusted to my care? Why not speak out plainly and tell me this?"

"Because I cannot be so churlish to a lady. Miss Maturin, why will you always force me to say unpleasant things? You know that nothing will induce me to accept a favor at your hands; but, as you choose to accuse me of selfishness, I shall certainly not stand in Belle's light; she may go with you if she like."

"Do you think she will go without a word from you? One word will do it, remember; she trusts me now. Mr. Ord, you have made me so angry that I do not know how to entreat you; yet for Belle's sake I would entreat you; if I could, to say that word."

"You may spare your entreaties," he replied, still more coldly; "for I shall certainly not persuade her. How do I know whether such a course will be for her good? Miss Maturin, I cannot help it if you and Mary will misunderstand my motives."

"I understand you," she repeated sadly. "I feel as though I have known you for a hundred years, and that in all those hundred years you had never said a kind word to me, as you never will—as I feel you never will."

"Another home truth," he replied bitterly. Her reproach seemed to sting him with sudden pain; his brow grew darker as they went toiling up among the sand-hills of the warren; now and then Rotha stumbled wearily over the grassy ruts.

"How tired I am!" she said suddenly, with a tremble of the lip like a child; "but then you always tire me so."

"I am sorry to hear it," he replied, coldly. "Pray allow me to offer you my arm," and he extended it as he spoke, but he was not prepared for the fire that flashed from her eyes.

"I would rather walk till I dropped—till I died," she returned, "than take your arm."

Her face was crimson with shame when she had said it; she was hot and cold all over; that she should be betrayed into passion with him, that she should have spoken to one of them in that way! Oh, if she could only throw her arms round Mary's neck and confess her sin; she was so miserable, so very miserable. Robert had made her no answer; he had dropped his arm and was walking a little way apart. What would she have said if she had known that he liked her all the better for the speech? It was as though an angry dove had suddenly flown into his face and startled him. It was her unchanging gentleness that had always goaded him so; it made him feel so desperately in the wrong. Yes; he was sure he liked her the better for her petulance. When he next spoke his voice was quite gentle.

"I think you have had your say," he returned, with a smile that was not at all frosty; "supposing, as you are tired, that we go home, it is getting quite dark now." Then Rotha turned her hot face to him very humbly.

"I think I should ask you to forgive me, if there were any hope of your doing so," she said, with the sweet dignity that belonged to her.

"There is nothing to forgive," he returned quietly; "I like you all the better for your speech; I deserved it for provoking you. You and I never can get on together, Miss Maturin; we are always making each other sore; but I had no right to be so savage with you just now."

He wanted to hear her speak again, but she only gave him an odd, wistful look, full of yearning pain. Why was it that, with all her happiness, she longed so intensely for this man to be her friend? And he—did he really hate her as much as he thought he did? Was this bitter antagonism, this strife of words, bred only out of his hatred and his pride?

He wanted her to speak again, and yet he carped at her every word; in one short half-hour he had run the gauntlet of his passion; he was even more fiercely weary than she.

"I will mention your plan to Belle when I get home," he said, trying to rouse her from her apathy.

Her white face and weary bearing seemed to reproach him more every moment; that cursed temper of his—why could he not keep his sarcastic tongue within bounds? That very patronage that irritated him so was meant kindly. She looked so footsore and tired that if he dared he would have offered his arm again. Once he did put out his hand to save her from a deep rut, but she shook off his touch almost unconsciously. "Perhaps Belle had better give her answer herself," he continued still more gently, as he noticed the movement.

"No," answered Rotha, looking hopelessly across the long dim waste that lay before her; "there is no need for any talk between her and me. I have promised Mrs. Ord to come up this evening, and then you can tell me yourself." The plan had lost all its interest to her now.

There was very little more talk between them, and at the gates of Bryn they parted. Rotha told Meg she was tired to death, and shortly afterwards went up to her own room, and Robert went to the vicarage and sat down beside Belle, but he did not at once open his book.

"I have something to tell you first," he said, and then and there he told her of Rotha's plan.

"How kind—how very kind!" murmured Belle, and a faint color came to her faded cheek—a touch of the old lovely color; this new thoughtfulness on Rotha's part filled her with astonishment and gratitude. As Robert talked, a feeling of hopefulness crept into her heart—might it really be that the disease could be arrested? She had heard of wonderful cures at Mentone; it was a long way certainly, but if he wished it, Rotha was right when she told Robert Ord that one word from him would do it.

Robert had repeated Rotha's words very correctly, and no one could have found fault with his manner, although it might have been slightly deficient in warmth. He put before Belle all the advantages and disadvantages of the scheme as he saw them himself; this thing was practicable and worthy of consideration, but another would not do for a moment.

"Now I must leave you to decide for yourself," he said; and Belle, waking up from a rose-colored dream, missed a certain enthusiasm in his voice.

"But what do you wish, Robert?" she asked, looking full at him. "Of course I shall not go without your consent."

"You have my consent, certainly," he returned, but his manner was decidedly cold.

"And your approval, I suppose? I mean that you wish me to go."

"Nay, Belle, that is putting it too strongly, my dear. Of course I cannot be enthusiastic at the thought of our being separated perhaps for months, but if you think it will be of benefit to your health, I am very willing for you to try it, and doubtless Miss Maturin will take good care of you; but it is a long way."

His voice was very affectionate, but Belle understood him in a moment.

"He does not care about accepting such a favor from her," she thought; "but she is kind, very kind. You are right," she said aloud, "it is a long way; and—no, no—I cannot go!" Her eyes grew feverish, and for a moment she held his hand convulsively between her own.

"But, Belle!" he remonstrated.

"No, no; I have decided. I can see you do not wish it in your heart. I never meant to go away from you—never, Bertie. Let us talk of it any more, dear; now read to me a little because my head aches so."

He could not refuse her, and so he opened the book; but, as he read, the sentences were meaningless to him. Do what he would, he could not feel easy with himself. She had told him that one word from him would do it, and he knew what she meant; but he also knew that no such word had been spoken. All the time he had been conscious that his manner betrayed him, and that his words lacked enthusiasm. What if the time should come when not one word, but a hundred, would hardly suffice to get her from his side? What if he must lose her clinging arms with his own hands and pray her, for her dear love, to leave him?

What are the shadows that darken Robert Ord's face as he sits reading by the firelight? They are not caused by the story he reads, pathetic as it is. No—he is down on the shore again. There are the grey salt pools stretching into watery chains, with their tangle of slimy seaweed. Far out to sea the black rocks lie unhidden and bedded in slime. Faint creeping shadows haunt the sand-hills; their green tops look rugged and bare; a rough wind rushes to meet them as they plow their way through the coarse vegetation. A slim tall figure by his side goes swiftly on. What does he hear?

"I would rather walk till I dropped—till I died—than take your arm."

Were those the words she used? How her eyes flashed with brown fire! He could see her tremble as she said it.

"Robert, how tired your voice sounds to-night!" says Belle, tenderly.

Yes, he is tired; there is a terrible ache at his heart, which he cannot understand. By and by, when Belle speaks again to him, he closes his book and sits beside her moodily. What's this weight that has suddenly fallen upon him?

"I feel as though I have known you for a hundred years, and that in all those hundred years you have never spoken a kind word to me."

With what pitiless sweetness the voice breaks in upon him! Oh, darkening shadows of the coming years, how does Robert Ord read them? Listen to a word of his said as he sat alone in a strange homestead in a foreign city:

"Oh, fool, fool that I have been! Do men gather grapes of thistles? She is right; I have sown the wind, to reap the whirlwind," and have richly deserved my harvest."

THE QUIET CORNER.

BY THE BISHOP OF EASTON.

XVIII.

When children begin to comprehend the external world their early curiosity is strangely attracted towards the animals inferior to man. The child seems to feel itself, in a sense, akin to birds and beasts, and in the exuberant wealth of love which is characteristic of children, ere their simplicity is marred by selfishness, it forms strong alliance with them, and finds in them friends, companions, and teachers.

I sometimes think that we men and women are but children of a larger growth, and the world is but a nursery and a school. And the Father's method of teaching is largely by object-lessons. The nursery has its pictures framed and set in view, which stimulate thought, although their meaning and their beauty are not soon comprehended. And the play-ground and the workshop (for the world is both of these to us) are stocked with a variety of living things, in many of their characteristics strangely human and like ourselves, and yet strangely subordinate to the power of a superior intelligence.

It is not a fancy to suppose that when men append a moral to the fable about birds and beasts, they are striving to interpret certain inarticulate lessons of nature itself. One who recognizes in creation and in Providence the thread of an ulterior and spiritual intent, sees in the animal existences around him something more than a mere physical excellence. They seem, each one, to be the incarnation of a thought, the embodiment in type of a virtue or a vice. The illustrations drawn in Scripture from the brutes would be unreal unless they rested on some foundation more solid than mere fancy. We may well believe that in this lower department of His creation, regard has been had to the culture of us, God's children. Unlettered men, for instance, who have much to do with brutes, how many an ennobling suggestion comes to them as they read the pages of this volume which, at least, is open to them. To look upon the lion is suggestive of the excellence of repose and strength. To follow the eagle in its flight is to think, at once, of aspiration. The bee has, itself, been the world's teacher, touching the value of industry guided by economy and artistic skill. God's visible creation is one great complex instrument, whose harmonies we dimly understand; only our instinct tells us there is a harmony, from the heavy beat of its ocean sigh, through all the scale, up to the clear treble of its little birds. And when the window of heaven is opened to let in upon us a gush of higher music, the Song of Moses mingles with the Song of the Lamb, and mysterious, emblematic forms of living creatures find place among the ranks of angels and of perfected spirits.

I dare not define more explicitly what is disclosed to us only in enigmas; but this I may say, with much assurance and with divine warrant, that he who, ascending the mount of God's spoken revelation, has caught a glimpse of the Divine glory and listened to the words of the Divine wisdom, when he descends, his heart all aglow, into the lower vale, shall discern the flashing of that glory from common things, and hear the echo of that heavenly teaching in the voices of most familiar sounds. As Peter, according to legend, had always a tear to shed when the cock crew, so God's children, experienced in the school of sin and of pardon, may be incited to remember their dependence by the lowing of an ox, or to thoughts of pity by the cooing of a dove.

Say not of all this that it is necessarily affectation or mere sentiment; it may be no more than a mere counterfeit, the poetic illusion of the mind. But that is true Christian sensibility which sees God everywhere, and hears His voice where others would say only that it thunders, and finds an intimation of His purpose where others discern no more than a going in the tops of the mulberry trees.

How lovely is that story of the dove returning to the ark—of the dove at rest. It is one of those medallion pictures of Holy Scripture, wonderful not more for beauty than for simplicity and brevity. As a skillful artist with a few bold outline touches of his pencil will tell a tale more impressive than an elaborate painting, so there are these miniatures set here and there in the Bible which have a fascination for all times. The dove at rest is inscribed on the coins of heathen people; it finds a place over the graves of faithful men in the catacombs; it enters into the literature of the world, and inspires the rhapsody of the Christian poet. Nay, it touches the heart of humanity with a peculiar tenderness for a little bird, a humble member of God's creation.

Its associations in the Bible are various. Harmlessness is one of them—"Wise as serpents, harmless as doves." And purity also, as when we read: "My dove, my undefiled is one," and when we remember that when the one only pure Infant of our race was presented in the temple, a dove was the appropriate offering.

There is an element of pathos in the allusions—its reticency, for instance: "Leave the cities and dwell in the rock, and be like the dove that maketh her nest in the sides of the hole's mouth." Its note is the expression of plaintiveness: "I did mourn as a dove," "We mourn sore like doves," says Isaiah; and in Nahum, the captive Queen of Nineveh is represented as led by her maids "with the voice of doves, taboring upon their breasts."

And then there is another side of allusion. The dove hath a quick, strong wing, and the Psalmist envies her her pinions when he would make a rapid flight into a far-off land. And then again, despite her humility, when one comes to see her in the sunlight, very brilliant and ever-changing is the sheen of her plumage, and so the Psalmist speaks of "her wings covered with silver and her feathers with yellow gold."

THE DUTY AND NEEDS OF THE CHURCH.

BY THE BISHOP OF IOWA.

The consecration of eight churches during the past year, freed from encumbrance and transferred to the diocesan trustees, is a noteworthy proof of the Church's advance. The number could easily have been increased, if, in several instances, there could have been provided the few hundred dollars requisite to remove the remaining indebtedness on the property, and thus secure it inalienably to the Church. In two or three instances where parishes and congregations have exceeded their means in the erection of their churches, temporary loans have been extended to them by the American Church Building Fund Commission, thus enabling the people to complete and occupy their places of worship, and to defer the last payments for the same for a longer or shorter term of years. This assistance, though certainly a kindness, is not to be regarded as a charity. The parish or mission thus aided is required to mortgage its property to the lender, and to pay a fair rate of interest. No provision is made for gifts to our needy organizations, stimulating or aiding them to arise and build; and it is certainly incumbent upon us to provide some diocesan organization whereby from three to five hundred dollars can be given to congregations requiring assistance in the erection of their humble churches. It is strange that so little interest in this most important charity is felt in the Church at large, and it would be a source of great encouragement, if, at this session of our convention, there could be organized and equipped, through the liberality of our laity, a diocesan society or committee, through which there might be raised in Iowa, the coming year, at least $2,500 for church building purposes. If this should be done, I could pledge that the number of consecrations the coming year would exceed that I report to-day. In what way could there be a richer return for individual or parochial beneficence?

In this connection I would refer to the enrollment plan devised at the East, and proposing the gift, on the part of each baptized member of the Church, of five dollars for general missionary work, prior to the General Convention of 1886. I have given my approval of the scheme, conditioned on the appropriation of the money raised in Iowa to our own pressing mission needs. The fact is often overlooked that, although not a missionary diocese, there is more actual mission work undertaken and maintained in Iowa than in ten of our missionary jurisdictions. If our general mission work was conducted on the business principle of expending the largest sums where the largest results could be attained, the scale of appropriations adopted in New York would be changed, and in place of assigning to a territory larger than all England, into which during the present episcopate fully one hun-ded thousand souls have come each year, till the population has now become upward of two millions, the sum of $3,500, this amount would be increased ten-fold. It is in view of pressing needs and actual possibilities that I have been constrained to stipulate that the gifts of the baptized in Iowa toward the centenary gift of a million of dollars shall be expended within our own borders. I ask this in full sympathy with our general work, and praying at the same time that we may, as a diocese, as parishes, as individuals, sow beside all waters. Let us awaken to these calls for charity on every side. Freely we have received, freely let us give.

A scheme of clerical insurance has been devised by one of our most astute as well as intelligent clergy, which, in connection with a plan for increasing the circulation of our leading religious periodicals and papers, promises the return to each parish, on the death of its rector, of all antecedent subscriptions to these papers as a relief fund for the widow and children of the deceased. The scheme has commended itself to the approval of business men. I have examined the details, and it should be enough to inspire general confidence in its favor that, although it involves no expenditure of money for which it does not at once give a full and fair return, it makes possible and probable a most beneficent and happy result besides. Even if the sole result were the increased circulation of our periodical press, good would be done; and in the event that this increase in subscriptions and circulation should provide for the relief of the needy widows and orphans of the clergy, the scheme and its contriver would rightly claim at our hands unmeasured praise.

It is especially incumbent upon us as Churchmen to exercise a constant and intelligent vigilance with respect to the literature of our households. The volumes, magazines and papers crowding our library tables or book-shelves, read at our firesides, placed in the hands of our children, and naturally regarded by the inmates or visitors of our homes as indicating our literary tastes, our principles, and our belief, are, too often, such as cannot fail to undo the teachings of the Prayer Book and the work of the parish priest. We are at pains to guard the members of our families from improper and degrading associations found outside the walls of the home; but are we alive to the fact that it is largely through the influence of books and papers that characters are made or marred, and that these silent instructors for good or evil are often far more potent in their power of moulding the future belief, the practice, and the life of the young, than either our example or our words? When our eyes are closed in slumber, when the heads of the household are busy at their daily tasks, when we are seeking a brief enjoyment in the reading of our own literary favorites, the child, the youth, the visitor, the friend, are each and all drawing mental aliment from the books and papers scattered around, or, it may be, silently and surreptitiously brought in from without to work their purpose of undermining principle or destroying innocence, reverence and faith. If we recognize the being and sovereignty of God, if we revere the person and work of Christ, if we look for and desire the sanctifying operations of the Holy Ghost, if we have faith in the creeds of Christendom, and believe in the Church and sacraments of our Lord's own institution, and would train our families in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, we are neither wise, consistent, nor safe in failing to interest ourselves in the reading matter of our households.

The Churchman's home should be well furnished with the literature of the Church. We are preeminently a cultured and a reading communion. Our Church has been largely built up, in the past, under God's blessing, by the sound and convincing arguments of the champions of the faith. Any one at all familiar with the literature of our land will recognize the abundant use of the press, in the years gone by, in the dissemination of Church literature—apologetic, controversial, explanatory. The well-argued and compactly written tracts and volumes of the past hundred years, from the pens of Checkley, Johnson, Beach, Apthorp, Learning, Chandler, Sealbury, and others, were felt throughout the land; and early in the present century the works of Hobart, Bowden, Onderdonk, and White, and later, the popular treatises and sermons of John A. Clark and George T. Chapman, of Bishops Kip, Randall, and Cleveland Cox, have won thousands to embrace "the faith once delivered to the saints." In prose or poetry, in the graceful essay or the labored and polished treatise, in incisive arguments and in attractive and instructive discourses, we have a literature at once pure, elevating and pervaded with a Churchly and Christian tone. But as time has sped a new generation has come forward, unacquainted with our intellectual heritage. We have to guard that which has been transmitted to us as the results of the old controversies and long-continued strife. We have to fortify even our own households against insidious foes who would rob us of our faith, our Church, our common Christianity. We have to raise the old standard anew, and rally beneath the old-time legend—"for the Church of God." It is without question, the duty of the heads of our households to provide in their homes, for the use of the family, the books that illustrate and defend our faith and practice, both as Christians and as Churchmen. The performance of this duty need not be onerous. Books and papers are a necessity. We can certainly exercise a measure of discrimination and choice in supplying the demand for reading matter that comes alike from young and old. We are certainly at fault if, through our failure to provide good reading, the minds of our children are driven to feed on that which is bad.

The primary want of a Church household is a comment on the Word of God. We need not place in the hands of our children and the catechumens of our Church commentaries and expositions prepared by those who are not in sympathy with our teachings or our practices, for we have, in comparatively inexpensive form and in most attractive guise, the results of the latest scholarship and the widest erudition supplied by the members of our own communion. With such a storehouse of information as to the meaning of the Book of God, the inmates of our homes would be fortified against the cavils of modern doubt or the misrepresentations and fallacies of ignorant and presumptuous assailants of revelation. Added to the family commentary there should be works explanatory and illustrative of the Bible, the Church, and the life of our Lord—all of which are easily accessible, and attainable at a cost so small as to bring them within the means of every household where there are books at all. The Church press should be sustained, and its periodic issues welcomed as a means of acquainting ourselves and our families with the progress of the Church of God in the world and especially of that branch of it to which we individually belong. The Prayer Book claims for itself, so deeply does it enter into the spiritual life of each one of us, its works of illustration and defence. The knowledge of its historic associations, the full perception of its spirituality, its scripturalness, its sanctity, will deepen our devotion and make us prize more and more our heritage of prayer. It were surely unnecessary to commend such works as Keble's Christian Year, and Bishop Cox's Thoughts on the Services, which every Churchman and Churchwoman, young or old, should own and prize. It needs but a little effort on the part of our people to place in each household the nucleus of a Church library, to be added to year by year, until, by the help of these eloquent though voiceless teachers, our families will be trained intelligently in the Church's ways. I speak because the examinations I have made of the home libraries of our Church families has revealed, oftentimes, the presence of most pernicious and demoralizing literature, as well as that which is avowedly and strongly antagonistic, both to the Church and Christianity. We may be guilty of the blood of souls if we are not more careful on this point. A bad book may undo the teachings and training of years. It is wiser to fill the shelves with that which is pure and of good report, offering to the young or older reader that which accords with the doctrine and practice of the Church of Christ, than to gather our home libraries at hap-hazard, and buy books only because they are cheap.—Convention Address.

ISRAEL IN EGYPT.

Help from God and Man.

Exodus iv. 1-17.

Verse 1. This answer of Moses is made to the promise of deliverance and the promise of favor in the eyes of the Egyptians. He is sure that the people will refuse to believe his word, and his subsequent experience with the people shows that this was no vain fear. The sign which God gives him proves that it was not in excuse or opposition that he thus objects.

Verse 2. "A rod." The staff in the hand of Moses, his shepherd's crook. The question of the Lord is evidently to draw Moses' attention to the miracle about to be wrought.

Verse 3. "He said"—that is, the Lord said. "It became a serpent." This was a sign to Moses that he was to exercise miraculous powers; also, that he was to be exposed to dangers and threatenings. It is also a sign of the power of the wicked one, which was to be exerted against Israel through Egypt. Lastly, it is a type of the redemptive work hereafter to be wrought. "The rod and staff" became the symbol of evil—even as the Lord "was made sin for us, who knew no sin."

Verse 4. Moses put forth his hand and seized the serpent, and it became a rod again. So with the rod of his power he was to subdue Egypt, and by this sign Israel was to see that he was truly commissioned to lead them forth.

Verse 5. There were two points to be settled for the Israelites: First, that Moses had truly seen a Divine Vision; and next, that the God who appeared unto him was the God of Israel, the God of Abraham and of Isaac and of Jacob.

Verse 6. The leprous hand of Moses is difficult to explain, with entire certainty. Various arbitrary interpretations have been given; but this appears probable, that as leprosy is the type of sin throughout the whole Old Testament, the sign was that Israel had contracted defilement through its sojourn in Egypt, but should be delivered therefrom. The whole Exodus is a type of the greater work which the true Moses was to perform.

Verse 7. The first object of the sign was of course to convince the Hebrew people. Now, leprosy was supposed to be incurable, especially after reaching a certain stage. This instant restoration would therefore be a manifest miracle. It was also a type of Israel purified and restored. In fact, the great teaching of the second dispensation is of sin and its removal. The Law brings the conviction of sin, and expiation removes sin. These were the leading ideas into which Israel was to be educated, and the whole purpose of the Mosaic Law was to teach these two facts.

Verse 8. These two signs were well fitted to convince a childish people, and the entire unlikeness of the two would add to their strength in reaching their minds; but still their obstinacy was very great, as well as their selfish and slavish fear. It will be noted that there is a certain progressiveness in the nature of the signs.

Verse 9. "The water of the river." The river is of course the Nile. The change of the water into blood is, first, a token of the power of Moses to convert that which was the great source of life to Egypt into a form of destruction; next, probably, a mystical token of the sacramental efficacy of water and blood. It will be noted that while the first miracle of Moses in Egypt is the turning of water into blood, that of the Saviour is the turning of water into wine. The contrast of the two dispensations is one not to be overlooked.

Verse 10. Moses here starts a new objection. Moses had been for forty years in exile, away from the contact with men and busy life, and doubtless felt the decay of his power of expression through disuse. He acknowledges that God's presence to him had not quickened this power anew. "Slow of speech and of a slow tongue." Not exactly stammering or defective in utterance, but slow, that is, unready. Moses finds the weight of his mission magnified upon him as the new powers are conferred. He dreads more and more the task as the way is opened.

Verse 11. Here God does not give him a new sign, but simply reminds him of His power. Here the Speaker of the Burning Bush claims to Himself the creative office—therefore is God.

Verse 12. Here God begins to reveal Himself as the Holy Ghost, the Inspirer. Compare this with the promise of the Saviour to His disciples, in the Gospels.

Verse 13. The words of Moses appear to be words of submission; but they probably before a different sense. They are probably equivalent to saying, "I will go because I must, but I do not wish to go."

Verse 14. "The anger of the Lord." This shows that the last anger of Moses was no true submission. Yet God in mercy finds a way out of it. "Aaron the Levite." Aaron was probably the representative of the House of Levi—the chief of the tribe—not yet made the sacerdotal tribe. He was the elder brother of Moses. He had lived among his own people, and had that gift of eloquence which impresses the Oriental heart. Moreover Aaron was already on the way to seek Moses, very likely with an idea of the deliverance of Israel.

Verse 15. As God was to be the Inspirer of Moses, so Moses was to be the teacher of Aaron. God will not take away the leadership from Moses, in spite of his reluctance to assume the burden, for which he was really the best fitted.

Verse 16. Literally, "He shall be to thee, mouth, thou shalt be to him, God." That is, God's word should so come to Moses that Aaron should receive it implicitly, without question, as if God's direct voice.

Verse 17. "Thou shalt take this rod." The shepherd's crook. Moses becomes type of the Good Shepherd. "Do signs," viz., the infliction of the piskus upon Egypt, for which Moses used his rod repeatedly.

BY THE "CHEL."

"A chiel's amang you, takin' notes,
And faith, he'll prent it."—Robert Burns.

So much has already been written about the Passion Play in the Bavarian Highlands that it seems almost superfluous to add to the numerous accounts, and yet not one that I have read conveys the impression produced upon myself by this truly wonderful representation.

By this time all the world knows that every ten years crowds come to this dirty and dramatic little village to see upon each Sunday a series of tableaux, oddly combined with acting and singing, the whole representing the principal events in the life of our Saviour, and that this Passion Play was originally performed in fulfilment of a pious vow made by the peasants during the scourge of a terrible pestilence which threatened destruction to their village.

So runs the story, which having heard told most enthusiastically by a devout Roman Catholic friend, I became infected by her enthusiasm, and allowed the uncomfortable scruples which from the beginning I had felt about the whole affair to grow fainter and fainter as she described the reverence with which the actors themselves treated the subject, and the fervent piety which was felt in the hearts of all spectators of the solemn scenes so touchingly portrayed.

So with friends I, too, directed my steps to Oberammergau.

At last the slow train from Munich had dragged its weary way as far as Murnau, at which place carriages, carts, and vehicles of all descriptions were awaiting the crowd of sight-seers; but woe betide those whose fore-sight had omitted to order places beforehand; their chances of transportation to the overcrowded village, or of reception when there, were but the very slightest.

A three-hours' drive through meadows carpeted with wild flowers, blue gentian and gold-hearted Marguerites, clumps of forget-me-nots, together with cowslips, primroses, and primulas; a long pull on foot over the Eital mountain, where the steep way is marked by tiny shrines or pictures, telling of accidents or marvellous escapes of former travellers, and at last comes in sight the narrow, cramped village, of ordinary Swiss pattern, with cross-topped houses, where placards of excursion agents look oddly misplaced beside the rough frescos of saints and holy subjects, and a curious old church filled with pious epitaphs testifies to the tenderness with which Germans regard their dead.

We were lodged in a small peasant house belonging to one of the numerous family of Lang, and there found everything scrupulously clean, if more than plain, and the fact of being obliged to mount a ladder and go through a trap-door to reach our apartments only added to the novelty. Excellent coffee was furnished by our hostess in the morning, and for our early dinner and supper we went to the house of one George Lang, considered the best in the village, where we found plenty to eat, although the variety of dishes was naturally limited.

Those accustomed to brilliantly-lit and well-warmed theatres must dismiss all such preconceived ideas in regard to the very simple wooden construction at Oberammergau, where the whole stage is open, and real mountains rise behind and around as background to the scenes and pictures. Only a few of the seats, even, are covered, and are by no means free from draughts of all kinds. To any one who has not seen this theatre it is difficult to describe the plan of the stage, where, in fact, there are five different places for action—the centre division, which is enclosed, and where the curtain rises to display the tableaux; the two side streets of Jerusalem through which the crowds hurry and the different processions move, and the two balconies, belonging respectively to the houses of Pilate and of Annas the high priest, upon both of which several scenes take place.

Until now all has been hurry and confusion; bells ringing, bands of music parading the streets, peasants streaming by in crowds, tourists hurrying for places, all alike tramping through mud ankle-deep—all eager to be in their seats before the cannon shall fire which is the signal that the great Passion Play is about to begin. The surrounding hills echo and re-echo the sound of the first shot, and still the stage is empty, with only the dull, cloudy sky as covering. My Roman Catholic friend whispers enthusiastically:

"Now they are praying—the priest is with them—they are on their knees!"

A second time the cannon is fired, and then a soft, wailing melody is heard, as from either side comes the wonderful chorus of "Schützgeister," or Guardian Angels, in their many-hued raiments, the long fair hair of the women blown by the fresh morning breeze, whilst the choragus, a grand, solemn looking man, explains in a harmonious sort of rhythm how the history of the Old Testament is typical of the New. Then, in a mysterious monotone, the chorus take up his complaint, leading one's imagination to contemplate the tale of lore, and woe, and agony which they will tell. The women's voices are atrocious, the men's good, and without the chorus the tedium of the play itself would be unbearable.

Anxious to be convinced of the reverence with which these peasants look upon the characters they represent, I had gone in person to see three of the chief actors.

She who personated the Virgin Mary I found to be the daughter of a widow, said to be the poorest person in the village. The girl was modest and retiring, and spoke so reverently of the great honor which had come to her in having been chosen for the part, that it made me feel decidedly better, and caused me to take much interest in her. On the stage, however, she was a failure, her voice being harsh and disagreeable and her acting feeble. She took me to see Joseph Maier, a wood-carver, and the Christus of the play. From his appearance in his every-day dress, as I first saw him, I was not prepared for the perfect grace and gentle dignity which throughout he displayed in acting the Christ; for his face is not the ideal one it should be, and only the manner in which his wealth of hair and beard are arranged forms his resemblance to the pictures of the Saviour. His voice is one of the most musical I have ever heard, and its tone never loses the tenderness and dignity suited to his part. The Magdalen, the third character I visited, was not pretty, and very commonplace.

The first scene of Christ's entry into Jerusalem was disappointing, and the scourging of the money-lenders in the Temple caused only laughter in the audience by the utter ineffectiveness of what was meant to be indignant reality. The only success of this scene is obtained by power of contrast, the Christus remaining a grand, calm figure amidst the shouts and derision of the multitude. In the scene of the Last Supper, and the washing of the disciples' feet, no words of praise are too strong for the beauty and dignity of the Christus; but to hear the solemn words spoken, and see the bread and wine given as in reality at the Holy Communion, produced (upon me) the most painful and unpleasant impression.

The parting of Christ with his mother was touching to a degree, and the agony in the garden, with which the first part of the play ended, too real, and too deep in pathos to be looked at unmoved.

After an interval of one hour the performance continues, when the terrible struggle between avarice and love of his Master takes place in the mind of Judas, and is followed by his miserable treachery and wretched death. The acting throughout this whole scene is superb. Then follows the dragging of Jesus back and forth from Pilate to Herod, and the contrast between the hideous murderer Barabbas, grown gray in sin, and the sad-faced Christ, speechless before his tormentors, appeals powerfully to the imagination. The brutality of the soldiers in the judgment scene was so great, that an Englishman sitting behind us left in disgust, saying he "had had enough."

The realism of the following pictures was simply terrible. Nothing was omitted: the insults of the wandering Jew, the handkerchief of St. Veronica, the meeting with Simon of Cyrene, the final parting of Jesus with His mother, and the gibes and jeers of the multitude as stumbling and falling under the heavy burden of His cross, the Man of Sorrows is compelled to follow the weary way which leads to Golgotha and death.

At this point I myself left the theatre, and no persuasions could tempt me to remain for the scene of the crucifixion.

Surely it is open to the very gravest question whether such a spectacle should be permitted.

In greatest triumph was I afterwards assured that no support was allowed for the feet of Maier as he hung upon the cross; that the spectators could plainly see the body descend several inches by its own weight, and that the man really suffered, even as Christ must have suffered, upon the shameful tree. To myself it seemed simple blasphemy, the whole description; for even were these peasants and wood-carvers the very purest and best of the human race, what human man dare personate the God-man in His sacrifice for the "sins of the whole world?"

The entire account was ghastly in its grim reality, and I cannot but think as I said before, that the whole performance and the tendency thereof is open to the gravest question.

For the future preservation from pestilence of the village and its inhabitants, a few commonest rules of cleanliness as to the condition of the streets, etc., would I fancy equal in effectiveness the acting of the Passion Play every ten years; and useful as these miracle plays may have been in olden times, when pious peasants explained them to others as simple as themselves, I cannot believe that the effect is the same upon the crowd of summer tourists who court Oberammergau as a new sensation.

Cook's agency and Gaye's new English hotel have certainly taken from the simple purity of the whole idea, and the laughing, hurrying, beer-drinking crowd remind one rather too much of the return from the Derby to be in harmony with the sacred subject just enacted.

The remark meets one at every turn from enthusiastic believers in the whole entertainment, that, considering they are untaught peasants, etc., the acting is wonderful. So it would be, were they entirely untaught, but few, I fancy, are aware that for years past the old priest, Daisenberger, who first, in 1850, arranged this Passionspiel on its present elaborate scale, has taught the wood-carvers in Oberammergau how to act, and act well. The smallest children learn to take their parts in the tableaux, and enter so fully into the spirit of it all that Joseph Maier's wife herself told me how her husband had related that when, for the first time, his little Rosa, a child about seven years old, took part in the play, he had explained to her that when he said to the women of Jerusalem, "Weep not for me, but weep for yourselves and your children," she must cover her eyes, and appear to cry. To his surprise, she not only appeared to, but actually did weep bitterly, and this is the spirit in which the whole community enter into the subject. This venerable priest adapts, explains, and directs the dramatic representations of the villagers, which are by no means confined to the performance of the Passion Play, and no intelligent observer could possibly watch the manner in which they cross the stage, remark their gestures, voices, or movements, without being perfectly convinced that they have been taught, and taught well. All praise is due to the good old priest who is their very capable teacher, and who has arranged for them even plays from Goethe and Schiller, and has himself written a semi-religious drama entitled "The Founding of the Monastery of Ettal," which they performed in 1875.

The religious enthusiasts who tell you that these good people have no instruction, but act by "heaven-born instinct," defraud the worthy priest, Daisenberger, of the very great credit to which he is entitled, and sacrifice truth to a morbid love of the wonderful and impossible.

Whether or, no the continued representation of the Passionspiel is productive of good or evil, is a question difficult of solution, and one which does not promise to be easily settled.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

LIFE'S TROUBLES.

BY MRS. E. B. SANFORD.

"What a pretty little thing! What bright eyes she has! Is that your sister, Eva?"

"Yes, I'm sorry to say it," returned Eva Roberts crossly. "'Bright eyes.' I should think so! Bright enough for mischief, they are. You can't lay a thing out of your hand but she will discover it, and spoil it if it can be spoiled."

"I should think she must be a little darling, for all that," said Cherry Edwards, playing "peep, bo," with the baby as she spoke. "But I came to see if you could go to walk with me this afternoon, can you?"

"No, I wish I could. But, you see, mamma has gone out and left me to take care of Gracie, so there is no walk for me."

"Can't you bring her with you, and come a little way?" asked Cherry.

"Oh, it wouldn't be worth while. I don't want the bother of getting out her carriage, and she couldn't walk far enough to pay for the trouble of getting her ready."

Little Gracie had seemed to understand the talk about taking a walk, for she ran into another room and came back with a dolly's skirt pulled on her head for a cap, and her fat little hands thrust into a pair of her mamma's nice kid gloves.

"Me go walkey wid Sissy," she said.

"No, you can't; Sissy isn't going," Eva answered shortly.

The child did not cry, but turned her attention to a cup of milk which stood near the edge of the table. Trying to reach it she spilled some on the table.

"Oh, careful!" she exclaimed with a funny look of concern, and began trying to pick up the stream of milk with the thumb and finger. Failing in this, she seized one of the kid gloves and was about to sop up the milk with it when Cherry laughingly caught her little hands.

"There, you see how it is!" exclaimed

Eva. "She goes from one piece of mischief like that to another all the time."

"She didn't mean it for mischief," said Cherry gently. "She only wants to be doing something, and don't know how. But I must run, for my walk is to do an errand for auntie. Kiss me, baby, will you? There's a darling!"

"Now, Cherry, I know just what you are thinking. Pitying Gracie, and saying to yourself what a cross thing her sister is. But, I tell you, you don't know a thing about it. All you ever have to do is just what is nice and pleasant—like taking a walk this lovely afternoon. Nobody can know what trouble is unless they have two or three children around, interfering with everything."

"Oh, Eva!" said Cherry, with tears starting to her eyes. And then Eva suddenly remembered that Cherry had lost her father and mother, and a little sister, too; and that her home now was with an aunt who was a great invalid, and "very nervous," so people said. Unwillingly Eva owned to herself that there might be troubles harder to bear than having two or three merry little ones about the house.

"Cherry, dear, I didn't think!" she said, kissing her girl-friend's cheek.

"I know—you thought only one side," responded Cherry, smiling as she brushed away the tears. "I do so, too, sometimes—yes, often! But, Eva, it isn't right; is it?"

"Why not? Who can help feeling put out by such things?"

"But you know our verse last Sunday," said Cherry, quietly. "'Do all in the Name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks.' I think Miss Hardy talked so nicely about it, don't you? You remember she said that if we took up the daily duties that we didn't like, and did them in His Name, and for the love of Jesus, they would seem so different. But I must go now. Good-by!"

Eva sat still on the door-step, looking after Cherry, and wishing that she had her cheerful spirit, and her way of looking at things.

From this wish she lapsed into others, and there is no telling how long she might have dreamed there, had not a sudden crash brought her to her feet. Little Gracie, unwatched, had trotted into the pantry, and was making a mixture after her own heart, when she let fall a bowl which caused the crash.

"Oh, dear me!" exclaimed her sister, "was there ever such a bother! Do come along and let's find something for you to do, as Cherry says."

The little one turned from her dolls, which had been forced into her arms until she was tired of them; but when Eva produced a large box of cards for her to sort she was delighted.

A half hour passed, and the cards had not lost their charm.

"I declare," thought Eva, "I believe I might run off now and see Julie about that edging pattern; it won't take long to learn it, and I do so want to begin."

She stole out of the room and went in search of the other children. They were making a mock garden in their own little plot of ground, and very intent upon their work.

"If I say anything to them they'll want to go with me," thought Eva, and she turned back to the house. "Rosy, can't you have half an eye to baby just a few minutes? She's playing now, as good as need be."

"Sure an' it's only a quarther of an eye I can spare," answered good-natured Rosy; "for I daren't leave me kitchen a minit wid all this on the fire."

"I don't believe you'll need to," said Eva, and away she ran.

The edging pattern was much more intricate than Eva had imagined, but it was a merry lesson with Julie for a teacher, and nearly two hours had been spent at the task, when, aroused by the striking of the clock, Eve sprang up to go home.

"I think I can manage it; thank you ever so much, Julie. I must run home and look after the baby."

"Look after her"—but where was she? Rosy did not know; she was still bending anxiously over her preserving kettle, and "hadn't heard a lip of the darlint at all!"

Robby and Sam were swinging in the hammock now—no, they had not seen Gracie! Where could the little creature have gone?

Thoroughly anxious now, Eva rushed about, over the yard and garden, up and down the street, searching everywhere that the child might probably have gone.

"She could not have gone up the road far," reasoned the sister, "for Mrs. Graves would have seen her; she is sitting out under the trees; or Julie and I would surely! And she wouldn't have gone down the road far, because she is so afraid of the cars."

But even as she argued thus, Eva's cheeks turned pale. What if Gracie had gone that way? The railroad crossed the road a few rods below her home, and it led away through the woods—a tempting path it might be to little feet, all unconscious of danger.

"The train will be due in ten—yes, in five minutes!" groaned poor Eva, and she flew down to the crossing, and stood gazing fearfully up and down when the train thundered by.

Eva quite forgot in her misery that her papa was expected to return home by that train. And Mr. Roberts, seated on that side to catch a first glimpse of home, was astonished to see his little daughter standing there, with pallid face and anxious eyes. "What ailed the child?" he questioned uneasily. "Could it be that something had gone wrong at home?"

And where was the truant baby all this time?

"THE LITTLE ONE SAT CONTENTEDLY ON THE STEPS."

She had soon missed Eva, and then she soon wearied of the cards.

"Sissy gone!" she said; "me put on sings, go fin' her!"

Putting on "things" was a funny operation, and an odd little figure was Gracie when ready to set out. "Dolly go to!" she went on, and thrust poor dollie into a basket which she took upon her arm. Robby and Sam were still busy with their garden, and did not notice the little one as she sallied forth. Down the garden path she trotted, and, at the very end of it, she noticed a gap in the fence through which she easily crept; and there she was, in Neighbor Brace's great cornfield.

The tall corn stalks were high above her head. Baby looked up at them and cried out: "Pitty, pity tees!" as she pushed her way in among them.

On and on trudged Baby, amidst the "pretty trees;" and, however much she may have tried to make her way out, she only went farther in; she was fairly lost in the corn. By and by she stood still and cried out shrilly:

"Go 'way! naughty tees! Mamma come! Fin' G'acie! Oh—h!" The call ended in a pitiful cry.

Mamma was spending the afternoon in a dentist's chair, and could not hear the baby. But the wailing voice reached the ears of Neighbor Brace, as he was cutting down some corn stalks to feed his horse. He stopped and looked all about.

"Queer," said he, "where that cry came from! Sounded as if some little body was in trouble."

The good man went back towards the house; but the cry still sounded in his ears and he spoke to his wife about it.

"Couldn't be that some little tot has strayed in amongst the corn, eh?" said she; "it might 'most as well be lost in the woods, for all getting out!"

Neighbor Brace had a soft spot in his heart for all "little tots," and he at once put on his hat and went to see.

Pushing in between the rows, he presently found the basket with Dolly in it; and a few paces further lay Dolly's little mistress, tired, sobbing, and almost asleep.

"Hallo, little Pussy! Got lost in uncle's big cornfield? Well, come; we'll find the way out. Poor little heart! Who be you, I wonder?"

"I'm Gracie!" said the baby, and she patted his shoulder confidently:

Now the Brace homestead was at some distance on the further side of the big corn-field, so that these good people had not happened to meet the Roberts' children very often, and had never seen little Grace. They did not know of the gap in the fence, and so were much puzzled to guess where the child came from.

"Well, she's hungry, I know!" said Aunty Brace. She brought a mug of milk, which Gracie drank eagerly; and then, with a big sweet apple in one hand and a piece of gingerbread in the other, the little one sat contentedly on the steps of the porch, for she seemed to prefer that place.

"We must call Tim, and send him round to find where she belongs," said Aunty Brace. "Somebody's worrying about the pretty dear!"

But there was no need of sending. Mr. Roberts, when he reached the station, started across lots by the shortest way home, for he felt rather anxious.

This short-cut took him within sight of Mr. Brace's door, and his little girl espied him, and hailed him with a joyful shout:

"Papa! Mine papa!"

A few words explained how the child came there, and explained Eva's troubled looks also, to the father's great relief.

Eva was returning from another fruitless search when her father reached the house, with the little runaway in his arms.

"Oh, Papa! Where did you find her? I'm so glad!" she cried excitedly, and then burst into tears.

"Mamma had to keep her appointment with Dr. Bliss—eh, daughter!—and left you in charge of Gracie? I see!" said her father, stroking the bowed head.

"When will my girlie learn to find her pleasure in doing her duty 'as unto the Lord'!"

"That is like what Cherry said!" thought the sobbing girl. "Oh, I wish I had tried this afternoon!"

It was well for Eva, as it so often is for each of us, that she had the opportunity to try again. The Lord, who asks of us our hearts' love and service, is "very pitiful and of tender mercy."

And we will hope that Eva, and we also, may find it true that "doing all things to Jesus . . . will shed pleasure over all dull things, softness over all hard things, peace over all trial."

"BUT CONTRARIWISE, BLESSING."

BY IRENE WIDDEMER HARTT.

Herbert Rylance could not have given a good reason, if asked, for his quarrel with Anthony James. Their disputing began in fun. Then Anthony said something rather sharp which vexed Herbert, although he knew he was not in earnest. His own retort was as unkind, and angered Anthony, and from that evening they went on saying unkind things, getting more and more in earnest, till it grew to be a quarrel which culminated in very angry words that Sunday morning, as they went into church side by side.

They were the leaders of the choir—Anthony of the Decani side and Herbert of the Cantoris; and as they were nearly the same size, and sat opposite each other, they walked together in the procession.

The first note of the processional was not struck correctly, and they came in, singing the least trifle flat, just enough to jar on the ears of every one, especially of a musician, and they did not get righted till the third verse was begun. The chorister came in frowning, with what seemed to the boys a threat in his face. Herbert blamed Anthouy, and Anthony blamed Herbert. They were whispering excitedly to each other, instead of singing, as they came up to the chancel steps, and parted with threats. During the Exhortation they glanced angrily over to each other, and in the Confession, which followed, it was their lips only which uttered the contrite words, mocking the Lord, while their hearts stood very far from Him.

Herbert heard as in a dream "that those things may please Him which we do at this present, and that the rest of our lives may be pure and holy." Before this trouble with Anthony arose he liked to hear these words, and prayed always that what he did at this present would please Him, and that the rest of his life would be pure and holy. He had entered into the choir only to please the Lord, not to please himself; for the rehearsals were frequent and irksome, and such regularity of attendance was required, that it was a tax on his time and even on his strength. He had tried to make his life pure and holy too, but this quarrel had dragged him down to anything but a holy life and heart. This morning, as he prayed, "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us," he was thinking of turning his back on his duty, and do this one thing no longer he was doing now to please the Lord. He was really half of a mind to leave the choir; and, as Anthony's voice led off the Venite, he thought how he hated him, and if he did stop singing he would never have to see him any more, for their paths in life otherwise lay far apart.

"Let us come before His presence with thanksgiving," Herbert returned with his side, and he had come before that holy presence with anger and hatred instead of "with thanksgiving," and "show ourselves glad in Him with psalms." Herbert had once showed himself "glad in Him," he had "worshipped the Lord in the beauty of holiness," delighting to sing His praises here. His heart pained that those days were gone, and he joyed no longer in serving Him. It was all Anthony's fault, he said to himself, and if it were not for Anthony he would do as well now as he used to.

They had determined to fight. They parted before the altar with mutual threats, and Herbert was glad the trouble was going to be settled thus. He had no doubt of coming off victor, and was certain that if he gave Anthony a good thrashing he would let him alone. He surveyed with some satisfaction the delicate hands opposite which held the heavy tune-book, and thought how the other boys would cheer him while he was thrashing Anthony and respect him more after the victory.

As he turned over the pages of his prayer-book to the Collect for the day, he saw with a remembrance of the one great sorrow of his boyhood that it was the fifth Sunday after Trinity. Last year he learned with an elder sister, who had died a few weeks afterwards. It was the last one she had learned, and as he heard the words, "That Thy Church may joyfully see Thee in all godly quietness," he heard, too, her voice saying as she said them, "Oh, Herbert, let us pray always that we may serve Him in godly quietness. What can be more like Heaven on earth than a life of 'godly quietness?'"

The tears welled to his eyes. With what ungodly restlessness was he turning from serving the Lord; in what ungodly turmoil was he living now? He uttered almost a sob instead of an amen, and hastily brushed the tears away as he arose from his knees.

If she had not died, but were still here, an earthly guide and helper, all this trouble and quarrel with Anthony would never have occurred; for he used to tell her all his vexations, and when they had talked them over she made them seem of so little account and the quiet serving of God of great account, that the annoyances were swallowed up always in a greater desire to walk more closely with our Lord.

He kept his eyes from Anthony's face, and tried not to hear the words of the epistle, yet wondered if Anthony heard them: "Be ye all of one mind, having compassion on one another; love as brethren; be pitiful, be courteous; not rendering evil for evil or railing for railing, but contrariwise, blessing. . . . Let him seek peace and ensue it."

It had been railing for railing from the beginning of the difficulty till now; no bearing or forbearing on either side.

Neither had tried to love each other as a brother; neither had been pitiful or courteous, and Herbert used to pride himself on his courteous and polite manners.

The sermon was on the gospel for the day. Herbert listened to the text, which was the words of St. Peter: "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord," then his thoughts wandered. The day was hot, and after awhile he must have slept; but the vision which came to him seemed so real he could not think he dreamed. He thought service was over, and he was rushing from the robing-room to meet Anthony and fight him. He could not find him at first, then he saw him standing a long way off at the other side of the churchyard still in his surplice.

"Maybe he's afraid, and thinks I will not touch him if he has that on," he muttered, as he ran over to him. "He always was a coward, but I'll show him."

Running as fast as he could, it was a long time before he reached him. The surplice assumed a brilliant, shiny whiteness, he thought, and the delicate hands stretched out had holes in them, and looking up, Herbert saw, not Anthony, the boy with whom he would fight, but our Lord.

"Anthony, I thought it was Anthony," he heard himself say.

"Verily, I say unto you, inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these, ye did it unto Me," a voice returned.

He thought he cried out, yet another seemed to say it for him: "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord."

The congregation arising for the Ascription after sermon aroused him, and as he arose he glanced over to see if Anthony still stood there. Yes, it was he; yet not he simply, but one of whom the Lord said: "What ye have unto him, ye have done unto Me." The hate Herbert felt for him he might as well have felt for our Lord; the unkind words he had spoken might have been spoken to our Lord; for Herbert knew that in the way he treated one for whom the Saviour died, he treated Him. "Inasmuch as ye did it unto the least of these, ye did it unto Me."

The last strain of the hymn had died away in the dim distance. Herbert knelt in the robing-room, as he had knelt for more than a year. Herbert did not pay any attention to the scowl on Anthony's face, when they rose from their knees, but stretched out his hand, and said hurriedly:

"Let bygones be bygones, Anthony, and let us begin over again and be friends."

Anthony hesitated for a moment, the collect and epistle had fallen on a more stony heart than Herbert's, and he would not see in his antagonist the representative of his Lord. His better nature conquered, however, and he took the proffered hand.

"All right," he said; "but I say that you struck in before I did."

Herbert knew he had not; for he especially remembered being annoyed with himself for coming in on the second word, when the chorister had so strongly enjoined the boys to start right in on the first, so he could not confess to the false note.

"Well, whoever did it," he said, "it could be avoided if we had a small organ in here to give us the note. We can't always catch it from the large organ."

The chorister was speaking, and there was no reply.

"Whoever struck the wrong note began a half a beat too soon, and deserves to be put out of the choir," he was saying.

"I think it was I, sir," spoke up one of the smaller boys, and one whose fine voice gave promise of eclipsing both Herbert and Anthony. He stepped quietly up to the chorister, and stood waiting respectfully for his decision.

"Look out that it don't happen again, that's all," as he divested himself of his surplice, not giving a thought to the manliness of the little fellow. But there was one who did give a great many thoughts to it, and that was Herbert. He thought he had been brave himself when he had offered his hand to Anthony; but this boy had acknowledged a failure before all the boys, and boys who were jealous of his abilities.

"How did you ever do that?" Herbert said to him; "Copp would have been none the wiser."

"But he would have blamed some one else, and somehow," he said, speaking very low, as if he was not certain how Herbert would receive it, "that would not have been doing just as the epistle said; it would not have been courteous or pitiful to the one blamed." And he looked at Tracy as if he thought it were he. The boys all blamed Tracy, anyway.

Herbert took the little hand that was laid in his own.

"I am glad the epistle helped you," he returned, "it helped me more than I can tell you."

There was an order for the boys to hurry off their surplices and go. Herbert obeyed, so there was no more time for talking.

ART.

The new store of E. P. Dutton & Co., No. 31 West Twenty-third street, from the great beauty of its decorations, well deserves a place under Art. With a front of fifty feet on Twenty-third street and extending back to Twenty-fourth, bronze pillars, covered with relief work, support a ceiling broken by arches of light pink, with borders of green and gold in intricate and beautiful patterns. The walls, deep salmon in color, are covered with flageuse work in elaborate designs, and serve as a background for the unbroken line of shelving of cherry, which is carved and embellished. Bronze faces, representing conventional suns, with wavy, radiating points of light, are set in the ceiling at regular intervals between the arches, and from the mouths of these faces gas fixtures of brass, covered with flageuse and repoussé work of antique and rare designs, depend. On the left is an elegant parlor for visitors, with one of Conover's Queen Anne fire-places, with intricate carving and relief work. Here are to be found a sofa, venerable with two hundred years, and which has been in possession of the firm and its predecessors for one hundred years, writing-desks, reading-tables, and other conveniences for visitors, and the tout ensemble has an air of comfort that will be sure to attract friends and buyers. This house was established in Boston in 1856, and removed to New York in 1869. They have brought out the works of many of the leading divines of the Church, such as Drs. Dix, Washburn, Phillips Brooks, Bishop Potter, etc., besides their reprints of books by the strong men of the Church of England, and they have also made a specialty of children's books, illustrated with colored and other pictures of high character. The firm now consists of Messrs. E. P. Dutton, C. A. Clapp, and E. C. Swayne, and we are glad to note the signs of their success.

THE recent announcement of the ninth annual meeting of the Music Teachers' National Association, to be held in the Academy of Music, New York, on the 1st, 2d, and 3d of July, demonstrates that for a strongly significant term of years a body of musicians fairly representative of the divine art in the United States has preserved an efficient and valuable organization. The list of the officers, with Mr. S. N. Penfield of New York City as president, abounds with names of prominent musicians from widely-separated parts of the country, stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from Maine and Minnesota to the Gulf States in the South.

The programme for the three days' session is well considered, thoroughly digested, and freshly varied in art, literature, and criticism in such nice proportions that general edification is a foregone conclusion.

It may serve the interests of our music-loving readers if we present a memorandum of the work, its order and range. On Wednesday, after an opening anthem, follows the president's address, with various formal reports. At 10:30 Mr. Krebbs, the accomplished and versatile musical editor of the Tribune, reads an essay, "Mæsiæan, Critic, and Public." It is noteworthy that all the essays of this meeting are followed by free discussions among the members. At 2 P. M. C. L. Capen of Boston reads an essay on "Harmony as Introductory to Composition," and at 3 the veteran, Mr. George H. Bristol, reads another on "Music in Public Schools," both followed by selected speakers. At 4 P. M. Mr. Carl Faellen, who gained much distinction at one of the Symphony Society concerts a year ago, gives a piano recital, with vocal assistance, while at 8 P. M. Mr. S. P. Warren, organist of Grace church, gives an organ concert at Chickering Hall, assisted by the Philharmonic Club and others.

Thursday is equally crowded with important events. There is the opening chorus at 9 A. M., followed by an essay, "Education in Music at Home and Abroad," by the Hon. John Eaton, Washington, with another at 10:15 on "The Italian and German Schools of Vocal Music," by F. W. Root of Chicago, after which, at 11:30, Mr. S. B. Mills gives a piano recital. At 2 P. M. William Mason lectures on "Accentuation in Pianoforte Playing," followed by an essay, "What is Church Music?" by John H. Cornell, New York. At 3:45 E. A. Schultze of Atlanta reads an essay on "Violin Bowing." At 4:30 Emil Liebling of Chicago gives a piano recital, and the day concludes with a general concert at the Academy of Music at 8 P. M.

Friday is an easier day, broken by an excursion at 1:30 P. M. The morning is given up to technical discussions of professional subjects, miscellaneous essays, and a piano recital at 11:30 A. M., by Carlyle Petersiles of Boston with Mr. J. A. Metcalf, vocalist. At 8 P. M. a concluding general concert follows at the Academy, with Miss Bloomfield, the brilliant pianiste, as a chief attraction, whose debut, it will be remembered, was a leading event in art circles during the last season. Considered in its æsthetic relations with the public, such a series of vigorous working sessions, bringing together much of the highest musical intelligence in the country, cannot but result in great and permanent advantages. Hereafter other compelling topics must be entertained and considered, such as the choral service, men and boy choirs, the revival and uses of the Gregorian, and of the great Paëstrina period of polyphonic religious art.

The Churchman.

SATURDAY, JULY 11, 1885.

THE very efficient committee which has been preparing the rules and ritual of an order to be called the Knights of Temperance has worked out an idea which may be of very great value. Not only has it carefully worked it out on paper, but certain members of the committee propose to test it in the way of actual experiment. They will at once start organizations in connection with their parishes to determine how far a device more or less military, and an order of proceedings designed to be as thoroughly religious as entertaining, will be of service to boys in the way of soberness, purity and obedience. Those who are interested in the practical workings of this scheme may rest assured of one thing: It is thoroughly religious and as thoroughly churchly. With all the rest it is intended to work according to the chivalrous ideas of honor and self-respect, ideas which most boys so easily respond to.

THE English Church Congress is to be held at Portsmouth, beginning on October 6th. The list of subjects to be treated of is an indication of what is now moving the English mind. Burning questions, which will burn as much after as before discussion, are left out, and so are abstract questions, theological or other, which do not concern the needs and activities of the time. The Prayer Book in Connection with Re-arrangement of Services, Supplementary Services, etc.; Work of Women in the Church; Young Men between School and Marriage; Workingmen's Clubs, etc.; the Bearing of Christianity upon Local Economics with Respect to the Mutual Relations of Rich and Poor—such are the subjects which are to engage some of the foremost minds in the English Church. They are equally practical and, so to speak, inevitable. The entire list, in fact, well illustrates in its way a remark by the Bishop of Durham, that no Church in recent centuries shows such a capacity in the way of practical development as appears in the Church of England.

DR. MÜHLEBERG, as in so many other things, builded better than he knew when he started the Fresh Air Fund. This castle in the air, as some might have supposed it, has taken on a solid and permanent shaping. The rapid growth of this beautiful charity finely illustrates the heartiness with which our people respond to any movement which is really beneficial. It is now seen—and it is seen with greater and greater clearness, and by an increased number of people from year to year—that the greatest need of the overworked and enfeebled, and especially the children living in the crowded districts in our cities, is a few days of the air, and quiet, and freshness of the country. All other things combined could not serve their purpose, and in hundreds of cases could not save them from fatal sickness. The consequence is that the Fresh Air Fund has grown, and is growing with very great rapidity. Thousands are given where only hundreds, and but a few hundreds at that, seemed sufficient a few years ago, and the scores of homes by the seaside, or in quiet places, and the coming and going of successive households tell of a charitable giving which is as generous and beautiful as the results are beneficial.

THE SPIRITUAL LIFE IN VACATION.

More and more each year the vacation season finds a place for itself in American life. The changes in industries compel nearly every class of toilers to take time for rest, and the hurry in which work is done enforces upon business and professional people a period in which they can recruit their exhausted energies. It is not strange that the churches take a vacation when minister and people are absent from home. Once it seemed like an infringement of order to have the services in the parish church discontinued even for a Sunday, but now there are nearly two months in the year during which the clergy are taking a much-needed rest, and the people who are most helpful in parish affairs are absent from their homes in quest of health or a change of life. Clergy and people are both as one in the manner in which they are affected by the rapid way of doing things which has become well-nigh universal in all American communities. Practically religious work has to be done in nine months of the year, and the Church during the other three is in the situation of every other interest in life. It is in a state of suspended animation.

There is nothing to deplore in this state of things. It is one of the conditions of modern life, and can no more be changed than the ebb and flow of the tides or the rising and setting of the sun. It does not mean the declension of religious life. It does not mean that religious people are weary of well-doing. It simply means that the quick way of doing things has compelled a different way of living and thinking, and that all of us unconsciously conform to the necessities in which we find ourselves.

But there is need that Christian people shall not forget the constant things of the spiritual life, even in vacation time. The mind and the heart need change or rest, but the soul finds its strength and refreshment not so much through the negation of activity as through increasing intimacy with God. This intimacy is not reduced when the body is weary or when the mind is at rest. The soul is never tired, as mind and body are. Again and again it stills the mind and heart, because it shares in an unseen life with Christ in God, which expresses the fulness of living. It is a mistake to shut up the soul as you shut up the church or your own dwelling in the vacation season. At the seaside, or in the quiet country, or on mountain cliffs, God speaks to the soul in the same voice that Abraham heard in the far East and Moses heard by the burning bush of Sinai, and it is through this inward consciousness of the spiritual life that Christian people resist the encroachments of the world wherever they may be. This spiritual refreshment should not be lost. It should be like our personal consciousness. It should attend us like a guardian angel. It is just here that the difference lies between Christians who have tone and those who seem always to be in the drift. The spiritual element will always consecrate the day or the hour, whatever may be the place or the condition. The religious activity may be diminished in vacation time, but the spiritual life will sanctify every passing event or experience as truly as if one were in the snug quarters of home. It is this sanctifying process that constitutes the daily refreshment of living.

THE NEW ENSLAVEMENT OF AFRICA.

In the hold of a single vessel recently sailing from Boston, bound for West Africa, were stored one hundred and thirty-two thousand gallons of ardent spirits.* A ship which sailed previously carried a few missionaries to the tribes on the Congo, and also bore five thousand two hundred gallons of rum to the same tribes. Vessels also leave New York and Philadelphia with similar cargoes for the same destination.

England, which has been ruining China with opium, sends an immense quantity of the destructive "fire-water" to many parts of the heathen world, and especially to Africa; and almost everywhere the work of her missionaries is hindered, and in some fields almost annihilated by her traffickers in rum.

The Secretary of the Church Missionary Society's Mission on the Niger reports that he knows, from his own observation on the river, that the amount of intoxicating liquor introduced on the Niger is enormous, and that one vessel which lately arrived was laden with no less than twenty-five thousand cases of gin and demijohns of rum, and that this is the common article of barter with the natives.

Formerly Liverpool and Glasgow supplied about nine-tenths of the intoxicants sent to the west coast of Africa and some other parts of the heathen world, but now Hamburg, Boston, and New York are beginning to compete with them in this baneful traffic. New companies are being started in Hamburg to send liquor of the worst kind to the tribes on the Congo, and the Niger, and other parts of Africa.

During the sessions of the Berlin West Africa Conference a deputation from the Church Missionary Society, consisting of the Archbishop of Canterbury, a number of bishops, deans, noblemen, and members of Parliament, attended at the British Foreign Office to urge upon the Government the importance in the negotiations at the conference of restraining the liquor traffic in the Niger and Congo regions. The memorialists stated that the traffic was becoming so enormous that there were grave reasons for alarm, lest not only the missions be ruined and the cause of Christianity be irreparably injured, but the native races be destroyed.

The Bishop of Sierra Leone, who was to sail the next day for Africa, mentioned that the steamer he went out in before was laden with rum and gin, and those of the very worst quality, all from Hamburg.

Senator Blair, of New Hampshire, in a speech in the Senate in which he advocated that America's representatives at the conference should use their influence to have the liquor traffic restricted, said that Europe and America by this baneful trade have been scattering the seeds of death in Africa more rapidly than the Christian Church, the International Association and all other philanthropic associations had been scattering the seeds of life.

But notwithstanding the strenuous efforts of our representatives, aided by the British members, the conference would do nothing, and the monstrous evil is to continue in all the vast regions which have been the scenes of the inhumanity and sufferings of Livingstone, Cameron, and Stanley.

Indeed the conference has indirectly been the means of giving a great impetus to the traffic, as the attention of European and American merchants has been more extensively drawn to the trade of the Congo and the Niger, and especially to the profits of the liquor business then.

What a huge curse the unlimited and uncontrolled supply of alcoholic liquors, especially the chemically poisonous kind now furnished, is to the Africans, and what a formidable obstacle it is to the regeneration of "the dark continent!"

Our country and England expended millions of money, and sacrificed hundreds of lives, in putting down the slave trade, by sea, from the west coast of Africa, and England still has her cruisers to prevent the Arabs from carrying on their abominable traffic on the east coast; but nothing is done by any government to prevent the bringing of thousands and millions of the natives of Africa into a far worse slavery than that of Cuba and Brazil, or Persia and Arabia.

Surely a sentiment should be awakened throughout Christendom against the policy of "free rum" in Africa.

ENGLAND.

A USEFUL SOCIETY.—The annual report of the Church of England Society for Providing for Waifs and Strays shows that its income has rapidly increased during the short period of its existence from 789*l.* in 1881-82, to 8,564*l.* 4*s.* 8*d.* in the past year. There are 3,944 children belonging to the society, situated in various parts of England, and one in Canada. These accommodate from ten to forty children each, and are under the superintendence of the parish clergy, assisted by local committees. In addition, there are about 130 little ones boarded out at the society's expense with respectable villagers, under efficient supervision, and 72 have been placed in other voluntary Church homes and institutions. The total number of children under the care of the society at the close of the past year was 375. A main feature of the work is that orphans and destitute children are provided with homes in whatever way may be best suited to their sex, age, and antecedents. Thus some of the homes are certified under the Industrial Schools Act Amendment Act, and others under the Pauper Education Act. The very young children are boarded out, and those whom it is desirable to separate entirely from their former evil surroundings are sent to Canada, after having had the necessary preliminary training.

RETIREMENT FROM THE CHURCH ASSOCIATION.—The Hon. and Rev. E. V. Bligh of West Malling, Kent, a member of the Church Association, has withdrawn from that body, avowedly on the ground that the chief position of "the enemy," by which he means the ritualists, namely, the ornaments rubric, the eastward position, and the confessional, "cannot be taken, or even turned," without some alteration in the rubrics and phraseology of the Prayer Book. He has recently awaked to the fact that, as a member of the Prayer Book Revision Society, which seeks to have the Prayer Book altered on the ground that it supports ritualism, it is not very consistent to remain a member of the Church Association, which takes action against ritualists on the ground that they are violating the Church of England's rules and laws, as set forth in the Prayer Book as it is.

ADDRESS TO THE LATE BISHOP WORDSWORTH.—An address, largely signed by the clergy of Lincoln, which was intended to be presented to the late bishop, and was in circulation for signatures at the time of his death, has since been completed and forwarded to his eldest son, Canon Wordsworth. The address is contained in a book bound in purple leather, having silver clasps. It is beautifully illuminated, and following the address are the signatures of the clergy. Canon Wordsworth has feelingly responded.

MOVEMENT FOR A NON-CONFORMIST COLLEGE AT OXFORD.—A movement has been going on for the transfer of the training college for Non-conformists in England to Oxford, under the name of Mansfield College, and money has been raised for the purpose. The project does not meet with general favor, and several protests have been made against it. Some of the Non-conformists themselves oppose it, and the Cambridge University Non-conformist Union has decidedly pronounced against it.

MEDICAL MISSIONARIES.—The Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge proposes to found studentships, of not more than £750 value each, for the training, during a period not exceeding four years, of young men offering themselves for the work of medical missionaries abroad, in preparation for such work, the students to be nominated by the Standing Committee, and the following classes to be eligible for appointment to them: 1. Medical men who, having completed their professional education, are willing to go through the training needful for ordination, and, after being ordained, to go out to exercise their medical skill and experience as missionaries among the heathen. Clergymen who are willing to go through the needful training for the medical profession, and, after obtaining their diploma, to go out as missionaries as those described under class 1. 3. Medical men who, having completed their medical training, desire to undertake lay mission work among the heathen, and are willing to undergo at least one year's training with that object.

MORTUARY COMMUNION AT EXETER CATHEDRAL.—The English Churchman is evidently distressed at some proceedings in Exeter Cathedral. It says (June 18th), "We regret to learn that a Communion Service was held in the Lady Chapel of Exeter Cathedral last week, in the presence of the body of the late Archdeacon Woolcombe. The corpse was specially moved to the Cathedral for the occasion. Was it a Mass for the dead that was held?"

DEATH OF THE BISHOP OF SALISBURY.—As we go to press the death is announced of the Right Rev. George Moberly, D. D., LL. D., Bishop of Salisbury, in the eighty third year of his age, and the sixteenth of his episcopate.

A COADJUTOR-BISHOP FOR MORAY AND ROSS.—The College of Bishops, on the application of the Primus, has sanctioned the appointment and election of a coadjutor-bishop for his diocese, and the Primus has issued a mandate for the election.

THE MEATH EPISCOPATE.—The diocesan synod of Meath met on Monday, June 15th, for the purpose of electing a bishop, the former election having been declared null and void. After three ballots it was again found that no one had received a sufficient number of votes to elect. The synod, therefore, again sent up the names of the Rev. Dr. J. S. Bell and the Rev. Dean Reichel to the Bench of Bishops, with whom the final choice between these two names now rests.

AUSTRIA.

THE SUNDAY OBSERVANCE LAW.—The new Sunday Observance law went into operation in Vienna on Sunday, June 14th. The following statements from Vienna describe the effect of the change. The first is dated Sunday night, and the second Monday night, June 14th and 15th:

"To-day Vienna is for the first time without Sunday afternoon papers. All the editorial offices and telegraphic news agencies are closed, and no house-building or factory work is going on except in the case of a few trades exempted from the Sunday Observance Law. The public vehicles are, however, going about as usual, and the coffee-houses, restaurants and beer-houses are open and overcrowded by workmen, who for the first time enjoy their full Sunday's rest. It is calculated that in Vienna alone about fifty thousand people are freed from Sunday work by the new law, the majority of whom went with their families into the suburbs, where the beer gardens as well as the rail-ways, tramways, and omnibuses have reaped an abundant harvest."

"The Viennese have had to miss their accustomed morning paper to-day. Not a single journal appeared this morning. This will henceforward be the case every Monday. A new law, which came into force a few days ago, decrees that on Sunday all trade labor should rest. Compositors and printers being likewise regarded as industrial laborers, it becomes impossible for newspapers to produce their Monday editions. Not as a church celebration of Sunday, but as a day of recreation for the workman, has the legal Sunday rest been decreed. Its duration is fixed from 6 A. M. on Sunday till 6 A. M. on Monday. The law has been well received in the industrial and working circles, although in some respects it will render the competition of Austrian industry with Germany more difficult, for a law of this kind does not exist in Germany, nor does the normal working day of eleven hours for factories exist in Germany, whereas it is actually introduced in Austria. The public has not taken umbrage to-day at the non-appearance of the morning papers; but in stirring times when important events occupy the attention in a higher degree, the newspapers will have to think of some plan to satisfy the curiosity and interest of the public on Mondays."

CHINA.

MISSION ITEMS.—It has been customary for several years to have all the choir women in the neighboring stations meet at St. Mary's school, Shanghai, on Ascension Day, and after service in the college chapel to have a quiet afternoon tea at the episcopal residence. It has always been a pleasant and profitable occasion to all who could come, and this year the numbers were unusually large. The gathering was held on the Monday following Ascension Day, that day having been cold and stormy. The broad verandahs of the bishop's house were covered with Chinese tables, and here the celestial meal and tea were served to all visitors.

On Whitsunday the bishop made a visitation to St. Paul's, at Kong Wan, and confirmed eleven persons presented by the rector, the Rev. Zn Soong Yen. Kong Wan is a town of about 12,000 inhabitants, situated several miles north of Shanghai. St. Paul's is a large and flourishing parish, and the present church edifice is inadequate to the needs of the congregation. The rector, who is entitled to the greatest credit for his successful efforts, (Kong Wan being a strong heathen centre), hopes that in a very few years funds may be forthcoming to begin the new building. The rector preached a stirring sermon in the local dialect from Gal. vi. 8, and the bishop, after the confirmation, made a brief address in the same tongue, alluding to the significance of Whitsunday and its connection with the gifts of the Holy Ghost and the laying-on of hands. The congregation seemed deeply impressed with the services, and between forty and fifty returned to the celebration of the Holy Communion.

On June 1st the bishop left Shanghai for his regular visitations to Wuchang and Hankow, and stations on the Yang Tso River.

EGYPT.

THE COPTIC CHURCH.—In continuance of the friendly communications which have been held with the Copts in Cairo by the Association for the Furtherance of Christianity in Egypt, the Rev. George Greenwood was requested by the association to proceed to Egypt in November last year, and he remained in Cairo till the middle of March last. During that period he had ample opportunities of making himself acquainted with the ecclesiastical authorities of the Coptic Church, and of studying the doctrines, discipline, and ritual of that Church. The result of his visit was embodied in a report read by him on May 15th last at a meeting of the association, and is now published in the form of a pamphlet. Mr. Greenwood not only gives us very interesting details concerning this Church, which numbers nearly half a million of worshippers, and is, as he says, the backbone of Christianity in that down-trodden land; he also makes a practical suggestion for enabling the association, or rather the Church of England, to raise the whole tone of spiritual and moral life in Egypt without seeking to draw proselytes to itself from any existing Church. This proposes to do by the establishment of a school in Cairo, combining a good secular education with religious training; the latter, he is careful to say, having no tendency to render the Coptic pupils disloyal to their Church. Such pupils, he says, would be in time well fitted for holy orders, and might possibly be sought for above others. The head of the institution should be an English clergyman, with almost autocratic power; the pupils should be resident, and the school should be open to all comers. The association, of which the Archbishop of Canterbury is president, after hearing Mr. Greenwood's paper read, accepted the proposals, and directed its committee to take steps for carrying them into effect.—John Bull.

SOUTH AFRICA.

THE NATAL TROUBLES.—A letter is published under date of April 21st, as written by a presbyter of the Colenso faction in Natal, and addressed to Dr. Gregg, senior-bishop of the "Reformed Church of England" (Cummisite), inveighing against the declination of the six prelates of the Church of England to consecrate a successor to Dr. Colenso, and stating that the next step the Colenso faction proposes to take is to go direct to the Secretary of State for a royal mandate to consecrate a new Bishop of Natal. Failing this, the writer more than hints that official communication will be opened with Dr. Gregg.

Pro contra, the London Guardian (June 17th) says that "later news from Natal seems to show that the very distinct, though courteous and well-reasoned refusal which Archbishop Colley received is producing its effect. A respectful rejoinder which Archbishop Colley has personally made exhibits a far more subdued tone than some former utterances from kindred quarters have done, and tidings of certain vestry meetings held in the Easter season by the friends and supporters of Bishop Colenso's separation, who call themselves the 'Church of England in Natal,' . . . show that they are falling out amongst themselves, and indicate, moreover, that their pecuniary resources for maintaining their position are rapidly falling away. It is plain enough that the schism will die if let alone."

The same paper says that "at Grahamstown all appears at present to be quiet."

MASSACHUSETTS.

SALEM.—St. Peter's Church.—A chime of bells, ten in number, has been placed in the tower of this church (the Rev. Dr. Charles Argy, rector). Several years ago a suggestion was made for a chime of bells to be placed in the tower of the "North Church," but the suggestion was never followed up. Within the last year the subject was brought forward again, and a deep interest created by a member of St. Peter's parish, a lady asking a subscription from three hundred and sixty-seven Church people, of one cent per day for one year. Thirty-three friends and neighbors also gave with like good will, making the number of givers four hundred. The Sunday-school also gave $150. In addition to this, and giving a rare value to the chime, are the memorial bells, given by individuals in memory of deceased members of their families. These donors were Messrs. George Peabody, A. A. Low, George A. Gardner, James B. Curwen and Benjamin W. Russell. The Parish Bell and the Rectors' Bell came from the general contributions raised by Miss Tukey; the Howard Bell was given by the Howard family, and the Safford Bell by the Safford family. The bells are from the foundry of the C. H. Meneely Bell Company of Troy, N. Y. The ringing case is set in the tower below the bells. It is firmly attached to the floor, and is connected with the clappers of the bells by wooden trackers, on the same principle as organ keys are connected with the organ valves. Instead of keys each bell is represented by a hand lever, and these levers are marked with the musical notes of the bells. The ringer stands in front of this case, a music-rack being before him, and by quickly pressing the levers the clappers are drawn against the bells. The clappers are promptly withdrawn by steel springs, which are set on the inside of the bells and are attached to the clappers by adjustable straps. This use of levers, rods and adjustable springs, allows music to be played rapidly and with expression, and is a great change from the old system of rope connections.

The Rectors' Bell is in memory of previous rectors, ten names being inscribed on it. Mr. Peabody's bell is in memory of his daughter, Mrs. Clara Endicott Payson. Mr. A. A. Low's bell is in memory of his father, Seth Low. Mr. Gardner's bell is in memory of Eliza Endicott Gardner. The Safford Bell is in memory of James Osborn Safford. Mr. James B. Curwen gives two bells in memory of Priscilla Barr Curwen and Mrs. Rebecca Hovey Curwen. Mr. Benjamin W. Russell's bell is in memory of his mother, Mrs. Betsey Cleveland Russell, and the Howard Bell is in memory of John Howard. In addition to these there is the Parish Bell, suitably inscribed. The old bell, cast in 1740, forms no part of the chime, but it will still be used as occasion may demand.

On St. Peter's day, Monday, June 29th, "the festival of the bells" was held in honor of their first use. The chimes rang out sweetly, and summoned a large congregation to participate in the special services arranged for the occasion. The church was beautifully decorated, and the surpliced choirs of St. Stephen's church, Lynn, and St. Paul's church, Peabody, were present, and, with the surpliced choir of the parish, made up a choir of sixty chorists. The professional was "Rejoice ye pure in heart," the procession entering the front door of the church, and proceeding up the middle aisle.

Evening Prayer was said by the Rev. Messrs. C. E. Barnes and George Walker. After the singing of an anthem, the rector made an impressive address, in which he briefly referred to the history of church bells, and recapitulated the story of this special chime. He concluded as follows: "The chime is for us a happy possession, but I am sure it is an unselfish one. Like our religion, it is for all, and, like the first of its graces, it will speak a language which all can understand. Though as many nationalities were represented in this large assemblage as at the first great festival of Pentecost, all could appropriate now the words of their gratified astonishment then, 'We do hear

CONNECTICUT.

MIDDLE HADNAM—Christ Church.—This parish, (the Rev. F. D. Harriman, rector,) organized April 23th, 1785, while Bishop Seabury was on his return voyage from Scotland, celebrated its one hundredth anniversary on Wednesday, June 17th.

The Middlesex archdeaconry held its business meeting at 10 A.M.

bishop then proceeded with the Communion, assisted by the rector and the Rev. Messrs. John Townsend and F. R. Sanford.

At noon the bishop, clergy, and visitors were entertained by the ladies of the parish.

At 3 P.M. the congregation reassembled in the church, and, after a brief service, a brief historical sketch of the parish was read by Mr. J. H. Stewart.

them speak in our tongues the wonderful works of God.' And we could wish that one of their first and abiding associations might henceforth be with the hymn which broke the silence of the heavens on the night of the Nativity, Glory be to God on high, and on earth peace, good will to men." The Te Deum was then sung, and the service ended with appropriate collects and the benediction.

At 11 A.M. the wardens and vestry received the bishop and clergy at the door of the school-house adjoining the church, and escorted the procession to the church. The bishop began the Communion Office, and after the Nicene Creed, administered confirmation. He then delivered a centennial address of great force and beauty, in which he applied the lessons of the past to the present and the future. The Addresses followed from the Rev. Messrs. F. W. Harriman, John Townsend, and J. L. Parks. The final address was made by the Rev. Dr. F. B. Woodward, a former rector of the parish.

The congregations at both services filled the church to overflowing. The music was well rendered by a select choir, and the people joined heartily. The church (now ninety-nine years old was beautifully decorated with flowers and plants.

There were present, besides the bishop and rector, the Rev. Dr. F. B. Woodward and the Rev. Messrs. W. A. Johnson, J. H. Betts, R. H. Tuttle, J. Townsend, J. Brush, J. L. Parks, A. I. Parsons, W. C. Knowles, R. C. Searing, F. R. Sanford, F. W. Harriman, and C. Westerman.

NEW LONDON—Eastern Archdiocesan.—The annual meeting of this archdiocesan was held in New London on Tuesday and Wednesday, June 16th and 17th. The business meeting was held in Memorial Hall. The usual appropriations and apportionments were made, and reports from the missionaries received and discussed. It was decided that the work of the Church in the town of Groton demanded that Bishop Seabury's mission should become a part of the care of the rector of St. Mark's parish, at Mystic River, a village to the east of Groton, and a resolution to that effect was adopted.

A missionary meeting was held in the evening in St. James's church, (the Rev. W. B. Buckingham, rector,) at which addresses were made by the rector, who is also the archdeacon, the Rev. Dr. E. H. Jewett, and the Rev. Messrs. G. R. Warner and Frederick Burgess.

On Wednesday the business meeting was resumed at 9 A. M. The Rev. A. P. Chapman read a carefully prepared paper on "The Confusion of Tongues."

It was determined to hold the next quarterly meeting at Pomfret, in September.

At 10:30 A. M. there was a celebration of the Holy Communion. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Stevens Parker, from St. Luke xiv. 18.

LONG ISLAND.

GARDEN CITY—Cathedral of the Incarnation.—We have already spoken of the Cathedral of the Incarnation itself, of its ornate windows and its great organ, but we cannot bring ourselves to dismiss the subject until we have said something of the other appointments and accessories which contribute so much to the beauty and solemnity of the worship of God within those consecrated walls. They are well worthy of a more elaborate notice than we can find space for, both in beauty of design and in the tasteful execution of those designs. It should not be forgotten that the object of the cathedral was two-fold. It was to be a sanctuary of the Most High and a monument of the merchant prince, to whose wealth it owes its existence; and in either character it was felt that nothing could be too elaborate and fine. God was not to be served with that which cost nothing, and what museum could be magnificent enough to be the shrine of departed worth. Zion's walls must be salvation and its gates praise, and love would fain make the resting place of the dead "a thing of beauty and a joy forever." These two thoughts were in the mind of the architect in the work as a whole and in its details. It was God's house. It was to be A. T. Stewart's tomb, and these thoughts are embodied in the costly marble and carved work.

The chancel of the cathedral consists of choir and sacristy, separated by a rail of gilded bronze. In the choir are five richly carved stalls of mahogany, with ornate canopies pierced and crocketed, being seats for the clergy, each having its præ-Dieu before it. The pavement is made of inlaid red granite and verd antique marbles with black borders, and in the centre may be seen the heraldic arms of the cathedral in brass, enameled with floriated border, presenting upon a shield three crozets and a chevron Barry, wavy with white and blue tinctures, indicating the insular jurisdiction, which is further intimated by dolphins as supporters. The crest is a ship upon waves, the well-known symbol of the Church, and the motto is "I will set His Dominion in the sea." The sacristy or sanctuary, which is paved with highly variegated Sienna and griotte marbles, rich in design, is entered by a Sienna marble step and two leaved gates, elegantly wrought in gilded bronze. The sedilia around the apsidal walls are stone, with canopies of carved stone, the bishop's chair being in the centre, slightly elevated, corresponding with the bema in the oriental basilicas. On one side in a niche elegantly canopied is the piscina, and on the other the credence with the aumbry beneath it.

The credence is a work of special beauty and symbolical meaning. Above the projecting shelf of the niche there are three establishments in sunken panels of gothic tracery, the upper one presenting the head of an angel in clouds. The one on the right contains in alto-relievo a high priest in his sacerdotal vestments, admirably sculptured in light brown stone. He stands beside an altar, upon which is lying a lamb slain, the emblem of our Lord and the type of the great sacrifice upon Calvary. Youthful figures with timbrel and censer are standing by, and suggest adoration and praise. On the other tablet is seen our Lord Himself, the anti-type of the Paschal Lamb, sitting apart and consecrating by His own benediction the wheat and the grape, a sheaf and cluster being held high by attending cherubs, the memorials of Christ's Body and Blood, and thus are seen in juxtaposition the bloody and the unbloody sacrifice. Beneath the enlacements are engraved the words, "Thou art a Priest forever after the order of Melchizedek," and upon the outer edge of the credence, "I am the Bread of Life."

The altar, of which we give an illustration, stands on a foot-piece of white marble, and was constructed of white and colored marbles by Cox & Sons, of London, the workmen being some of the best sculptors of Antwerp. The surface is carved in gothic panels, shields and varied tracery, and the projecting cornice is adorned with the passion flower, the wheat and grape and delicately wrought cherub faces. The frieze and cornice are supported at the four corners by shafts of Irish black fossil marble, with white capitals carved in flowers. There are enlacements around the sides and ends of the altar in three-quarters relief, exquisitely executed in pure Italian marble, and bordered by delicate columns of Languedoc and Sienna marbles. The subjects treated on these panels are a pictorial history of Redemption. Beginning at the rear of the altar we have the Temptation and Fall in Eden, the offering of Isaac on Mt. Moriah, Moses and the Brazen Serpent, the Annunciation, the Nativity, the Crucifixion, the Resurrection and the Meeting with the Disciples at Emmaus. Upon the top of the altar are five crosses to symbolize the five wounds of our Lord, inlaid in red griotte marble, the central and largest one showing the sacred monogram, I. H. S. The careful finish of the figures, with the high relief and other details, and the symbolic teaching of the groups, teach in a way that cannot be gainsaid that we also have an altar. The light from the thirteen windows, around the chancel, before described, adds to the effectiveness of the altar, all of whose surroundings are in harmony with the sacred place.

The baptistery of the cathedral, second only to the chancel in beauty and its fine workmanship, is apsidal in form, and adjoins the south transept and the choir. Its exterior walls are crowned with a graceful stone turret and spire, flanked by flying buttresses, and prepared for a small peal of bells. The topmost finial is surmounted by a star, the Ursa Major, on which the sun never sets, and which is therefore the significant emblem of the universal Church. The interior of the baptistery, through large arches, is open to the transept and the choir, the arches being filled with elegant wrought Gothic tracery, and having below ornate and massive bronze gates. The piers on which the gates are hung are ornamented on their sides with clustered columns of variegated marbles, three at each corner. The pavement is of inlaid marbles, white and dove color, radiating from the centre, and the wainscoting is of statuary marble with panels of verd-antique. In the angles of the walls stand columns of variegated American, French and Italian marbles, Marie Antoinette, Napoleon dove color, Languedoc, Tennessee, etc., with boldly sculptured capitals of statuary marble supporting the dome-shaped ceiling. The windows representing the personages and events alluded to in the Office of Baptism have been before described, and to that description our readers are referred.

Upon an octagonal base of two steps of white marble, in the centre of the baptistery, stands the white marble font, made by Robert Fisher of New York. The base is panelled with floriated mouldings. The stem consists of kneeling cherubs with wings and folded hands, finished in statuary marble, and the large octagonal bowl is enriched by sunken panels, which contain, in high relief, appropriate emblems: the double triangle and cross, the pelican feeding its young with its blood, the Alpha and Omega, the Dove, the I. H. S., the Lamb with cross and banner, the Chi Rho, and the Annunciation lilies. The canopy of the font rises and falls by a massive gilt chain of square links, and is carved in dark mahogany, with open panel work adorned with flowers, and doves, and around its base, in raised letters, is the legend: "One Body, One Spirit, One Lord, One Faith, One Baptism, One God and Father of all." Above the canopy is a crown, also wrought in bronze, gilded and ornamented with jewels.

The organs, before described, are enclosed in richly carved, mahogany cases, ornamented by rich, gothic panels and a profusion of flowers copied from nature, the pendant bosses consisting of fuchsias very delicately executed.

The episcopal throne or cathedra stands next to the chancel, and is very notable for its lofty and elegant canopy, shaped like a spire and perforated with exquisite tracery, giving the whole a light and pleasing effect. The dean's seat opposite is similar to the bishop's, but with a lower canopy. The stalls for the officiating clergy and chorists are also of mahogany, tastefully finished with panelled ends and finials. Upon the broad steps of the choir stand the pulpit and the lectern, both original and exceedingly happy in design, modelled by Joseph Sitbel of New York, and executed in bronze by Morris J. Powers of the New York Fine Art Bronze Foundry. Around the base of the pulpit is a group, "The Hearers of the Word," consisting of old and young in the attitude of listening, with earnest devotion, to the preaching of the Gospel. The group shows much naturalness and grace in the treatment of the figures in their various positions, standing and sitting, and the desk above is admirably supported by a cluster of branching leaves and lilies. The lectern has for its group, "Christ Blessing Little Children." The stately and benignant figure of our Lord and the eager faces of the little ones around Him express the feeling and teaching of the incident with entire success. The upper portion of the lectern consists of the eagle supporting the Bible, which, for eleven centuries, at least, has been an approved and significant emblem of the Gospel itself, perhaps as the symbol of St. John, who soared above all others in his exposition of the Divine Nature of our Lord, or perhaps, as Durandus suggests, as bearing the Word of God upon its expanded wings even unto the ends of the world.

We have thus, in three papers, given some account of the Cathedral of the Incarnation at Garden City, with its beautiful appointments, making use freely of the many notes that have been kindly sent to us, and in much using the ipsissima verba of our contributors. The erection of such a cathedral, its presentation with its endowment, see house, schools, and domain to the Diocese of Long Island, was an event unique in our history as a Church, and deserved to be commemorated; it was a matter of interest to the whole Church. Now, as we bring these papers to an end, we can not forbear to name once more the accomplished architect of this cathedral, who is also the architect of the cathedral at Omaha, Mr. Henry G. Harrison of New York City, who has given not only days and nights, but months and years, to a work which has been very near to his heart, and we can but say, Well done! Of the munificence of the venerable widow of the merchant prince, of whom the cathedral is the monument, of her counsellor and friend, Judge Hilton, and of the Bishop of Long Island, we have a fortnight spoken, and we need only add now that they have reared not only to A. T. Stewart, but to themselves as well, a monument that shall outlive the brazen statue or the enduring marble. They may not have builded wiser than they knew, but they have been wise master builders, and generations to come shall rise up to call them blessed.

BROOKLYN—St. Mark's Church.—On Sunday, June 28th, the morning service at this church was made memorial of the late Mrs. Lucy S. Haskins, the wife of the rector, the Rev. Sannel M. Haskins, D.D. Flowers and floral wreaths festooned the chancel, and the banner of the infant class of the Sunday-school, of which Mrs. Haskins had been the teacher, stood at the side of the choir draped in black. The surplised choir, under the leadership of Mr. Edward Ducharme, rendered the music, which included some especial selections, of which one was the anthem, "The Lord is Mindful of His Own." The Rev. Cornelius L. Twing, minister in charge of St. Thomas's Mission, assisted the rector in the services, and preached the sermon, his text being Ps. cxvii. 2, "He giveth His beloved sleep." At the end he said: "When one dies, as did Mrs. Haskins, after a life of sweet and holy usefulness, those who mourn her loss can almost rejoice that she has been released from the toils and cares of life to enter into the rest of Paradise. Those who knew her loved her, and thanked God for the example of a Christian life she left behind. For a quarter of a century she devoted herself with unselfishness to the work of the parish. In the Sunday-school she was a teacher of rare proficiency, especially among the smaller children of the infant class. The worshippers at St. Mark's will long remember how zealously she labored each year to make Easter Day memorable in the history of the Church, and how she adorned with her own hands the decorations of the chancel, until it has become one of the most completely appointed to be found in any sanctuary in the two cities. In all the charitable, benevolent and social work of St. Mark's, and of the Church at large, she was indefatigable. St. Mark's was to her, in the highest and holiest sense, the house of God and the gate of heaven. In life she frequently expressed the hope that she might be laid at rest beneath the shadows of the church her husband had built, and for which she had labored so long and faithfully, and her wishes have been complied with. Her life and death demonstrate the beauty of the religion of Christ, and its sweet memories will linger long in this sacred place." In closing his discourse Mr. Twing addressed a few words of sympathy and consolation to the bereaved rector, and assured him that he is tenderly remembered in the prayers of his entire congregation in this his hour of grief, even as his sympathy has been with them when they have been called upon to mourn the loss of loved ones.

BROOKLYN—St. Mary's Church.—On the Fourth Sunday after Trinity occurred the fiftieth anniversary of the ordination of the rector of the parish (the Rev. Dr. D. V. M. Johnson) to the ministry, and the occasion was made one of especial interest. The congregations, morning and evening, were large. Floral decorations adorned the altar and chancel generally, and conspicuous, in white and red carnations, were the figures "1835-1885." At morning service the rector gave details in his personal history, taking for the text of his sermon Ps. cxv. 1. After speaking of his devout thankfulness at having been permitted to see this day, he said: "I was led to leave secular employments and enter college to study for the ministry at the age of sixteen. On June 28th, 1835, I was ordained by the Rt. Rev. B. T. Onderdonk, D.D., Bishop of New York, in St. John's church, Brooklyn, with thirteen others, to the diaconate. All but four of the latter, one of them, Bishop W. I. Kip of California, have finished their work here below, and have gone to meet their Great Redeemer. I first served and preached with fear and trembling in St. John's church, then at the corner of Washington and Johnson streets, on the afternoon of the day of ordination, and went from there to Trinity church, now St. Luke's, Clinton Avenue. I was five years West, in Michigan City, Ind., and was compelled to return home, in consequence of broken health. For two years I was unable to preach at all, bronchitis having affected my voice. I afterward went to a little church, with a membership of twelve persons, at Lalip, L. I., remaining there five years, and then went to the Seamen's Mission, New York, where I remained nine years, coming to this parish in December, 1856. Since I have been here 2,675 infants have been baptized, 1,575 persons have been confirmed, 2,000 admitted to the Holy Communion, 677 couples married, and 2,388 funerals have been attended. Many old faces are missing, and I find few who greeted me when I came here."

In the evening the rector was assisted by his cousin, the Rev. Professor William A. Johnson of Middletown, Conn., the Rev. G. R. Van De Water, rector of St. Luke's, the Rev. Alfred Poole Grant, assistant-minister at St. Mary's, and others. Professor Johnson preached from II. Timothy iv. 7.

In connection with the morning service a presentation was made to the venerable rector of a purse of money, the gift of the Sunday-school and members of the parish, accompanied with a few appropriate words by the senior warden, Mr. William A. Pars. After the service a gold-headed cane, beautifully engraved, was presented to him in the vestry-room, by Mr. J. W. Shepard, in behalf of the Young Men's Guild. A new surplice, sum of money additional to that contained in the purse, and other articles also helped to testify the affection of his people.

St. Mary's is one of the most successful of free churches, having a handsome house of worship of Belleville stone, accommodations for chapel, Sunday-school, parish school, and parochial societies, and a beautiful rectory. The buildings are all elegant and substantial, and finely appointed, and toward the furnishing of the rectory the ladies supplied Dr. Johnson with $1,500. The lots on which it stands, adjoining the church, were secured by their foresight and energy, and toward the cost of this residence, when completed, one gentleman gave, in a single Easter offering, $10,000. The parish is well organized with some eight or ten effective societies for useful work. First is the Parochial Society, which, under the presidency of the rector, looks after the affairs of all the subordinate societies, and gives direction to their efforts. The others are: The Women's Benevolent Society (Mrs. R. J. Shinnell, president), its object the making of garments for the poor, clothing poor children, and ministering to the sick; the Sowers and Reapers (Miss Johnson, president), its object attending to the wants of the Sunday-school, and its libraries, and the vestry-room; the Missionary Guild (Mrs. W. T. Pelletier, president), its object missionary work generally, and the maintaining of a bed in St. John's Hospital for sick poor; the Daily Parish School (Mrs. William Diller in charge); the Sewing-school (Mrs. W. H. Pars, directress); the Young Men's Guild (J. Woolsey Shepard, master); and the Workingmen's Club (the rector president). This last, and the sewing-school and mothers' meetings are held in the Branch Sunday-school building, where, in the midst of a formerly neglected population, practical religious work of a missionary character is actively sustained.

St. Mary's is another evidence that the free church system, whenever given a fair trial, will surely be successful. The wide range of its work shows that the system has not the effect of concentrating the efforts of the people within their own circle.

NEW YORK.

NEW YORK—The Advent Mission.—The following is a corrected list of the missionaries to be employed in the forthcoming mission to be held in Advent, as also of the churches with which they are to be connected. The Rev. L. C. Du Vernet will have charge at Holy Trinity church, Harlem, the Rev. Dr. R. H. McKim, rector, while the Rev. Dr. Shackelford has engaged the Rev. C. C. Grafton to take charge of the Church of the Redeemer. The Rev. Campbell Fair has accepted as missionary for the Church of the Reconciliation, in charge of the Rev. Newton Perkins; the Rev. Dr. Francis Pigeon will have charge at the Church of the Heavenly Rest, and the Rev. G. R. Van De Water at St. Michael's. The Rev. Dr. Courtney has been engaged by the Rev. Mr. Mottet for the Church of the Holy Communion, and the Rev. Mr. Aitken as missionary to St. George's. The Rev. Dr. Watkins is in correspondence with the Rev. Mr. Atherton of England, and the Rev. Edmund Guilbert, now in England, will probably secure a missionary for the Church of the Holy Spirit. It is understood that the rectors of the Church of the Incarnation and Zion Church, the Rev. Messrs. Brooks and Tiffany, will join together in holding a mission, and that they are in correspondence with Professor William Clark of Toronto. The Rev. Alford A. Butler, rector of the Church of the Epiphany, is in communication with the Rev. Mr. Glazebrook, late chaplain of the University of Virginia. It is probable that St. Mark's church will have a mission.

The following is a list of possible missionaries who have expressed a desire to hold missions: Drs. McVicker and Currie, Phila., Messrs. Fiske of Providence, R. I., and Hart of Denver, Col.; Jenvey, Hoboken; Perry, Baltimore; Field and Maturin, Philadelphia; Bedinger, Matamoras, N. Y.; Davenport, St. John's, N. B.; Sword, Hoboken, N. J., and Riley, Nashotah, Wis.; Osborne, Hall and Munroe, Boston; Crapay, Rochester; Thompson, Woodbury, N. J.; and Mortimer, Staten Island; Larrabee, Chicago; Andrews, Washington, and Powers, Pottsville, Pa.; Vinton, Worcester, Mass.; Houghton, Salem, N. Y., and Partridge, Halifax; Munroe, Boston, and Talbot, Macon City, Missouri.

Of clergymen from abroad, the list includes Canon Clergyman Care, Rev. J. P. Waldo, Rev. R. Thornton, Notting Hill, and Canon Furse, Abbey Gardens, Westminster, all of London; Rev. J. H. Haslam, Birmingham; Prebendary F. Carter, Truro, Cornwall, England; Canon Hole, Newark-on-Trent; Rev. Sir J. E. Phillips, Westminster; Rev. J. S. Thornton, Southampton, and Rev. J. N. Thwaites, Fisherton, Salisbury. Of the English clergy named, all have had experience in holding missions.

NEW YORK—An Important Report.—At the meeting of the Calvary Branch of the Church Temperance Society, held in May, a report was read by the chairman of the committee appointed to procure statistics relative to drunkenness and breaches of the excise laws in the city of New York, which was of great interest. The report sets forth a showing of ten years from the beginning of 1875 to the end of 1884. According to the figures, there has been a decrease in the number of arrests and convictions for intemperance, the decrease in arrests amounting to 15,646, and in convictions to 9,736. In 1875, 96,091 persons were arrested for drunkenness, and of these 34,517 were convicted. Up to October 31st, 1884, on the other hand, the arrests for drunkenness numbered 20,445, and the convictions 14,781. Number of arrests for violations of the excise laws in 1875, 1,191; in 1884, 1,356, of whom 472 were convicted. The Excise Commissioners granted in 1881, 8,054 licenses when the population was 1,238,020, and in 1884

9,507 licenses when the population was 1,312,310. The increase in the number of licenses therefore was 1,453, while the increase in the population was 79,290. Inasmuch as the owner and not the saloon is licensed, the report stated that the number of licenses granted each year is greater than the number of licensed saloons, because a new license must be obtained whenever there is a change of proprietorship.

The records of the Excise Bureau show that in the year ending April 30th, 1884, there were 109 unlicensed saloons, while in the next twelve months there were 82. For the year previous, according to the United States Internal Revenue Bureau, the true number of unlicensed drinking places amounted to 1,388. These figures are considered more trustworthy than those of excise commissioners, inasmuch as the revenue collectors have no motive for concealing unlicensed places.

Another part of the report sets forth the number of drinking-places in which primaries and conventions were held by both political parties in the elections for last November. Seven congressional, eighteen assembly district, and nineteen nominating conventions for aldermen, and seven other conventions next door to such places were held by Irving Hall. Six congressional conventions, seventeen assembly district conventions, and seventeen nominating conventions for aldermen were held in saloons by Tammany Hall. Six congressional, nineteen assembly district, and nineteen aldermanic conventions were held in saloons by the County Democracy. Nine assembly district and nine aldermanic conventions were held in saloons by the Republicans. Sixteen primaries were held in saloons and eight in other places by Tammany Hall. Nineteen were held in saloons and eight in other places by Irving Hall. Four hundred and forty-three were held in saloons, and sixty-five next door were held by the County Democracy. Of the 1,092 meetings held by the County Democracy, Irving Hall, Tammany Hall, and Republicans, 633 were held in saloons, and 86 next door to saloons. In the twenty-fourth assembly district all of the 35 primaries were either held in saloons or the next door, while 508 of the 712 primary meetings were also held in saloons. This novel and exhaustive report reflects great credit on the committee, and is considered of real value.

NEW YORK—Open-Air Services.—The following is condensed from an article which appeared during the past week in one of the secular papers:

"A stirring scene may be witnessed about eight o'clock any night in the week at the northwest corner of Tompkins' Square, the great breathing-place for the masses on the east side. This neighborhood, which is sometimes called 'Dutch New York,' has often been declared the most densely populated of any portion of the earth's surface, London having nothing to compare with it. It is here that are found the large tenement-houses, of which much has been written, thirty families oftentimes occupying the front and rear house on a customary city lot. (25x100.)"

"Persons acquainted with the locality need not be told that the population is not one given to church-going, although several ecclesiastical edifices front on the square, foremost among them being the new and magnificent St. Mark's Memorial chapel, recently erected at a reputed cost of nearly $200,000. Recently it having been discovered that the mountain would not go to the prophet, one of the prophets concluded to go to the mountain, and the minister of St. Mark's chapel now holds religious services every night in the street, in front of that edifice, prior to more formal services inside, in all of which he appears to be supported by the rector of the parish, the Rev. Dr. Rylance. At the first sound of a strong voice singing some familiar hymn, men, women, and children flock from all directions to see what is going on. After a brief prayer for the multitude and a few earnest words, all are invited into the chapel, which is brilliantly lighted, the doors standing wide open, whence issue sounds of congregational music, led by a cornet accompaniment. "An occasional glance in at the door has always disclosed the fact that the chapel is well filled these hot nights with people who look, for the most part, as though they were unused to public worship."

PENNSYLVANIA.

PHILADELPHIA—Free and Open Church Association.—The Board of Council of the Free and Open Church Association, at its meeting on June 8th, passed resolutions providing that a fund be established by the association for the purpose of aiding in the erection of free churches, said fund to be held by the treasurer separately from other moneys of the association, and payments from it, except when specially designated by the donors, to be made by the order of the Board of Council only; and that the General Secretary be requested to make known, by advertising and otherwise, the fact that this fund has been established, and that contributions to it be solicited.

It was also resolved to assist the Church of the Ascension (the Rev. G. Woolsey Hedge, rector,) in the building of a free and open church in Philadelphia, as affording a favorable opportunity of testing, under suitable conditions, the value of the principles held by the association.

PHILADELPHIA—All Saints' Church (Lower Dublin).—This parish (the Rev. Frederick J. Bassett, rector,) is the mother church of all the section of Philadelphia county in which it stands, its history running back more than a century and a half. Under present ministrations it is steadily advancing in influence and usefulness. Very lately important alterations have been made in the arrangements of the interior of the edifice. The chancel end has been enlarged and improved and a place prepared for the organ, which has been removed from its former place at the door to this more suitable location adjoining the chancel. The interior has also been repainted and decorated, and new carpeting has been laid. These changes have been provided for by the offerings of the parish, which, notwithstanding the name of the precinct it occupies, enjoys one of the most attractive rural neighborhoods in the suburban portion of the city.

PHILADELPHIA—Emmanuel Church (Holmesburg).—On the afternoon and evening of Thursday, June 25th, the ladies of this parish held a "fête champêtre" on the beautiful and extensive grounds of Mr. W. A. M. Fuller. The object was to benefit a parochial interest. There was a large gathering (several hundred in number) of the members of the parish and others. The grounds, comprising extensive lawns, beautifully shaded, and the elegant villa were tastefully decorated for the occasion; tents for the sale of refreshments, flowers, and a few other articles were set up in different parts of the enclosure, and in the evening numerous Japanese lanterns, suspended from the branches of the trees, gave illumination and a picturesque effect. A band of music enlivened the scene. Lawn tennis, swings, bowls, and dancing varied the entertainment.

This parish, of which the Rev. Dr. D. C. Millet has been rector for nearly twenty-one years, is situated in the Twenty-third Ward of the city, in the midst of rural surroundings, and is enjoying increasing prosperity. The church is a substantial edifice of stone, surrounded by a large plot of ground, a considerable portion of which was lately bequeathed to the parish for burial purposes. The chapel, standing in the rear of the church, is new, and was given, by the generosity of Miss Brown, in memory of a beloved sister. It is a beautiful structure, having a parish school-room and accommodation for an infant class, Bible class, and other departments of the Sunday-school, and is available for Lenten and other weekly services. Its cost was $10,000. An excellent parish day school is maintained, numbering between forty and fifty pupils under twelve, supported in part by tuition charges, and in part by the income of invested funds, amounting at present to $11,000. Of this sum $5,000 was raised by the ladies of Emmanuel church, and $6,000 has been received through a legacy.

During his charge of nearly a quarter of a century Dr. Millett has been instrumental in building up what is now a self-supporting parish, begun as a mission at Tacony, a manufacturing suburb two or three miles distant. At this place this successful mission, known now as the Church of the Holy Innocents, (the Rev. Frederick H. Post, rector,) has a fine church, costing $10,000, and has every prospect of growth in the midst of an increasing population.

Mr. W. A. M. Fuller, on a part of whose estate of two hundred acres the lawn party was held, is one of the Central Committee having in charge the raising of $1,000,000 for missionary work, on the "five dollar enrollment plan," the fund to be presented in 1886 to the General Convention, and he is enthusiastically devoting every energy to the undertaking.

PHILADELPHIA—St. Peter's Church, Germantown.—The services in this church (the Rev. Dr. T. S. Rumney, rector,) on Sunday, June 28th, were of great interest. A special service for the Sunday-school was held in commemoration of St. Peter's Day. The children entered the church singing a processional hymn with great heartiness. Each class had its appropriate banner, and its teacher in charge. The church was beautifully decorated with flowers, and the children's voices joined in very sweetly with the well-trained voices of the choir in the hymns. The rector addressed the children in a few simple words on the life and character of St. Peter, also bringing before them the practical use and value of Sunday-school training.

UPPER MERION—Anniversary of Christ Church.—The one-hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of Christ church, generally called the "Old Swedes" church, Upper Merion, (the Rev. A. A. Marple, rector,) was held on Sunday, June 28th, and was marked by the presentation to the parish, on behalf of friends in Sweden, of a handsome granite baptismal font. The day was also made the occasion of a sort of reunion, many of the old members of the church attending the services. There were also present Lars Westergaard, the Swedish Consul at Philadelphia; Frederick Ferdinand Myhertz, Consul for Denmark; F. Delvigne, the acting Consul for Germany; Mr. Ewert of Norristown, and Gothare Beestjerna of Conshohocken, beside others of Swedish descent, who had an interest in the parish.

The little church was tastefully decorated with flags and plants. Over the arch of the chancel recess Swedish flags were crossed, and similar banners were hung in the transepts and within the chancel. American flags were draped above the altar. Cut flowers, of brilliant hue, were arranged along the chancel rail, while upon the altar and retable cut flowers, ferns, and growing plants were grouped.

After the sermon, which was by the Rev. Dr. C. A. Maizon, rector of St. James's, Kingessing, from Col. i. 10, the members of the vestry and the Swedish consul advanced to the front of the church, when Dr. George W. Holstein read a letter from C. Ghulin Daunfeldt, Consal General of the Swedish Government to Finland, stating that the font was a gift to Christ church, as a memorial of the visit of the Swedish officials in 1876 to the church, and as a token of honest affection. "Originally," Dr. Holstein said, "the three churches, Gloria Dei, Philadelphia, St. James, Kingessing, and Christ church, Upper Merion, were united under one mission, and were under the guidance and fostering care of the Swedish Government, which kept them supplied with clergymen. A number of years ago, after the Swedish language had been superseded by the English, and the parishes had become self-sustaining, St. James's church (in 1844) and Gloria Dei church (1845) united formally with the Diocese of Pennsylvania, while Christ church, Upper Merion, pronounced its individuality, which it maintains to the present day. While it conforms to the regulations and ceremonies of the Protestant Episcopal Church, yet it remains independent in its action and loyal in feeling to the Church of Sweden. This fact excited the interest of Prince Oscar and the royal retinue of seventy or eighty naval, army, and civil officers to visit this old church in a body on July 3d, 1876, and who were entertained by members of the congregation. This beautiful baptismal font now comes as an evidence that the parish is still borne in grateful remembrance by loving hearts in the fatherland, and will serve as a precious link in the chain that binds them together, instilling into the rising generation here a deeper veneration than ever before experienced for the nationality from which they sprang and to which they owe so much."

Mr. Westergaard then formally presented the font, on behalf of the Swedish donors, to the vestry and congregation of the parish.

The gift was accepted by the rector, the Rev. Mr. Marple. He spoke of the fostering care of the Government of Sweden, and of the many reasons why the people of his parish should be proud of the history of that nation and the great men it had produced. The church was built in 1760, when the mission was under the care of the Rev. Charles Magnus Wrangle, who afterwards went back to Sweden and became one of the court preachers. St. James's church was built at the same time. The Rev. Dr. Nicholas Collin was the last rector of the United Missions, and the last sent here by the Swedish Government. He came before the Revolution, but was here nearly half a century. At an early period in the history of the missions, Dr. Collin invited clergymen of the Episcopal Church to serve as his assistants in the charge of the different churches, and the service of the American Church was used. This continued for many years, so that, as a consequence, the churches naturally passed into the communion of the Protestant Episcopal Church. Among those who had been sent from Sweden, and who had officiated in the church, the rector mentioned Kalm, the well-known botanist, whose name is associated with that of the laurel. Mr. Marple concluded with a reference to the Sacrament of Baptism and Christ's commission to his apostles to go unto all nations, making them disciples and baptizing them in the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.

After the singing of a hymn, the rector read a series of Collects from the Baptismal Office, from the Office for the Consecration of a Church, and that for Saints Simon and Jude's Day, consecrating the new font. The font is of red polished Swedish granite from the famous quarries at Westerlitz, and is somewhat in the form of a challice, having a rounded bowl and rather slender support. Around the bowl is the inscription, "Sweden's Blessings to Sweden's Children."

A brief address by the Rev. Mr. Bull and the Benediction concluded the services. In the afternoon the Sacrament of Baptism was administered to a number of children of the parish, the font being then used for the first time.

CHAD'S FORD—St. Luke's Church.—At the Easter election at this church (the Rev. J. J. Sleeper, rector,) Mrs. C. H. Baker and Mrs. Vincent Graff were chosen members of the vestry. The bishop at first declared the election not in keeping with the laws of the State of Pennsylvania, women not being eligible to the office. The bishop, however, has revoked his decision, and these ladies will be duly accepted as members of the vestry.

PITTSBURGH.

HOUTZDALE—Holy Trinity Church.—A correspondent writes under date of June 24th: It was the writer's privilege to come with the Bishop of Pittsburgh to this town, which is the centre of the bituminous coal field on the eastern slope of the Allegheny Mountains, when he first visited this region three years ago. The services of faithful missionaries and of the late lamented Kerfoot had been previously given as regularly and as frequently as circumstances would permit; and both the memory and the fruits of these visits are present to-day. But, after such preparatory work, progress is often rapid and great. Certainly there is very much to encourage home mission work in the experience of the last three years in this region. On the occasion first named the invading band of the bishop and three presbyters was invited to occupy the Primitive Methodist's House of Worship; and although laymen and women, trained to the Mother Church of England and her worship, were ready to assist, there was none to sit at the organ and to lead the chanting and the hymns of the Evening Prayer save the bishop. He played, he sang, he read, he preached, and set everybody else to work, and infused new life into the old organization, into the little band of devoted children of the Church resident here.

On the occasion of this his fifth visit to Houtzdale it is again the writer's privilege to come with the bishop and to note the changes which have been wrought. A neat and well-appointed church, seating two hundred and fifty people, has been built and nearly paid for. About fifty persons have been confirmed. Many have been baptized and comforted in sickness and in health by the ministrations, which have been continuous for more than two years. There is a large number of communicants, drawn from the number of those who in England were taught their Christian duty, and have not been unmindful of it. Others, doubtless, have learned here all that they know of the Church's ways; and others have been reclaimed from their wanderings to the bosom of the Church again. One faithful deacon has left here the impress of his zeal and devotion, for his earnest love for the Church and for this mission. Costly memorial offerings on the altar, whenever the sacrificial feast is made, still testify of him and of his ministry here. His successor, not old in the priesthood, has taken up his work and carries it on successfully, while the deacon, promoted, is exercising his priestly office in the Diocese of Central Pennsylvania; and to-day, a faithful, devoted layman, trained here under the first pastor named, has been admitted to the sacred Order of Deacons, that he may continue therein, self-supporting, and increase his labors in behalf of the parish and its neighboring mission fields. Surely such results, which are only parts of what might be reported, are evidences enough of the harvest which may often be reaped in home fields close at hand, if only our clergy and our people are mindful of the opportunities and of the agencies which await our activity.

The population around this busy center is not less than 15,000 souls. Its annual business cannot be estimated at less than $1,000,000; and it must be very gratifying to the good and wise young Bishop of Pittsburgh to find that his well-aimed, well-delivered blows at this stronghold of indifference of sin and neglect are breaking down the barriers which separated multitudes from the knowledge and the love of God in His holy Church. Of course we are not alone in working for the Master here; but none can fail to see that the Church has a name and a power which man can neither give nor take away, while results show that even the weakest of Christ's servants, in His name and in His way, can work wonders of love and mercy.

There were present and officiating in Holy Trinity church, Houtzdale, this morning, with the Rt. Rev. Dr. Cortlandt Whitehead, the Rev. H. G. Miller, who preached the ordination sermon on the nature and duties of the ministerial office; the Rev. Samuel P. Kelly, the General Missionary of the Diocese, and the Rev. Mr. Van Waters, the rector, all of the Diocese of Pittsburgh. Also, the Rev. Dr. Clerc, of Philipsburg, (Diocese Central Pennsylvania) who, as one of his examiners, presented the candidate, Mr. A. S. R. Richards.

Very soon, no doubt, the small debt remaining on the building will be paid, and the parish will keep holy day in its rejoicings at the consecration. Who will send an offering for home missions in the Diocese of Pittsburgh to Mr. H. L. Foster, treasurer, Oil City, Pa.!

MARYLAND.

ANNE ARUNDEL COUNTY—Convocation.—The Convocation of Annapolis held its semi-annual meeting on Tuesday and Wednesday, June 16th and 17th, at All Saint's Mission, Anne Arundel county. There were present ten clergymen and a number of lay representatives. Sermons were preached by the Rev. Messrs. T. C. Gambrill and W. H. H. Powers, and on Tuesday evening a missionary service was held, at which addresses were made by the dean and the officers.

During the afternoon of Tuesday the Rev. Dr. DeLew read a carefully prepared exegesis of St. Luke xxiii. 43. The paper gave rise to a discussion in which many of the members took part.

Business meetings were held each day. The special building fund, amounting to about $150, was appropriated to the use of the Rev. Dr. J. M. Dashiell to assist in the erection of a chapel on Solomon's Island, Calvert county, subject to the sanction of the work by the bishop.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—An Old-fashioned Visitation.—In some old records of the Church in the District of Columbia, is the record of a visitation of St. John's church, Washington, made by the then Bishop of Maryland, the Right Rev. Dr. Kemp, in 1825, during the rectorate of the Rev. Dr. William Hawley. The bishop "visited" the parish, summoned the wardens and vestry, and made a strict official investigation of all the affairs of the parish, both religious and financial, after the mode provided by the canons of the Church of England. He seems to have had no special object beyond that of keeping up the custom, and of preventing the episcopal prerogative from lapsing. It is believed that this was the last of the old-fashioned "visitations" in this country, certainly in this diocese.

WEST WASHINGTON, D. C.—Grace Parish.—The Rev. C. C. Griffith, the recently elected rector of this parish, finds the work waiting his best energies. The value of the church is supposed to be $20,000; about one hundred and fifty people form the parish, and though the work is among the poorer people, they raise some $200 yearly for parochial purposes. The church seats about two hundred and seventy-five people, and was built by the liberality of the late Henry D. Cooke.

WEST WASHINGTON, D. C.—The Memorial Statue of the late Bishop Finkney.—The memorial marble statue of the late Bishop of Maryland, executed by Doyle and presented by Mr. W. W. Corcoran, bears the inscription, "Sacred to the memory of the Right Reverend William Pinkney, born April 17, 1810, died July 4, 1883. Placuit Deo, et translatus est in Paradisum."

VIRGINIA.

FAIRFAX COUNTY—Theological Seminary.—The commencement exercises of this seminary began on St. John Baptist's Day, June 24th. The sermon before the Alumni Society was preached by the Rev. Dr. J. H. Elliott.

In the evening the annual sermon to the Missionary Society was preached by the Bishop of Maryland, Evening Prayer having been said by the Bishops of Kentucky and West Virginia.

On Thursday the members of the senior class read their essays, and in the afternoon the bishop of the diocese presented the diplomas, the sermon being preached by the Rev. Dr. Joshua Peterkin.

The ordination occurred on Friday, June 26th. The bishop of the diocese admitted to the diaconate Messrs. J. C. Hobson, J. C. Jones, W. N. Meade, K. S. Nelson, and G. S. Somerville; the Bishop of West Virginia admitted to the diaconate Mr. H. T. Wigram; and the assistant-bishop advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Messrs. J. C. Fair, W. R. Savage, and W. J. Page.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

CHARLESTON—Standing Committee.—At the annual diocesan convention there was a contest with regard to the organization, on account of the presence on the clergy list of two clergymen whom a number of members declared to have no right to seats. Under the decision of the bishop, following a non-concurrence of orders on the vote, the two clergymen retained their seats. Several members of the convention filed a protest, and some now take the ground that the convention was illegally organized, and that its acts are consequently invalid.

At a meeting of the Standing Committee elected by the convention, held on Wednesday, July 1st, resolutions were adopted declaring that there were doubts of the legality of the convention, but that eight of the ten members, being old members, were qualified as holding over, if they were not qualified by election of the convention, and that the committee could therefore organize and fill the two (claimed) vacancies.

The Rev. Dr. A. T. Foster filed a protest against the action of the committee, and declined to vote, as by so doing he would admit a doubt of the legality of the convention.

TENNESSEE.

SEWANEE—Convocation.—The convocation of Nashville held its regular meeting at Sewanee on Friday, June 19th. There were present the Rev. Drs. W. C. Gray, H. R. Howard, and F. A. Shoup, and the Rev. Messrs. T. F. Martin, P. A. Fitts, M. G. Moore, C. J. Hendley, C. M. Gray, W. G. G. Thompson, and H. P. Grabau of the clergy, and Messrs. W. Simmons, J. Aylettle, S. Jones, E. Rop, Y. Hardin, and F. Rivers of the laity.

The treasurer made his annual report, showing that over $550 had been raised, and there was upwards of $125 in hand.

The Rev. Dr. W. C. Gray was elected dean, the Rev. W. G. G. Thompson secretary, and the Rev. C. M. Gray treasurer.

The Otey School was reported in a prosperous condition, and it will open in September, probably under the headmastership of the Rev. C. J. Hendley. The convocation unanimously voted the headmaster $100 on resuming the work in September.

WISCONSIN.

NASHOTAH—Commencement Exercises.—On Monday, June 29th, St. Peter's Day, commencement exercises at Nashotah House took place according to the customs long observed in that now venerable institution. The services of the day began with the usual Saint's Day celebration at 7 A.M. Morning Prayer was said at 9, and immediately after its conclusion a procession was formed in the Old Chapel, and proceeded in customary order to the newer building, which is at once the chapel of the seminary and the parish church of the neighborhood. The 29th falling this year on Monday, it was inconvenient for many of the clergy to be present. In the procession, however, were the bishop of the diocese, the Bishop of Fond du Lac, the faculty of Nashotah House, the dean of the cathedral, the Rev. Preliminary Loughborough of St. Alban's Cathedral, England, the Rev. Drs. E. P. Wright and F. W. Boyd, the Rev. Messrs. John Francis, C. Ellis Stevens, O. S. Prescott, L. H. Schnbert, J. Ulric Graf, and Rene Vilatle. Later in the day the Bishops of Indiana and of Western Michigan arrived, together with the Rev. Dr. W. Delafeld, the Rev. Messrs. W. Dafter, and C. T. Snsan. Immediately after entering the church the sermon was preached by the Bishop of Fond du Lac, after which the degree of Bachelor in Divinity was conferred in course upon the Rev. Messrs. Chas. H. Lemon, Allen C. Prescott, N. D. Stanley of the senior class, and ad eundem upon the Rev. Messrs. C. Ellis Stevens and John Francis. The Holy Eucharist was then proceeded with, the bishop of the diocese being the celebrant.

Luncheon was served at the conclusion of the service, and immediately after the clergy and guests proceeded by carriages and other conveyances to the village of Delafeld near by, to assist at the laying of the cornerstone of the Bishop Armitage Dormitory of St. John's Hall. This school was founded by the Rev. Dr. De Koven, and after a lapse of many years has been revived in that beautiful village by the Rev. Sidney T. Smythe, A.B., a graduate of St. Stephen's College, Annandale. This school has been in operation for the year past, and its revival has been attended with signal success. Its purpose is to provide for lads of limited circumstances that preparation for college which is secured at higher rates in schools beyond the reach of that class of youths. The terms are $210 per year, and it is hoped that this school may provide for a long-felt want in our educational system. A procession was formed in the old schoolhouse used by Dr. De Koven. A long line was formed, headed by a cross-bearer, and consisting of the pupils of the school, visiting clergy, faculty of Nashotah, and the four bishops already mentioned. Upon arriving at the spot where the ceremonies were to take place the office of the laying of the cornerstone was conducted by the bishop of the diocese, the Bishop of Fond du Lac, and the Bishop of Western Michigan, address being made by the bishop of the diocese and the Bishops of Indiana and Fond du Lac, the Rev. Dr. W. Delafontaine and the Rev. Prebendary Loughborough.

At 6 P. M. a reception took place at the house of the president of Nashotah House, and was attended by the clergy and other guests of the day.

On Sunday, the 29th, two interesting events took place at Nashotah. At 8 A. M. the Holy Eucharist was celebrated by the Rev. Rene Vilatte, a young priest just ordained by the Bishop of Berne, Monsignor Herzog, at the request of the Bishop of Fond du Lac, for a special missionary work among the Belgians of the Diocese of Fond du Lac. There are thirty thousand of these in this young diocese, and a large proportion of them, while holding their ancient Catholic faith, have yet been alienated from the Papacy. Providentially, Mr. Vilatte, a devout and gifted Frenchman, offered himself for this work, to which his heart was especially drawn. The condition of things demanding his immediate presence among the Belgians, with the full qualifications of the priesthood, and the American canons compelling a longer delay than seemed expedient in the matter of his ordination, a swift excellent was found in a request made by the Bishop of Fond du Lac to Bishop Herzog, of Berne, that Mr. Vilatte receive the priesthood as soon as possible from his hands. Bishop Herzog kindly complied with this request, and in three days Mr. Vilatte was advanced from deacon's orders to the priesthood, according to the Old Catholic rite of the Swiss Church. Mr. Vilatte will at once begin his work among the Belgians, under the direction of the Bishop of Fond du Lac.

The second matter of interest referred to was a sermon preached by the Rev. C. Ellis Stevens upon missionary work among the Jews. From it we learn that in the present century more than one hundred thousand Israelites have been gathered into the Church through the Mission of the Anglican Communion.

The friends of Nashotah will be glad to know that the applications for admission to the next junior class are in larger number than in a number of years past. The authorities at Nashotah are confident that her work is not over, but that God will care for her in the future as in the past. There seems to be no question as to her students—the only question is as to her support and endowment. No one can gaze upon her beauties of land and water, sky and bright air, or upon the monuments here left of the piety of her founders, without the conviction that God will give that perpetual existence to this foundation of faith, which he seems to have given to so many of the similar foundations of antiquity.

CALIFORNIA.

SAN FRANCISCO—Bishop Kip's Golden Wedding.—The bishop of the diocese celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his ordination to the priesthood, and his golden wedding, by giving a public reception at his residence on Wednesday, July 1st. The occasion was taken advantage of by each congregation to present a special gift, besides the gift of a purse contributed by all the parishes and missions in the diocese.

The bishop was congratulated heartily by all his friends, and the double anniversary was honored by the people of the city, who testified to their respect both for the bishop and the citizen.

COLLEGIATE AND ACADEMIC.

ST. STEPHEN'S COLLEGE, ANNARDALE, N. Y.—In view of the numerous exercises at St. Stephen's College, the following was omitted from want of space:

At three o'clock a beautiful collation was served in the college dining hall. At the conclusion of the feast, the Rev. Dr. Fairbank, the warden of the college, moved that a telegram be sent to the venerable Bishop of Berne, expressing our grateful remembrance of him, our kind appreciation of his past services to the college, and our best wishes for his future happiness. The resolution was unanimously adopted by a rising vote. The warden then turned to the Rev. Dr. Fairbank, who remarked that there was a tradition that at previous commencement of St. Stephen's college, his predecessor had been called upon for a speech at that stage of the proceedings, and had been reminded that it was the habit of saying that this was the happiest day of his life. Whereupon, as he duly bowed he reiterated the remark. As for himself he thought it would be well to introduce an innovation into the customary usage. However, excellent the speeches were, which were delivered on the stage at the commencement exercises, if they were repeated year after year by the same individuals, the audience would, after a time clamor for a change. There ought to be a similar variety in the after-dinner speeches. He would, therefore, suggest that the warden, and others should be allowed, each year, to select some of the young men to speak for them. He thought they would, if they would, say some things about the college that they did not hear from the platform. Referring in very flattering terms to the college's administration, which when he first made his acquaintance, he supposed that his name, Fairbank, was given to him on account of the fairness and equity of his administration. He had only one complaint to make, and that was that the stars were not conveniently advanced in his ritualism. The evening before, when he was in the college chapel, he had only two lights burning on the altar. He thought of consideration for those who were getting on their feet, whose eyes might get a good deal as he had formerly been, it would be well to multiply that number.

John Bard, the founder of St. Stephen's College, who has been in Europe for the last sixteen years, but is now with his daughter, spending the summer in New Haven, being invited to address the assembly, was very cordially received. He testified to his love for the college, and to his firm confidence in the future of the Church. Standing in this place, in this beloved Annardale, which was to him sanctified by the memory of one who has now departed, he seemed to see in a camera, all the events connected with the birth of the college since its foundation before him. In the commencement of his paper, he contained the following words: "To be erected in faith, and consecrated to the service of Almighty God by loving parents, as a mark of their love for the life of Willy Bard, the child that spirit that the first church was erected; and when, on that gloomy night, it sank amid the devouring flames, I felt as if my hand were on the cradle of his beloved wife, with her hand on the cradle of their only son, who raised him to renewed exertions, and to a more courageous trust."

"We are invited here to-day for no mere holiday enjoyment. We are invited to confer together for the purpose of an important work, the work of Christ. There is a stern conflict going on in the world between truth and error, between true Christianity and false religion. We are engaged in a hard-to-keep conflict with the world, the flesh, and the devil. Let us be well aware of the importance of the struggle, and let us be well aware of the money to carry on the contest. We must have well-trained leaders. The Church needs St. Stephen's College. She is doing a work of supreme importance under the direction of our esteemed warden. He is a man who enjoys the respect of the whole Church. He is the truest man I ever knew. But he must be helped. If he is properly supported he will build up here an institution that will honor to the Church. Other nations have their abodes and their seminaries, and we must look well to our moorings."

There are some facts connected with the founding of St. Stephen's College which are not generally known. Forty years ago the Society for the Promotion of Religion and Learning reported that their members were desirous of purchasing the premises for want of an institution in which to educate their students. Those whom they had heretofore educated in the diocese entered the diocesan college. They were themselves prevented by their charter from investing their money in buildings, but would establish a diocesan Church College, and send the men for the ministry, if some one else would erect the necessary structures. Bishop Walworth urged Mr. Bard to take up this work, and to take part in it with all his influence, to make his summer residence near it, and to take part in the work of the Society. Mr. Bard was then at New York, and Springfield. In consequence of these earnest pleas, Mr. Bard resolved to undertake the work. The object was to erect a building, which was called the attention of the Church more generally to religious enterprises. The Society for the Promotion of Religion and Learning next commenced the issue of five of their most influential members, to give of their interviews and correspondence with Mr. Bard, and of the deliberations of the diocesan college. A preliminary contract or agreement was at length entered into between the Society and the diocese, the first and most important part, for whose completion the diocese was organized. The Society for the Promotion of Religion and Learning, and the diocesan party, whose scholars were here to be educated under Church influence leading to the ministry; and Mr. Bard, the founder of the endowment, as the third party. Mr. Bard agreed, on his part, to turn over to the diocese a thousand dollars a year to erect, The society promised to adopt and support the college. And the convention recognized it as the diocesan college of the diocese. That it is now the Diocesan College of New York. There is, there can be no other.

Mr. Bard to contribute one more item of information. Sixty or seventy years ago, according to the testimony of Mr. James F. De Peyster, Trinity church was founded by a thousand dollars a year to support the college, which was then within the limits of the Diocese of New York. A few years later, Trinity church was separated from the diocese, and the diocese to discharge this obligation for a time, in its behalf. The society has, as Mr. Bard understood, paid this money since. But Trinity church is now quite able to fulfill its own obligations. It ought to relieve the society from this burden. It may be free to put this money to the use of St. Stephen's, the adopted and long recognized college of the society and of the diocese.

Mr. Deen being called upon to speak, not as the Dean, but as a Dean of the General Theological Seminary, responded in a few graceful words, in which he said that he accounted it one of the greatest honors of his life that he had a small part in laying the foundation of the Diocese of Albany. He said that he was deeply impressed with the words of Mr. Bard. That he was glad to see the great work of St. Stephen's College in this great metropolitan diocese was to him a matter of surprise. If any thing were to be done in the diocese, he would rally around it, and support it. If New York cannot take care of this college, surely of a piece from the northward, paid this money since. But Trinity church is now quite able to fulfill its own obligations. It ought to relieve the society from this burden. It may be free to put this money to the use of St. Stephen's, the adopted and long recognized college of the society and of the diocese.

The same day being called upon to know that the Bishop of Albany had been prowling around the streets of New York all winter, and that he had carried out a great deal of money, he would not give an account. New York, however, was willing to build cathedrals for all the five dioceses in the State. He was glad to see that the diocese did not have St. Stephen's College. Judge Forsyth had evidently misunderstood Mr. Bard, if he supposed that he was going to give up the diocese. He had no doubt about the maintenance of this institution. If the venerable society would not furnish the forty thousand dollars that were needed, it would get it from some other source.

After a few remarks by the Rev. Dr. Tucker of Troy, and a few remarks by the Rev. Dr. Deane, newly elected President of the Alumni, the hour of departure arrived, and a very delightful day was brought to a close.

ST. MARY'S HALL, FAIRBANK, MINN.—The commencement exercises of the diocese of Minnesota on the morning of Tuesday, June 10th. The exercises began with a choral service, after which an essay, by Rev. Dr. Fairbank, was read. It was on the subject of Mary Peabody of the graduating class. It was a portrayal of the difficulties and possibilities of life. The subject was very timely, and would not be great and prolonged toil up steep and rugged paths, but a brave heart and steady purpose would be able to attain the goal beyond. The essay contained many excellent thoughts expressed in a manner creditable alike to the student and the teacher. The exercises were a valuable one was appropriate in his conception and graceful in its expression.

There were fifty or more addresses, and announced the awards. Fifty seven pupils have received the testimonials of the school. Their names follow in the order of the ranking: Miss Anna Louise, Jeanne Tower, Jessie Hart, Gertrude Norrish, Maud Pratt, Julia Booth, Mary Peabody, Nellie Schaeffer, Harriet Gustafson, Stella Whiting, Olive Joushite, Fannie Wood, Nellie Leaming, Emily Webster, Fannie Peake, Marian Brown, Genevieve Davis, Annie Dennis, Alberta Gilmore, Amy Tanner, Stella Cole, Inez Aldrich, Elsie McKusick, Eva Whipple, Clara Taylor, Theresa Pratt, Frances Foster, Anna Deane, Crofoot, Bernice Parkhill, Emma Carpenter, Rose Cutler, Josephine Peyton, Mary Wilson, Pauline Pettit, Gertrude Pratt, Frances Pratt, Anna Deane, Baird, Nellie Foster, Cora Richardson, Gertrude Briggs, Grace Jack, Maggie Bythe, Frances Schaeffer, Gertrude Pratt, Gertrude Pratt, Gertrude Pratt, Grace Gillett, Kittie Strickland, Helen Lovatt, Grace Gilmore, Lillian Pratt, Mary Baker, Stella Nichols, Nellie Whiting, Adelaide Pritchard, Fannie Wiley, May Holloway.

CLERGY LIST OF THE AMERICAN CHURCH.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Will you kindly give me space in your columns to call the attention of my brethren of the clergy to a work in which they are specially interested. During the early spring a circular and blank form was issued to them concerning a complete clergy list, to compile as completely as possible all the colonial clergy, all the ordinations in the American Church since Seabury's first ordination, and to give a list of those clergy at work in the Church just after the Revolution. The work has been begun, and some progress has been made in it, but as yet only a little over eight hundred clergy, or about one-fourth of the number addressed, have responded. It is important that their public work should be correctly stated in such a volume. We have a certain public relation to the Church and to the nation which for their own accurate records ought to receive from us an accurate statement of our public work in their behalf. Indirectly, also, as material for future history, for the correction of dates, for the supplemental corroboration of important facts, for the better arrangement of statistics, such a book as this now projected will be invaluable to our own Church work. No private geography is asked of any living clergyman. With these few words of explanation, the front of the book, I appeal to my brethren for aid, not alone by the return of their own properly filled forms, but by such information (or by such hints as may open to me sources of desired information) that may be in their power about those of our clergy who have died. I have already received many very useful hints and addresses of persons of our descendants of clergy—who can give me the data I need. It will be a long and toilsome task. From the toil the editor does not shrink, but he must feel anxious to attain all possible accuracy, for upon this depends the value of the work. No pains will be spared to effect this, but it can only be attained by the aid he seeks from his brethren.

It is especially important that all facts about the older clergy should be gathered up and preserved. It is not intended to make the work a repository of ana, or a vehicle for eulogium, however just or deserved, of our fathers and predecessors in the work, but it is intended to state the facts of their work as concisely and as truthfully as possible; and of such as have been leaders or organizers to give a very brief outline of the special work with which they have been entrusted.

All communications relative to the work will be very promptly replied to. Forms and circulars will be furnished, on application, to such brethren as may need them. The editor also asks to be entrusted with memorial sermons and obituary notices, especially of the clergy who have died before 1840. All material entrusted to him will be carefully used, and promptly returned with thanks.

His present address is 1413 Delaware Avenue, 1st September 1st, when it will be Delaware College, Newark, Del.

THE GREEK CHURCH IN ALASKA.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Recent movements in missionary circles make me bold enough to believe that the names of the few Greek priests and the places where they labor in Alaska may not be without interest at this particular juncture: At Sitka, the Rev. N. Mitropolsky; at Kodiak, the Rev. N. Resnik; at Kenai, the Rev. Nikita (monk); at Nushagak, the Rev. V. Siskhien; at Belkowsky, the Rev. M. Galanatoff; at Island of Woonaska, two lay-readers—one a creole; at the Island of Atka, the Rev. N. Dobrovolsky; at St. Michael, the Rev. Zachariah Belokoff; at the Island of St. Paul, the Rev. Ernest Lestenokoff; at the Island of St. Paul, the Rev. Paul Shaeshnikoff. At San Francisco the Russo-Greek Church has a training-school for the sons of the clergy in Alaska and candidates for Holy Orders. From personal acquaintance with these boys and young men, I can bear testimony to the dignity, devotion, and earnestness of their characters. The archpriest, the Rev. Father Vladimir Westhoff, with his wife and lovely children, reside in San Francisco, which is at present the ecclesiastical centre.

The services at the Russo-Greek chapel, in that city, especially at the greater festivals, are largely attended by most fervent worshippers—the men always outnumber the women. The influence of the Greek Church in San Francisco among sailors, fishermen, and the common people of all the Slav races, that are so numerous in that cosmopolitan city, is very broad and deep.

Our own dear Church has only of late manifested any fervent missionary spirit for the conversion of the unclean classes of society. Our Gospel has thus far, however, we catch a few large fish, but the small fry escape. Whether our fishermen would do better work among the icebergs of Alaska is an open question.

The poverty-stricken natives of Alaska content annually to their mother Church. Our Gospel has thus far, however, we catch a few large fish, but the small fry escape. Whether our fishermen would do better work among the icebergs of Alaska is an open question.

It would be a great step toward Catholic unity could the General Convention, through its Committee on Ecclesiastical Relations, secure from the Holy Synod at Moscow to the consecration of an American bishop for the Church in Alaska.

Unless the ecclesiastical authorities of the Alaskan Church consent, have we any more right to enter that territory than we have to send our missionaries to Siberia?

"INSTRUCTING" DEPUTIES.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

A tendency is observable in connection with prospective action on the "Enrichment" question, by the next General Convention, to anticipate such action by diocesan conventions, in the shape of "instructions" given to deputies as to how their vote shall be cast. Now, if we rightly apprehend the Provision requiring action by two successive General Conventions on proposed changes in the constitution and Prayer Book contemplates not action simply, but action after due deliberation, so that every deputy will vote under the fullest light, not as bound and fettered by "instructions" previously given. If grave questions can be settled beforehand by the dioceses in separate convention, why have any constitutional provision requiring action by the General Convention? Why not remit them to the dioceses altogether? Is not the evident design that the Church may have the collective wisdom of the whole body something more than the wisdom represented by the sum total of dioceses in their separate capacity? It is true that the dioceses, in sending their representatives to the General Council of the Church, do so with the knowledge, officially communicated, of changes proposed, and will naturally make choice of those representing their several preferences. But for a deputy to be sent to the General Convention to which stands not for his own best enlightened judgment at the time, but as representing the previous decision of a diocesan convention, is a wrong inflicted upon the whole Church. No one should accept an election as deputy under any absolute and binding conditions.

THEREWITH, NOT THEREIN.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Will you be good enough through your excellent paper to call the attention of the Committee on Revision of Prayer Book to the prayer of consecration for baptism of infants, and to the words "baptized therein," when the infant is not to be immersed. It has seemed to me not correct to so shew therein, when the infant is only to be "baptized therewith," by having the water applied. I have for years past felt a hesitancy in using the word "therein," when common sense requires, as I think, some other word to express sprinkling or pouring. As I have seen no one refer to this subject, I thought I would venture thus far to ask for ripe information.

NEW BOOKS.

THE ENGLISH SCHOOL OF PAINTING. By ERNEST CROSWELL. Translated by L. N. Eberington, with a Preface by Professor Ruskin.

THE FLEMISH SCHOOL OF PAINTING. By PROFESSOR A. J. WATERS. Translated by Mrs. Henry Russel. [New York: Cassell & Co. 1884.] pp. xliii., 399. 42s.

These two admirable volumes belong to the Fine Art Series, which the publishers are supplying to artists and all friends of art, and which, if we may judge from the volumes already issued, bids fair to become an art library of great value. The first of these two books has the cordial endorsement of Prof. Ruskin, who speaks in the very highest terms of it and of its author; and the second has had the honor of being crowned by the Royal Academy of Belgium. It is a singular fact that M. Chesneau, the author of "The English School of Painting," is a Frenchman, who is not only every way competent to the work he has undertaken by his long familiarity with English art, but is especially so by his entire freedom from what might be supposed to be his national prejudices and partialities. He is French, and can do justice to English art. He is able to discern its merits, and everywhere bestows generous praise, too generous, if we may trust to Mr. Ruskin, who, with his trenchant criticism, is ready to wound and to turn the knife in the wound. The work of M. Chesneau is divided into two parts. In the first he treats of the Old Masters, beginning with Hogarth in 1730 and extending to 1850. Every notable name in the long interval is made the subject of intelligent criticism and remark, and in nearly all cases one or more examples are given of their works by reproducing them in a wood engraving, a very great help to the reader. Hogarth, Reynolds, Gainsborough, Lawrence, Fuseli, Benjamin West, a countryman of our own, Wilkie, MacIver, J. M. W. Turner, and many others; the old masters of England are here portrayed in portrait, historical and genre painting. Every page is full of interest, well written and translated. The same may be said of the second part, the Modern School from 1850 to 1882. Its originality, the pre-Raphaelites, the landscape of that school, landscape and rural painting, historical painting, genre painting, painting in water-color and caricature are treated successively, and illustrated by criticisms upon the leading English artists of our own time, such as Holman Hunt, Millais, D. G. Rossetti, Herkomer, Faed, Landseer, Kate Greenaway, and many others, and, as in the first part, there are many illustrations. In addition to the work itself there is an interesting introduction, in which M. Chesneau discusses the steps of English art before the time of Hogarth, going back to the days of the Venerable Bede and the illuminators of the monasteries, and tracing it down through the reigns of the kings who were its patrons. There was art—Holbein, Kneller, Peter Ley, etc.—but it was not yet distinctively English art. But we cannot dwell longer upon this volume, which we commend to our readers.

"The Flemish School of Painting," by Prof. Waters, is more elaborate than that of M. Chesneau, and has a wider range of time. It is divided into six periods, going back to the origin of Flemish painting in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries, and tracing it down through its successive phases: the Gothic school, the Romancists, the school of Rubens and its fall, and the Belgian school. The great masters of the Flemish school are all made to pass before us: Van Eyck, Van Der Weyden, Rubens, Teniers, Jordans and others, and the volume is a compendium of Flemish art. No one could be more competent than Prof. Wauters to prepare such a work, and it is a history of the Flemish school, full of interest, and valuable as a book of reference. It is illustrated with many engravings in wood, which add to its value, and give in some sort an idea of the paintings which they reproduce, and it is a volume we can cordially commend.

JOHN KNOX. By Wm. M. Taylor, D.D., LL.D., author of "Limitations of Life," etc. With steel portrait, engraved by B. Holl, from a painting in the possession of Lord Somersville. [New York: A. C. Armstrong & Sons.] pp. 47.

The Scottish Reformation is not a pleasant period for the reader of history. If greed and hypocrisy entered into the movement in England, in Scotland there was scarce a pretence of concealment of the interested motives by which most of the statesmen were swayed. The political morality of most of the leaders was below even the debased standard of the times. Men, high and low in station, were true to their word only so long as it was convenient. Parties were swayed by a ferocious bitterness that was the more strange because resting upon the most sickle instability of conviction. In such a time John Knox might well appear as a hero. We give him full credit for fearlessness and honesty. That he was narrow-minded and pertinacious was perhaps the necessity of his era. For one thing he deserves full credit, that he would fain have used the spoils of the monasteries for the cause of education, but as with Wolsley in England, the greed of the nobles defeated his wise plans.

Dr. Taylor has made the most of his hero, as might be expected, and yet has done fair justice to the faults in Knox's career. Perhaps, in the condition of Scottish affairs, it would have been impossible to conduct the Scotch Reformation on parallel lines with the English, but it would be a great gain for Christianity could this have been done. Undoubtedly had Knox been a man of larger mind and broader learning he might have worked in harmony with Cranmer and Latimer and Ridley. He seems to have had no conscientious scruples at the first against the English Prayer Book, but his opposition to kneeling at the Holy Communion, and his yielding to the influence of Calvin, removed him from the sympathies of the English Church. At any rate, the golden opportunity was missed, and the consequences of that error have only just begun to be repaired.

TALES FROM SHAKESPEARE. By Charles and Mary Lamb. Edited for the Use of Schools. [Boston: Gunn, Heath & Co.] pp. 39.

Years ago a friend of ours who was a great admirer of Lamb sent to England for a copy of the "Tales from Shakespeare," only to receive the disappointing message "out of print." Now it is proposed to bring it within the reach of all school children in this well-printed and convenient form. It is a mistake to suppose that children will not read good books. It is only when their tastes are ruined by bad books, just as their bodily appetites are ruined by over much confectionery, that they reject healthy reading; and this is a book of the healthiest sort. There is no fear that it will spoil the appetite for Shakespeare's plays themselves, while it will lead up to their study as nothing else will. The great difficulty which one unuses to the dramatic form encounters is to get the story, and this is just what these admirable tales accomplish. With an almost unrivalled critical knowledge of the elder English dramatists, the Lambs were able to disentangle the real movement of each from the by-play, and this has been here done by them with marked skill and success. The editors have omitted "Measure for Measure" from this volume, we think judiciously, and have added a pronouncing index.

We have had occasion before this to speak of the good work which the firm of Gunn, Heath & Co. were doing, especially for juvenile readers, and we wish again to thank them for truly valuable service done in this behalf.

THE WHAT-TO-DO CLUB. A Story for Girls. By Helen Campbell. [Boston: Roberts Brothers.] pp. 45. Price $1.50.

The scene of this pleasing story is laid in Vermont, in a town so thinly disguised under a pseudonym that we violate no propriety in calling it "Highgate." It is briefly the history of a lady who undertakes to find rational and profitable employment for the young girls of the village. She begins by setting them to work upon the neglected village graveyard, and leads the way to other occupations; and under the form of a series of letters from another club, called "The Busy-Bodies," gives directions for strawberry raising, poultry keeping, bee keeping, bird raising, and a number of other employments which women might profitably and pleasantly take up. There is a good deal of story with all the usual features of love-affairs and property complications, but it is well ballasted with what appears to be very sensible and practical instruction. It is intimated (and we do not doubt the intimation) that the details of work are all genuine, even to the pleasant results in dollars and cents, and we can commend the book to all young ladies whose time hangs heavy on their hands, and who want to earn a little for themselves.

PSYCHOLOGY FOR THE YOUNG. Our Bodies; or, How We Live. An Elementary Text-Book of Physiology and Hygiene for Use in the Common Schools. With Special Reference to the Effects of Stimulants and Narcotics on the Human System. By Albert F. Blaisdell, M.D. [Boston: Lee & Shepard. New York: Charles Dillingham.] pp. 38.

Whether or not it is well to teach physiology in the common schools on its own account is a debatable question. The idea of checking intemperance by a school text-book is a well-meant absurdity. There is but one possible prevention of excess, and that is the disciplined human will. Probably nine out of every ten who use opium and other kindred drugs know perfectly well the hideous consequences; but the causes that lead to the use of these poisons are beyond and paramount to any knowledge. Will any study of the nature of the lungs and the effects of cold restrain a boy from getting his feet wet?

This is a well-prepared little volume—probably correct and guarded in its statements—but we are very much inclined to believe that such semi-medical training is apt to develop morbid fancies, and that the less a healthy child knows about its bodily construction the better.

MIRRO. A Provençal Poem. By Frederic Mistral. Translated by Harriet W. Preston. [Boston: Roberts Brothers.] pp. 249. Price 50 cents.

The authoress of this translation has shown that she understands her work. A liberal transfer of a book from its own language to another is in no sense a translation. The real business is to furnish a version which shall be true to the inner life of the work taken in hand, and this is most often attained by a wide departure from the outward form. Thus the lyric measure in the outward form. Thus the lyric measure in one tongue really corresponds to quite a different one in another tongue. "Mirro" is here rendered into its truest English equivalent, the easy and flexible measure which William Morris may be said to have created, or rather restored, viz.: the English ten-syllable metre before the days of Pope. The poem is a very lovely one, a picture of the passionate, vivid life of the old "romance" region of Southern France, at once rustic and refined. It is in twelve cantos, and is the story of a tragic love exquisitely told. It is a book to be slowly read and tasted in almost every line.

THE KNIGHT OF THE BLACK FOREST. By Grace Denio Litchford. Author of "Only An Incident." Illustrated. [New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.] pp. 160. Price 75 cents.

When this story appeared as a "serial" there was some omission or derangement in the chapters. It is quite good enough to be re-read in its completed and corrected form. It is a very charming story, in which the follies of two young American girls are sketched in a way to do full justice to their absurd and unconventional taste for flirtation, without allowing them for a moment to lose their true womanliness. It is safe to say that only American girls could do, without seriously compromising themselves, what Lois and Betty manage to do. At the same time, while it speaks volumes for the real purity of character of the girl of this country, it does not speak well of the system which develops such. They are of the "Daisy Miller" species, only better drawn, because done by a feminine hand. One feels a mingled pride and shame over these (unfortunately) too life-like portraits.

THE ADVENTURES OF JIMMY BROWN. Written by Himself and Edited by W. L. Alden. Illustrated. [New York: Harper & Brothers.] pp. 296.

Mr. Alden's work is so well known that it is hardly needed to say anything in praise of this little bit of genial and harmless fun. We have seen the criticism somewhere that Jimmy Brown's feats are not likely to induce any young brother to imitate them, and we prefer to believe this, (though the small boy's capabilities are infinite in the direction of mischief) because we do not wish to think that a book so amusing to read can be detrimental to the morals of the future bishops and presidents. Nevertheless, we advise confiding parents to read over one or two chapters (no very hard task) before introducing the work to the family circle. A boy of exceptional tendencies might find suggestions too tempting to be resisted, and a bad imitation of Master Jimmy's pranks might be a very unpleasant one to enter a quiet household.

A CITY VIOLET. By M. E. Winchester. Author of "A Nest of Sparrows," etc. Second Edition. [New York: Robert Carter & Brothers.] pp. 42.

There is a great deal that is pretty and pleasing about this story, which is one for young people. There is much that is suggestive in regard to work among the poor, and while its religious tone is a little too pronounced in one direction, that of emotional piety, it is certainly very refined and pure in its tone. We always feel a little sense of unreality, however, in a story in which the characters always turn out to order in response to the efforts made for them. The great difficulty in dealing with the poor generally lies in the want of a clear, mutual understanding between them and their benefactors. The gratitude, the real appreciation of kindness, may not be wanting, but it comes in the wrong place often in real life. The lack of perfect sympathy is the great barrier between "Lady Bountiful" and the objects of her care.

THE PROTESTANT FAITH; OR, SALVATION BY BELIEF. An Essay upon the Errors of the Protestant Church. By Dwight Hinckley Olmstead. [New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.] pp. 77.

Mr. Olmstead read this essay nearly thirty years ago before the Young Men's Christian Union of New York. He now publishes it to be of service to minds disquieted with modern doubts. It is a pity that such an admirable purpose should be backed up by such a feeble support. Mr. Olmstead understands by faith mere intellectual assent to an opinion. It is hardly worth while to reply to arguments directed against such a conception. Faith is allegiance to a Person, (religious faith we mean, of course,) founded on a right reception of essential facts regarding that Person. We do not advise any one troubled with modern doubts to buy Mr. Olmstead's little book, for we cannot see what possible bearing it has upon any or all of them.

ROMER, KING OF NORWAY, and Other Dramas. By Adair Welcker. [San Francisco: Lewis & Johnston.] pp. 258. Price by mail $1.50.

The writer says in his preface, "Were commendation to be bestowed on the dramas, it would be but the repetition of an old story," and, "By a strange unanimity of opinion, they have been pronounced to be made of the same material as the writings of the greatest of dramatists." We do not care to repeat the old story, and we are unable, after reading them all through, to find any traces of the material of Shakespeare. An author may be a true poet, and yet fail as a dramatist. He may have the dramatic faculty, and yet lack in poetic expression. Mr. Welcker has neither the one nor the other, and has not, so far as we can discover, even stumbled upon a single phrase which is not hopeless commonplace.

PESTALOZZI'S LEONARD AND GERTRUDE. Translated and abridged by Eva Channing. [Boston: Gian, Heath & Co.] pp. 191.

"Leonard and Gertrude" is a story of German life, intended to illustrate the Pestalozzian scheme of instruction. It illustrates another thing as well, the wonderful power of feudal institutions if rightly managed, and the immense abuse which is easy to them when mismanaged. Much of the story is utterly foreign to this country, and much is out of date in the Europe of to-day. But it is a very pleasant and readable volume, and the translator has done her work of abridgement with evident good judgment. The Pestalozzian system combines industrial with other instruction, and is probably the best (when practicable) ever invented.

THE DUCHESS EMILIA. A Romance. By Barrett Wendell. [Boston: James H. Osgood & Co.] pp. 341.

The story of "The Duchess Emilia" is briefly this, that she, a Colonna, died in Italy, and her soul was reborn in New England as one Richard Berkeley, son of a Massachusetts manufacturer. He goes to Italy, and there works out a process of expiation through Cardinal Colonna, the former lover of the duchess. The plot is as weird as one of Hawthorne's wildest, but the picture is wonderfully painted. It is a picture of the old Rome of the papal rule—a Rome that has vanished, never more to return. Any story would be tolerated with this magical atmosphere about it, this strange background of Italian life such as it was before the election of Pio Nono.

GLORVILLER; or, The Metamorphoses. A Poem in Six Books. By the Earl of Lytton (twin Meredith). Book I. [New York: D. Appleton & Co.] pp. 164. Price 5 cents.

There are six books of this poem, and each book is divided into four or more cantos, and each canto consists of sixty or seventy stanzas of eight lines each. The reader who begins this may know, therefore, what he or she has to look forward to. It is a Bulwerian novel in verse. Lord Lytton has written some quite effective poetry, but he has a fatal, a very fatal, facility in verse, and probably when the last book appears the verdict of the public will be that it had been well if the noble author had "boiled it down" to one-sixth of the size.

DATA ON WILD FATS, Common Sense for Young Men. By J. M. Mackley, LL.B., author of "Two Weeks in Yosemite," etc. [New York: Harper & Brothers.] pp. 396.

We suppose this book may do more good than one of more ability and with a much higher aim. It is a well meant and mediocre performance, just about at the level of the middle-class habit of thought and morality. It will not make heroes, but reputable and successful business men, and is therefore more likely to hit the popular taste. It is a series of letters addressed to young men about their studies, pursuits, habits and general aim in life. It nowhere rises above a commonplace level, but so far as it goes is good advice in a kind and popular fashion.

LITERATURE.

W. E. BENJAMIN issues a "Catalogue of Autograph Letters," which will interest collectors.

D. E. HERVEY, Woodside, New Jersey, sends us an excellent Te Deum, set to music in B flat, and intended for chorus choir.

The opening paper of the Lathern Church Review for July has for its subject "The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs," one of the pseudographs.

DR. DEWOLF, through the American Book Company, Chicago, has published a short tractate on "Cholera, its History, Nature, and Preventive Management."

The Art Interchange for July 2 reproduces the prize works at Messrs. Howells & James's, London, exhibition of China paintings, and has other full-page illustrations.

The most interesting paper in the July Unitarian Review is "The Revised Version of the Old Testament," by the Rev. E. J. Young. It gives hearty welcome to the revision.

The Rev. Dr. Fairburn's "Twenty-fifth Anniversary Address at St. Stephen's College" is published by Joel Munsell's Sons, Albany. It is largely commemorative of the founders.

THE MAY number of the Child's Pictorial, with colored pictures, published by the Christian Knowledge Society, London, and found at E. & J. B. Young & Co.'s, cannot fail to please children.

SHAKESPEARIANA for June (Leonard Scott Publication Co.) opens with "Shakespeare and Stage Costume," by Oscar Wilde. There is in the number a topical index of Shakespeareana.

The Bishop of Albany's address Qualis Vita, Finita Ita, to the fourteenth class of St. Agnes' School, is handsomely printed. These annual addresses are thoughtful and elegant, and worthy of preservation.

The Homiletic Review, with the July number, begins its tenth volume, a fact which shows not only that there is a steady demand for works of the kind, but that this particular work possesses sterling merit.

DR. ANA P. MEYLER's "Notes on the Opium Habit," published by G. F. Putnam's Sons, in pamphlet form, is full of facts that should be generally known. It is a form of intemperance widely prevalent.

JAMES POTT & Co. publish in verse "Ugo Bassi's Sermon in the Hospital," by H. E. H. King. It is from Mrs. King's "Disciples." They also issue a "Primer for Christ's Little Ones," approved by Bishop Neely.

"SWEET CICELY," by "Josiah Allen's Wife," is a new novel announced by Funk & Wagnalls, who are also to publish "The People's Bible," by Dr. Joseph Parker of London, and "Sermons in Songs," by Dr. Charles F. Robinson.

E. & J. B. YOUNG & Co. have reprinted in a neat pamphlet "Hints to Sunday-school Teachers," by the Rev. George William Douglas, D.D., which has, from time to time, appeared in the columns of THE CHURCHMAN.

"SUMMER SERMONS from a Berkshire Pulpit," by the Rev. W. W. Newton, is published by J. B. Harrison, Pittsfield, Mass. The subjects are well chosen, and it will be a serviceable book to take to the seaside and the mountains.

THE Art Age has completed its second volume, and may be said to have fairly won its spurs. It grows in interest, both in letterpress and illustrations, and art, and especially book-making, should be the better for its existence.

"The Baby that must go to the Country," by Marion Harland, and "Stray Leaves from a Baby's Journal," in the July Babyhood, should be worth many times the subscription price of this excellent magazine, which should be regarded by every mother as indispensable as the baby.

The July Decorator and Furnisher presents a very varied table of contents, with numerous designs for decoration and in the various branches of art to which it is devoted. We notice among its writers some of our practiced and practical artists, and the magazine is becoming month by month more interesting and useful. It takes rank among our best art journals.

PROF. OLLSEN opens the July Eclectic with a paper on "The Instrument of both Material and Spiritual Progress." The Rev. G. R. Van De Water has an article on "Church Music," and the Rev. E. R. Armstrong one on "Westminster Abbey." The selections are upon topics of most interest, as is also the correspondence, and the summaries are, as usual, admirable. The Eclectic long ago attained a high standard, and it keeps close up to it.

BLACKWOOD, the Nineteenth Century, the Fortnightly and Contemporary Reviews for June (Leonard Scott Publication Company) are at hand. Blackwood completes volume DCCXXVII, and is as vigorous as in early youth. The Fortnightly has a paper on "Wyclif and the Bible," and the Contemporary rejoins to "Canon Liddon's Theory of the Episcopate and Some Thoughts on New Testament Exegesis," by Archdeacon Farrar.

The July Andover Review opens with a paper on the inspiration of the Bible, by Professor George T. Ladd. It is entitled "The Question Restated." Recent events have given a new interest to the new Andover theology, as there is a strong desire to know what it is precisely. The first editorial is "The Atonement," a third paper on "Progressive Orthodoxy." Long residence in the East has prepared the Rev. Dr. Edwin M. Bliss to write intelligently of "Kurdistan and the Kurds." Two other articles are "Side Lights from Mormonism," by the Rev. W. F. Croley, and "The Employment of Children," by John F. Crowell, complete the longer papers. The Andover is one of our most thoughtful and able reviews.

The committee appointed at the late annual convention of the Diocese of New Jersey, on preparing a "Memorial of the Centennial of the Organization of the Church in the State of New Jersey," have just issued the work in a handsome pamphlet of sixty-two pages, by Whitaker. It has for a frontispiece a picture of Christ church, New Brunswick, N. J., where the first convention of the Church in the State of New Jersey was held, together with the names of the joint committee on the centennial from the two Dioceses of New Jersey and Northern New Jersey, and those of the committee on the memorial, followed by an account in extenso of all the services, music, and officiants, the very able sermon of the Rev. Dr. Garrison, with copious subtitles and foot-notes, a verbatim report of the afternoon speeches of the Bishops of New Jersey, Northern New Jersey, and Pittsburgh, and the Rev. Drs. Tiffany, Hills, Boggs, and Franklin, a short poem by the Rev. Mr. Pettit, and a paper by Mr. James Parker on "The Work of the Lady in the Organization of the Church after the Revolution." The whole pamphlet possesses great interest, and will be of enduring value. It is ably and accurately edited by the Rev. Dr. George Morgan Hills, chairman of the committee on the memorial.

ART.

MR. KARL GERHARDT has succeeded in producing an admirable likeness of General Grant in a bust one quarter life-size. When it was partly finished it was taken to the General's sick room, and so strong was its resemblance to the original, that the artist was allowed to correct and finish it from the living subject. It has been viewed by the most competent judges, and they unite with the family in saying that it is the best portrait of General Grant that has ever been made, and it is all the more valuable because it may be the last. He is represented in his uniform, and his countenance shows the heroic fortitude with which he bears his sufferings. The original is in the possession of the family; but Mr. Gerhardt, who is from Hartford, has reproduced the bust in terra-cotta, and it will be a prized possession to many people.

The annual meeting of the Music Teachers' Association at the Academy promises to fulfill the expectations of the managers and the promises of the programme. Setting aside the delays and friction developed in handling such an impulsive body, and the fondness for talk and repartee with which sober discussions are apt to dribble, there has been a sequence of well-considered essays, followed by most judicious and suggestive comment. Such a collision and attrition of intelligences and enthusiasms is in any event wholesome and energizing. Professional life steps out of its warlike monotony, and gains breadth while it gains heart from such a fellowship as this.

Of course there is the usual lobby of tradesmen and inventors, a species of parasite which threatens the life of all similar gatherings, but they have been kept well in hand, and the daily procedure pretty well "on time." The various "recitals" have proved unexpectedly entertaining as well as instructive, and one experiences a grateful surprise at the large number of really first-rate artists established in our leading cities. It is not so many years ago since Messrs. Mason and Mills were almost alone, with Otto Dresel in Boston, as successors of Father Terrio, for serious pianoforte interpretation. Here we heard Carl Faellen, Robert Goldbeck, Alexander Lambert, Emil Liebling, Carlyle Petersilea, Miss Bloomfield, W. H. Sherwood and Albert R. Parsons. And the number of equally excellent players could have been multiplied manyfold. In this connection we would revert to the popular programmes of thirty years ago, when bravura, fantasia and digital extravaganza ruled the concert room; when Talberg's gliding platitudes and De Meyer's tumultuous rhapsodies and Gottschalk's morbid sentimentalities made up the staple of all playing, both amateur and professional. In those days we heard and knew little or nothing of the Beethoven sonatas, literally nothing of Bach and the contrapuntal school, while Chopin, Schumann and Mendelssohn were reserved for an occasional concert at the infrequent Philharmonic, and then of course only for the favored few.

All that is happily changed. More excellent music, reaching the highest standards of composition, has been delivered at this meeting than all the leading concerts put together for five years would have presented in "the good old time." The range was beautifully generous and comprehensive. There were no thin places, no nests of pedantry or professional prigishness. Few of the players ventured on their own compositions. Nothing could have been finer than this rare self-abnegation. Mr. Faellen gave the heroic Grand Sonata, Op. 106, Beethoven, so long a hidden mystery in our art-world; Max Liebling gave the Prelude and Fugue in A Minor, Bach-Liszt, Sonata, Op. 31, Beethoven, and a fine "poisè" made up of best moderns, such as Scharwenka, Laff, Nicode, and Moskowski, both gentlemen admirable examples of the Von Bulow school. Mr. Lambert, whose interpretations were among the most exquisite and spiritual conceivable, dealt out in his inimitable manner Gigno and Variations, Op. 91, Raff, followed by Nocturne, Op. 13, No. 2, Chopin, Hollendaer, and Moskowski, who seems to loom up splendidly among the recent men; and it should be borne in mind that the classical playing throughout was confessedly on the highest plane of artistic conception and delivery. Miss Bloomfield delivered, with wonderful intelligence and sympathy, Rubinstein's tremendous concerto (Fourth in D Minor), piano and orchestra, work exacting for the manliest man, yet nothing was heard wanting. Mr. Petersilea, in turn, gave a bold group of selections; and so we particularize in illustration of the triumph of great art over sensationalism and meretricious conceit. It will prove instructive, perhaps, to review the orchestral and concerted compositions produced by our own composers at the evening concerts.

There are but few figures, but each stands out from the canvas distinct, individual, a creation of a master's brush."—Christian Union.

"ZOROASTER" is a strong novel, and is to us the best of Mr. Crawford's writings. A NEW TRANSLATION OF DON QUIXOTE.

THE
 DON QUIXOTE OF LA MANCHA.

By MIGUEL DE CERVANTES SAavedra.
 A Translation, with Introduction and Notes by JOHN ORMSBY.
 Translator of "The Poem of the Cid."
 In four volumes; vol. 2, 2vo, $3.50.

"Don Quixote" has got to be read by successive generations, and to be read by all the individuals in those generations who are good for anything. Therefore, the generations ought to have their versions made after their own fashion and liking. Of Mr. Ormsby's version we may say that, judging from the two volumes already before us, it excels all the previous versions in a certain amount of accuracy and sobriety... This book as a book is a very handsome one without being unwieldy. It has an excellent introduction, bibliographical, biographical, and critical. His notes are excellent, short, to the point, and present at every occasion where the reader can justly demand them."—Pull Mill Gazette.

Mr. Palgrave's selection is not only valuable, however, as a handy pocket edition. He has enriched it also with some short but interesting notes—notes they seem to us of what such things should be... "But we have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us."—II. Cor. iv. 7.

Disheartened and weary, I sighed
For the sins and faults all my own.
Yet knowing the truth that Thou died,
And Thy blood couldn't for all atone.

I sighed as I thought of Thy love,
Dear Saviour, and my poor return—
So little advance, though I strive
The fruits of the Spirit to learn.

As balm to my soul came Thy words,
For they told how "treasure" divine,
E'en in "vessels of earth," affords
Thy will to be done through all time.

Thy power turned water to wine,
Thy grace blessed the poor widow's mite,
Thy love gave Thy life e'en for mine,
Thy spirit turned darkness to light.

Thy power the merit we give—
The excellency is Thine own—
If in word or in act, as we live,
Some "fruit of the Spirit" is shown.

Dear Saviour, Thy words, like the "heaven," Pervade now my heart and my thought—
Use Thou this clay, till to heaven
Thou bringest the thing Thou hast wrought.

ROBERT ORD'S ATONEMENT.

BY ROSA NOUÇHEITE CAREY.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Burdley-upon-Sea.

"The two walk till the purple die,
And short dry grass under foot is brown;
But one little streak at a distance lies
Green, like a ribbon—to prank the down.

"Over the grass we stepped until,
And God knoweth how little we were;
Never a voice to bid us reach it:
Hey the green ribbon that showed so fair.

"Tinkle, tinkle, sweetly it sung to us,
Light was our talk as of fairy bells—
Fairy wedding bells, faintly rang to us,
Down in their fortunate parallel.

"Hand in hand, while the sun peered over,
We lapped the grass on that youngling spring;
Swept back its rindles, smoothed its clover,
And said, 'let us follow it westering.'"
—Jean Ingelous.

Rotha never spoke to any one about her conversation with Robert Ord.

"I have tried my best, but of course I have failed," was all the explanation she ventured to Mrs. Ord; but the hurt color had risen to her face, and she looked so troubled that Mary, with great delicacy, forbore to question her.

Something jarred sadly just now in Rotha's sweet nature; for since that afternoon on the sands—nearly a week—she had never voluntarily mentioned Robert's name. It was apparent even to others that she shunned him; she could not bear to acknowledge even to herself that he had wounded her past her usual patience, and in her heart she tried to forgive him, but it had been very hard. It was therefore a strong proof of her magnanimity and the tenacity of her will that she was set more than ever on doing him good in spite of himself, and such was the fixity of her purpose that the man, with all his pride and obstinacy, had no chance against her.

Experience was teaching her some useful lessons, however. He would accept no favor at her hands—that was what he had told her; well, and was she not to blame? She had been too blunt hitherto in her offers of help; a little subtlety of stratagem might be advisable in raising such a heavy weight. It might not be possible to be both lever and fulcrum at one and the same time, but at least might it not be within her power to set other agents at work? Rotha's girlish wits were hard at work again, and it was not long before the opportunity she sought presented itself.

Just about this time Rotha received another invitation to Mrs. Stephen Knowles's, to one of her far-famed dinners à la Russe; and Mrs. Stephen Knowles, whose soul delighted to honor the young heiress, intended to gather an assembly of the choicest spirits that Blackcar and its neighborhood could afford, and it was to be a very grand affair indeed.

Rotha, who was much oppressed by the magnitude of the proceedings, being, in spite of her little posiposities, the humblest creature possible, was in great trepidation, and said a great many naughty things to Mrs. Ord about Kirkby and Blackcar, and Mrs. Stephen Knowles, in particular, killing the fatted calf in her behalf; at which Mrs. Ord laughed and scolded in a breath.

"If the fatted calf has been killed, it must be eaten," Mrs. Ord affirmed with emphasis, and therefore Rotha must have a new dress; for Mary was always lecturing her friend on the duty of keeping up an appearance suitable to her station, and Rotha, who knew that Mary only acted as the vicar's mouthpiece, and who remembered his rebuke as to the lack of ornament on the night of the tea-party, had consented to lay aside much of her enforced simplicity.

On this occasion a pink dress was the result of Mary's eloquence—actually a pink dress. But even then Rotha had refused to deck her pretty white neck and arms with the Ord jewels. "I shall wear flowers," was her sole answer to her friend's rebuke. "I feel already something like the ugly duckling transformed into the swan in this gaudy dress; I don't believe I am Rotha Maturin at all. I am almost glad, after all, that you and the vicar will not be there to see me." But Rotha, as she uttered this little bit of girlish silliness, was glad that she looked so young and fair in the pink dress, and went off quite happily when Meg and Mary had admired her to their heart's content; and it was certain that no one at Mrs. Stephen Knowles's missed the lack of jewels.

Most of the guests were strangers to Rotha. The only name she recognized, with the exception of one or two of her Blackcar neighbors, was Mr. Ramsay of Stretton.

Rotha knew all about Mr. Ramsay of Stretton. The wealthy ironmaster was a man of great repute in the neighborhood; but it was not the thought of his vast capital that filled her with such interest. She knew it was Emma Ramsay who had been Belle's unsuccessful rival, and how Robert Ord had refused to barter his love for any fabulous number of thousands. "Noble fellow!" thought Rotha, with a sudden warm impulse; but nevertheless she felt a little surprise when she saw Emma. There was no accounting for tastes certainly, and perhaps at that time Belle Clinton had been very beautiful, and not at all faded; but she thought Emma the brightest-looking girl she had ever seen.

Yes, Emma Ramsay was there—Lady Tregarthen she was now; for the ironmaster, disappointed in his first choice of a son-in-law, had married his sole remaining child to a young Welsh baronet, Sir Edgar Tregarthen, a young man, very sturdy as to pedigree and very small of person, but a well-meaning young fellow on the main.

Rotha fraternized with Lady Tregarthen after dinner. Emma was a very pretty little matron now, thoroughly content with herself, and disposed to think her Edgar the very impersonification of all that a man ought to be. She took a fancy to Rotha, and made her promise to come over to Stretton, where she was now staying with her father, and Mr. Ramsay afterwards endorsed his daughter's invitation. Rotha liked them both very much indeed; but she liked the father best. She admired the ironmaster's strong, hard-featured face; his manners were a little uncultivated, perhaps, but there was a downright, sterling honesty about the man that captivated Rotha. He had sat beside her at dinner, and then, and afterwards, he had been much disposed to talk about the Ords; he seemed especially interested in what she told him about Robert Ord.

"He is a good fellow—I believe a thoroughly good fellow," he said, returning to the subject, when he had brought his cup of tea to the sofa, where Lady Tregarthen and she sat chatting; "but he is a man who will stand in his own light all his life, foolish fellow. He might have been driving in his own carriage by this time if he had consented to listen to any one's advice but his own." Lady Tregarthen, who had been talking volubly up to this moment, looked up at her father a little reproachfully as he said this, and, whether intentionally or not, rose to join her husband, who was at that minute talking to his hostess; but Mr. Ramsay did not seem to notice his daughter's slight hauteur, he only slipped into the vacant seat beside Rotha, and went on with the same subject.

"He was handsome enough then to have married any one," he continued, as though pursuing a train of thought—"a fine manly fellow, every inch of him; half the girls were in love with him, I believe. And then he had such brains; they would have been capital to any other man. He was just fit to be the head of a large concern, as he would have been, if he and Emma—by the bye, Miss Maturin, did you tell me he was managing clerk to Broughton & Clayton?"

"Yes, Broughton & Clayton of Thornborough," replied Rotha. "It is a miserable prospect for him and Miss Clinton; for I believe he only has a salary of a little over two hundred a year, and they have been engaged for nearly five years already." And Rotha sighed as she thought of Robert Ord's haggard looks and Belle's faded beauty.

Mr. Ramsay gave a grunt of displeasure. "Serve him right. What business had he to be so headstrong, and turn his aunt against him, as he did? She was a termagant, I grant you, but he was her match. God heavens, Robert Ord a managing clerk at Broughton & Clayton's—a trumpety concern like that! And Broughton has two sons coming into the business, I hear. That was another of his obstinate tricks, taking a situation in that way instead of writing for his friends to help him."

"It is not easy to help Mr. Ord," began Rotha, sorrowfully; but at that moment Mrs. Stephen Knowles had come up and scolded Mr. Ramsay for his monopoly of Miss Maturin. And after that there was no opportunity of renewing the conversation; but at parting Mr. Ramsay shook hands with her very cordially, and begged her to come and see his daughter at Stretton.

"It is only a drive of six or seven miles if you take the Leatham road; and you are obliged to air your horses, you know. By the bye, is poor old Sphinx alive still—the boy mare, I mean?"

"Mrs. Ord's carriage and horses were disposed of after her death. If I come to Stretton it will be by train, Mr. Ramsay," returned Rotha, quietly.

"Well, come anyway, so that you come," was the good-natured rejoinder; but Rotha saw that he was a little surprised, nevertheless.

That night, as she sat alone over her fires reviewing the events of the evening, she thought much of her conversation with Mr. Ramsay, and of the strange interest he had evinced in Robert Ord.

"He has a powerful influence, if he could only be induced to exert it in his favor," she said to herself; and there and then she determined to go over to Stretton and plead Robert Ord's cause with the man whose daughter he had refused to marry.

"Sir Edgar Tregarthen is a much better match than Robert Ord," thought Rotha, who scarcely knew how the ironmaster had coveted Robert Ord's brains. "I darsay he was a little more about it at first; but by this time he must have forgiven him—he looks so good-natured, and so does Lady Tregarthen." And she thought for a moment that she would make Lady Tregarthen her confidante.

Rotha slept upon her resolve, and a few days afterward she went over to Stretton.

Mr. Ramsay and his daughter received her warmly, and she had a very pleasant visit.

"I have listened to all you have told me," Mr. Ramsay said to her at parting, "and I promise you that I will think over it. It is easy to see you are on his side—all women are—but I tell you this, that if it had not been for his unfounded obstinacy he might have been in my dead boy's place by this time; he was so like poor Bob, too; but there, it is no use fretting over spilt milk. He has treated me very badly, but a man will have the choosing of his own wife, after all."

"And you will think over it," repeated Rotha timidly.

"Yes, I will," he returned decidedly; "I promise you as much as that. But I am not the man to do things in a hurry, any more than I do them by halves. It is against my principles. I must turn the thing well over in my mind first."

He considered a moment, and then went on:

"What sort of berth do you think will suit Robert Ord—another place as manager in a larger concern, say at five hundred a year? Carter's not dead yet, but he might be superannuated; or the same post, with a still larger salary, in the house of a connection of ours—Fullgrave & Barton's, who have a large branch house in America. Fullgrave writes us that they are in great want of a man who is honest and long-headed as well; his Yankee manager has turned out a failure."

"I think he would rather stay in England, for Miss Clinton's sake," returned Rotha thoughtfully.

"Humph! that comes of being tied to a sickly girl. In that case we cannot do so much for him. Carter may object to being superannuated. Well, I'll think the matter over. I suppose, though you are a woman, you can keep a quiet tongue in your head, eh?" turning on her with good-humored brusqueness. Rotha laughingly assured him that she could.

"Well, well, you look dependable; and he is not to know who has done him this good turn—very right, very proper, I understand. Now, good-by, if you must go. I'll undertake that Emma shall not forget you," and the worthy ironmaster shook hands with her till her wrist was nearly dislocated. She was too happy to heed the pain, however. All the way home she assured herself that her mission was successful, and that, after all, Belle would get better, and would be married perhaps in the early spring.

Rotha was thinking about her visit to Stretton and about all manner of pleasant things, one day, when she was in an odd mood for dreaming.

Rotha was sitting on the roof of a tree in one of the glens of Burnley-upon-Sea—the wild glen, as it was called. She, and Garton, and Reuben were doing an afternoon's gipsying on their own account, very much to the astonishment and scandal of Blackscar and Kirkby, if they had known it, and somewhat to Mrs. Carruthers' surprise.

Rotha was very simple for her age in some things, in spite of her wise, old-fashioned ways, and Garton was just as ridiculously inexperienced. Meg often called them a couple of children; and, as far as freshness and originality of idea and a certain chivalry of thought were concerned, they were undoubtedly an excellent match.

For they were both fond of ridiculing the world's fashions, and they both retained an implicit belief in the goodness of human nature, which was almost pathetic to older and wiser people.

Garton's creed was that man was made in the image of God, and that therefore there must be a certain amount of goodness in every man, if you only knew where to find it. Rotha held the same creed, with a private reservation of her own; for she thought the Divine Image must be entirely blotted out in such men as Joe Armstrong and Jack Carruthers.

She told Garton horrible anecdotes of this latter bête noir. I believe she regarded him as a sort of fiend incarnate. She drew such touching pictures of Meg's love and gentleness that Garton ever afterward regarded that ungainly woman with the utmost reverence. Both the young people always treated her as though a visible halo surrounded her pale, sand-colored hair. Reuben, who was at a tender age of boyhood, and of course believed in all heroines, from Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, down to Grace Darling and Florence Nightingale, was rather disappointed that a heroine like Mrs. Carruthers should be short-sighted and use eye-glasses.

Rotha was Reuben Armstrong's heroine, and she knew it. The boy, though he still remained faithful to his old allegiance, contrived to combine with it a great deal of honest devotion to Rotha. In his half-holidays he was often up at the house of his young benefactress with Garton, who had begun to go in and out of Bryn very much as his inclination prompted him. Rotha, it is true, never invited them in so many words, but she would welcome them very kindly. She used to brighten up at these unexpected visits. It gave her a curious feeling of pleasure to see Garton Ord making himself at home in that house.

Garton often made Rotha his confidante. The poor fellow would blunder out all his troubles to her in these morning visits to Bryn. He would come up with a message from Mary and stop for hours. Meg was not always present during these interviews. Poor Garton never knew what real womanly sympathy meant till he knew Rotha. Mary was always very kind and sisterly with him; but there had been a flavor about her kindness which seemed to hint perpetually at that want of ballast on his part. Garton always took her advice very dutifully; to do him justice, he was well aware of his shortcomings, but he liked Rotha's sympathy best.

Rotha was always ready to listen; she took him under her simple patronage in a way that would have astonished the vicar if he had known it. Garton told her about all that sad illness of his that had preceded his examination, and how he had failed to pass in consequence; he told her, too, with a touch of compunction in his voice, how his brothers had been straining every nerve to procure the means of giving him another chance, and how little hope there seemed to be of their meeting the necessary expenses.

"I ought to have gone up to the last examination," he said to her one day; "but I am afraid I should have wanted an awful lot of coaching. Austin does the best for me that he can under the circumstances, but he has his boys and the parish; he is too hard-worked as it is."

"What will you do?" Rotha asked him on that occasion, with much sympathy; and Garton had told her that he was fast losing all hope of ever entering the Church, and that matters were now becoming serious. Austin's income, he was sure, was barely sufficient for his own family, huddled as he was with the maintenance of his sister-in-law, and he felt that he could no longer live at Robert's expense; it was therefore a mooted question whether he should accept a stool in the office of Mr. Silthers, the attorney at Thornborough, with a small but increasing salary, or whether he should emigrate to New Zealand.

Rotha did not like the idea of New Zealand at all, and said so frankly, but she saw that Garton himself rather inclined to the latter proposition, which had been Robert's idea.

"A stool in that close dark office for seven or eight hours a day—how long do attorneys' clerks work, I wonder?—would kill me," he said impetuously. "I suppose I am as fond of good things as other men but I would rather live on dry bread, with plenty of fresh air and freedom, than fare as Dives did, and be cooped up in Mr. Slithers's office; why, it would kill me!" And as he squared his shoulders and threw out his strong chest, there had been a look upon his face which had compelled her to believe him.

Oh, how Rotha sighed as she thought of that surplus sum lying idle at the bank, which caused such an endless correspondence between her and Mr. Tracy! Mr. Tracy was always worrying her to have it invested in some Consolidated Ironworks Company, which was just now offering large profits to the shareholders; but Rotha begged him not to hurry about it, as she thought she had heard of a better investment than the Consolidated Ironworks Company, about which she would inform him presently. I don't know whether she called it "the Ord Fund," but some of it certainly went in the coal-bill, and in that check at Tyler & Tyler's.

Rotha could not see her way clearly to help Garton at all. An unmarried young lady, however rich and sympathizing she may be, cannot offer to pay the college expenses of a penniless young man. Rotha could not very well offer her purse to Garton, neither could she plead his cause with the vicar as she did in Reuben's case; but, all the same, she was very sorry for him.

Garton and Reuben were going over to Burnley-upon-Sea, and they asked Rotha to join them. It was the beginning of December now, and it was their intention to spy out the futeness of the Burnley woods with regard to mistletoe and scarlet berries, that they might make a descent on these spoils at a future time, before the young rustics laid ruthless hands on them. Rotha, who had often heard of Burnley but had never seen it, agreed without a moment's hesitation. Something was said as to Guy and Rufus joining the party, but at the last moment it was found that the vicar had carried them off. Rotha had often been out with the boys before, either with the vicar or with Garton. Guy and Rufus, and now Reuben, had been anxious to show her all their favorite haunts. She and Mrs. Caruthers often joined their shore-parties; but to-day Meg had been tired, and Rotha proposed leaving her behind. If Mrs. Caruthers had her doubts of the propriety of the proceeding, she did not give utterance to them. She was rather too simple-minded for a chaperone; and then Rotha looked so happy. She wore a red cloak; they wore red cloaks then—"Colleen Bawn," they called them—fussy little cloaks done up with rosettes, and a new gipsy hat besides; and then she would carry the luncheon-basket, which she had provided in case they should get hungry.

"I am sorry Guy is not coming," she said, as she nodded a good-bye to Meg; "for I have put in some of his favorite cheese-cakes."

She elbowed away gaily to Reuben as they walked to the station. Mattie O'Brien met them coming along; she looked full at Rotha, at the scarlet cloak and the gipsy hat, and the fresh, girlish face under it—for Rotha was proving that even a pale complexion can look fresh sometimes—and afterwards she looked at Garton.

"What was Miss Mattie staring at?" asked Rotha, merrily, when she had passed.

Garton looked at her with a little blending of fun and admiration in his eyes.

"I suppose she was comparing you to a robin redbreast in her own mind, Miss Maturin; what do you call those cloaks, 'Colleen Bawn' ? I am glad you have left off those close Quaker bonnets; they make you look like a female Methuselah."

"Did Methuselah ever walk with Shem?" asked Rotha, roguishly. "How I confuse the ages of those old antediluvians—those giants of long days!" She had told Garton once how much he resembled the wooden Shems of her childhood, when Noah's ark had been her one Sunday game; "though what there was particularly pious in playing with diminutive elephants and tigers and Brobdingnagian cocks and hens," she continued on that occasion, "passes my comprehension; it only served to confuse my young mind with the relative sizes of things; for a long time I believed an ichneumon to be far larger than a hippopotamus."

"What a droll child you must have been!" Garton replied. He didn't mind a bit being compared to Shem when he strolled down to the schoolhouse in his cassock, not half so much as Rotha did when he quizzed her little black bonnet.

"I never thought you noticed ladies or their dress," she said, with a little natural pique.

"No more I do generally; but I like a cosy and comfortable thing like that," pointing to the red cloak, and Rotha felt glad her Colleen Bawn was admired.

Rotha was much pleased with Burnley-upon-Sea; she thought it a little gem among watering-places. They had a turn on the pier, and Garton told her how the cows walked over the sands at evening, and they looked at the blue sea, all flecked with sunshine to-day, and the white cliffs, and the deep green ravine, over which they presently walked on their way to the beautiful gardens which are laid out in the glen.

"The glen is partly cultivated, you see," said Garton, as Rotha wondered and admired to her heart's content. "In the season the bands play, and people sit about on the grass with their work and books, or go down to the spring to drink chalybeate water; it is a perfect paradise for nurses and children."

Rotha thought it must be a perfect paradise for other people, too, in summer; even now, in its wintry aspect, with its leafless trees, it looked very pleasant. She would stop at the gardener's ground to inspect the flowers; she filled her luncheon-basket with hothouse flowers on her way home. By the gardener's house is a turnstile or gate which leads to the wild ravine or glen; here is nature's cultivation, aided but little by the hand of man; a long walk winds through the glen for nearly a mile; benches and rustic seats are placed at intervals for the weary pleasure-seekers. The walk ascends slightly, and then bends downwards; on either hand are nut-copses and blackberry-thickets, dear to boy and girlhood; everywhere ferns and bracken spread their gigantic fronds; down below a tiny rivulet or stream splashes a hidden way among the trees. Rotha longs to see it in summer; the winding walks and steep descent are slippery with fallen leaves and miry clay; in the drier parts they crisp the brown bracken stalks under their feet; the dead leaves lie in rotting heaps everywhere, but it has a wintry beauty of its own nevertheless. By and by Rotha grows tired; they have been scrambling up and down the steep sides of the glen, wading ankle-deep in leaf-mould—the sweet, decaying smell is everywhere; now and then the black earth gets slippery, and Garton's strong arm is in great request; sometimes he has to put back the sharp brambles for the red cloak to escape unscathed; now and then a low, hanging bough obstructs their progress. Rotha, who is very fleet and sure-footed, laughs at every difficulty. The birds fly out from the thicket at the sound of Garton's answering laugh. Reuben whistles like a blackbird himself as he trudges after them with the luncheon-basket. They find out a dry, sunny nook presently, looking down into the dell, and Garton praises the cheese-cakes, and they are very happy.

A pair of children, truly, to listen to their talk; Garton makes believe that some water Reuben has just fetched for them is from a well-known wishing-well of fairy repute, and each one has been challenged to pronounce his or her wishes.

Reuben states his, nothing loath; his ambition is eminently boyish, and refuses to soar high; he thinks to be top of the upper fifth and to be elected a member of the football club must be little short of heaven—he does not say so exactly, but you can divine it in the brightness of his eyes.

"Happy Rube," says Rotha. She gets a little thoughtful at this juncture, and refuses to say exactly what she wishes.

"I don't think there is much left for you to desire, Miss Maturin," says Garton, with the least possible approach to a sigh; "you can afford to set the fairies at defiance. It is only such unlucky beggars as I who ought to long for the old wishing-wells back again. I remember when I was a boy I used to believe in them—ye Northerners are rather great at superstition, I can tell you."

"You have not told us your wish yet," said Rotha, timidly. Garton, who had been pelting Reuben with dead leaves all the time he had been talking, stretched himself lazily and looked up at the blue sky.

"What is the good of wishing anything?" he said, very disconsolately. "Haven't I often told you that I was born under an unlucky star? It is to be hoped there is a place for me above, for I seem to be in every one's way down here."

"Oh, Mr. Garton!" says Rotha, much shocked. Reuben, evidently accustomed to such like expressions from his friend, goes on pelting him; Garton puckers up his forehead, rocks himself, and finally brightens up.

"I will tell you what I should like. If I were to choose my place in the world, I would live all my life at Kirkby, and I would be Austin's curate."

"You would be your brother's curate!" exclaimed Rotha. She was astonished, and perhaps a little disappointed, though she hardly knew why. She could not understand a young man being so moderate in his ambition; Garton's simple unworldliness was almost a fault in her eyes. She thought he ought to desire to be a rector, or at least a vicar. Who ever heard of wishing to be a curate? Mary was right. She was afraid he wanted ballast.

"Yes, I should like to be with Austin,"

he returned in answer to her exclamation; "he and I would pull on very well together. I should want more than he could give me, though. I confess I should like to live on more than bread and cheese all my life."

"I expect very little would content you," observed Rotha, wishful to draw him out.

"Well, I don't know. I should not consider myself, for instance, passing rich on forty pounds a year." No, no; poverty is a cross-grained jade, and I should like to shake hands with her and part forever. A man with a healthy appetite may live on bread and cheese, but a little meat is good for him sometimes for all that," and Garton rocked himself, and looked so wise that Rotha stared at him.

"Bread and cheese?" she repeated. "What nonsense you are talking?"

"I don't think you know the taste of bread and cheese as well as I do," returned Garton, solemnly; "and when you do take it, it is not with the rind on. Bless you! we often build up our castles together, don't we, Rube? Rube is to live with me, Miss Maturin, and if I can manage it, little Johnnie Forbes, the lame boy, besides. And we are to have a cottage just a stone's throw from the church, with a garden all round it, and a bow-window to my study, looking toward the sea; and Rube is to have beeshives and poultry, and I'm to have a big telescope and a dog; and we are to bribe Deb to come and keep house for us. When Rube builds the castle, he always puts in plenty of marmalade for breakfast."

"Fox shame, Mr. Garton!" says Reuben, with a very red face; but it is a very favorite castle, and he chuckles over it nevertheless. Rotha looks at them both a little wistfully. What a pity, she thinks, that so simple an ambition cannot be gratified. She goes off in a dream presently, but Reuben wakes her up.

"You might have had the cottage over and over again by this time," says the boy, reproachfully, but his eyes are full of mischief. Garton bursts out laughing; Rotha looks at them for an explanation.

"The low-window wouldn't look on the sea, though," says Rube, provokingly, dodging behind a tree to escape Garton's missile; "but it is quite within a stone's throw of the church; and you know what Mr. Robert and the vicar said."

"Does he mean Nettie Underwood's house?" exclaimed Rotha, in surprise, and then again Garton burst out laughing. He was a little vague in his explanation, but Rotha afterward discovered that Reuben's joke was not without some foundation. Not many months ago Nettie Underwood had laid rather violent siege to the young sacristan—waylaying him on his way to and from the church, and otherwise making his life a burden to him.

Garton had always been indifferent to Nettie, but now she decidedly bored him. He turned sulky, and would not have anything to say to her when she came to the vicarage, bristling with gay-colored ribbons, and armed at all points for conquest. As far as he was concerned, Nettie might take her pink cheeks and bright eyes elsewhere; he told Robert so when that young gentleman counselled him to a more prudent course. "What should I do with a girl like that, who chatters from morning till night, and has three-and-twenty bosom friends?" said poor Garton, shrugging his shoulders. Nettie's little vanities and follies provoked and perplexed him. "If I marry at all, my wife shall be a lady," he continued, with a dignity never seen before in Garton Ord, "and not a girl who is ashamed of her own Christian name, and who laughs and talks so loud in the church-porch that the church-warden had to reprove her; and that's what she and Miss O'Brien did last Sunday, Robert."

"Nonsense!" returned Robert sharply. "Your wife is a lady, indeed! You may think yourself lucky if you ever get one at all, Gar. After all, beggars ought not to be choosers; and a good little girl like that, with six hundred a year of her own, will not long go without having plenty of admirers."

"Let her have them," answered Garton, stoically. "If I am a beggar, I won't sell my beggar's right of freedom for six hundred a year—not if I have to take Nettie Underwood with it." And he made this resolve so very potent to the young lady herself that Nettie took the hint and ceased her blandishments; but whether Garton's plain face had really captivated her fancy or not, she certainly turned a little sore on the subject, and was understood to be very cutting and distant to the young manhood of Kirkby and Blackscut in consequence. Since then she had been distinctly heard to declare to about fifteen or sixteen of her most intimate friends that it was her intention to live and die Nettie Underwood, unless she could meet with a gray-haired widower of about forty-five years of age, of independent means, with a soul for poetry, and who would not object to Aunt Eliza.

Rotha had not understood Reuben's joke in the least; but she did not forget it. She was a little silent over the sparring-match that followed the lad's mischief. By and by, when they propose walking to the head of the glen, she pleads a little fatigue still, and begs them to leave her. "It is so warm and sheltered here, and this old trunk makes such a comfortable arm-chair," she says, in the childish way that Garton already finds so irresistible. Somehow, he leaves her very unwillingly. The sunny notes flit before her eyes as she watches them disappear between the slender trees. Garton has his arm round the boy's neck as usual. "What a young David for such a Jonathan!" thinks Rotha, and she falls into a dream again. She is thinking of all the foolish things they have been telling her—the bow-windowed study, the big telescope, the garden, and the beehives.

Rotha is nearly two-and-twenty now; but she has never really been in love. She has led a life too much repressed, too prematurely old for that.

In the fairy-stories the prince comes to the rescue of the princess shut up in her brazen tower, guarded by all manner of hideous dragons. What delicious old stories those are!—older and bigger children read them again and again. One can fancy the stripping wielding his enchanted sword till the noxious reptiles lie dead at his feet. The little princess peeps through the keyhole. What a golden-haired, blue-eyed hero he is, she thinks. Presently, when the brazen doors roll back on their well-oiled hinges, she will run into his arms all smiles and tears. There is no shyness or nonsense of that sort in fairy-tales. The princess follows the prince through the world if he holds up his finger to beckon her. "Will you marry me?" he says, taking off his cap with the ostrich feathers, or his golden helmet, whichever it is. "Yes, that indeed I will," returns the princess. "I am so tired of spinning," and then he gives her his hand. Ah! there is the white palfrey, ready saddled and bridled, and now they are off. The wicked fairy godmother shakes her crutch after them; but she has no power now. Poof, away, true love for ever! Of course they marry, and live happily ever after, in the good, old-fashioned way.

Nobody comes to the poor little princess at Miss Binks', as she sits in the back-parlor hearing the younger children strum their eternal scales and exercises. Little fragments of dromas mix with the cracked chords, the wintry fire burns blackly, the room is full of shadows. "C minor, C major. You must not put the pedal down. Keep your wrist a little more elevated, Miss Carson, please."

Rotha is back in her dream again. Through the dim arcades of her fancy comes the prince—always the prince. Sometimes he is on horseback, sometimes on foot. He has blue eyes and yellow hair; he is tall and black-bearded. Sometimes he has a brown moustache, like the stranger who was at church yesterday. He comes up to her, and holds out his hand. He tells her a different story every time. He is a wandering artist—a German student, a nobleman in disguise. He has servants, and carriages, and horses; or he has a cottage covered with perennial roses. Of course it is the same refrain. They are conjugating the same old verb together: "I love, thou lovest, he loves."

"I can't see to play any more," said Miss Carson, yawning drearily, and Molly brings in the candles.

Molly has her dreams, too, as she black-leads her kitchen stove. The young ladies at Miss Binks' confide to Molly that they are in love with the slim-waisted young drawing-master, who has flaxen hair and pink eyes, and is supposed to be in a consumption. One of them, Miss Roper, thinks she will never get over it.

"Lor-a-mussy, Miss Belinda!" says Molly, smearing the blacklead from her face, "when you are older you will know the difference between a white-headed little stick like that and a man. You should see my Jen."

"Do you remember little Em'ly's idea of a gentleman's dress in David Copperfield? 'The sky-blue coat with the diamond buttons, the black hose, the black trousers, the red velvet waistcoat, and the cocked hat,' and David Copperfield's youthful fear that the cocked hat would hardly be considered appropriate?"

Molly's prince had a wide mouth and a turn-up nose and sleek shining hair. On Sunday, when he came courting, he wore a plush waistcoat and a blue neckerchief with white spots as big as half-crowns. How Molly gloried in that neckerchief! It is impossible to say whether she or the pupil-governess, Miss Maturin, despised the slim-waisted drawing-master the most.

Rotha had her dreams too in the dreary London house where she lived so long. As she read more they grew brighter and more alluring. She would extemporize all sorts of marvellous stories for herself as she sat gazing at the red-hot coals, when Mrs. Ord was having her nap in the twilight.

The fire burns very brightly; Rotha's cheeks glow with the heat as she shapes out an ideal future for herself. Does she see the woods of Burnley-upon-Sea, I wonder? Does she see herself sitting in her red cloak on the mossy tree trunk? Who is this coming through the dim vistas between the leafless trees? If a prince, a sorry one indeed: a tall figure, broad-shouldered and deep-chested; a prince, in a shabby coat, who has seldom worn gloves in his life, with a brown strong-featured face, with dark closely-cropped hair, with white gleaming teeth. A prince who swings his arms and laughs loudly; "a prince who looks like a boyish ascetic—half monkish, half kingling."

"You look like a picture, Miss Maturin," says Garton Ord as he comes up behind her. "What a pity I am not an artist. Rule will have it you only want the wolf to look like a grown-up Red Riding Hood; those saplings behind you make a sort of frame."

"It is getting cold now," says Rotha. "I thought you were never coming." Her cheeks have a pretty color in them as she rises sedately.

Down they go through the deepening twilight. The woods are all gray now.

"We shall be late for the train," says Garton, looking at his silver watch. "I am afraid we shall have to run for it."

He holds out his hand to Rotha—that is what the prince always does in the fairy tale, you know. Rotha hesitates a moment before she takes it. I suppose it must have looked rather absurd—a tall gentleman and a tall lady running hand-in-hand.

"Oh, I am out of breath," said Rotha presently.

"Never mind, there are the lights of the station," pleaded Garton, "just one effort more."

"Have you had a pleasant day?" asks Meg as she comes out to meet them.

"Yes, very pleasant," answered Rotha, with a shy look at Garton; "but we nearly lost the train, though."

"Miss Maturin has been studying the picturesque all day. It is a pity we never met a soul," says Garton mischievously.

"How do you know that I had not plenty of company when you left me?" returns Rotha, with a smile. "Either I fell asleep and dreamt a little while, or else the woods of Burnley-upon-Sea are haunted."

"You looked rather as though you had been dreaming," says stupid Gar.

ISRAEL IN EGYPT.

The Demand for Deliverance from the House of Bondage.

Exodus v. 1-14.

Verse 1. Previous to this Moses and Aaron had met the elders of Israel, that is, the representative heads of the tribes, and revealed to them their commission, and had been accepted by the people. This was the first step in the path of deliverance. The next was now to be taken. "Went in." Pharaoh held his court either at Memphis (near Cairo), or more probably at Tanis or Zoan, near the mouth of one of the eastern arms of the Nile, and in the vicinity of the land of Goshen. The request of Moses and Aaron was not in the nature of a demand upon Pharaoh from the universal Lord of all peoples, but rather the asking of a national Deity that His own people might serve Him. It was really a perfectly natural and modest requirement from the Egyptian standpoint even, and the asking that they might go into the wilderness was, in form, a scrupulousness against seeming to trespass upon the territory of Egypt. See II. Kings v. 17.

Verse 2. Either Pharaoh suspected the device, or he wished to show his utter scorn of the captive people. Note that the name here used is "Jehovah" of Israel, although that name is first used at the burning bush. Probably "the making known" the name is taken in a more intimate and special sense, that simply as the use of it for a designatory term.

Verse 3. "The Lord God of the Hebrews." This answers Pharaoh's objection that he knew not Jehovah. "Three days' journey into the wilderness." This more explicitly disclaims sovereignty over Egypt, and any intention to interfere with the religion of the land. "Lest He fall upon us." It will be noted that this request is made from the point of view of Pharaoh. He might, without admitting any claim of Jehovah, concede that the God of the Hebrews would probably punish His own people for neglect to honor Him. There was nothing in this request to awaken his anger.

Verse 4. "Let" is here used in the old English sense "to hinder." See Collect for Fourth Sunday in Advent. The king regarded this as a mere pretext to secure a holiday. If the three days' journey meant a journey occupying three days, then taking one day for the sacrifice that, with the return, would make a week's rest. Probably no Sabbaths were permitted to the Israelites, at least after their enslavement. This had now lasted over eighty years.

Verse 5. "The people of the land." That means the Hebrews, viz., the common people, the working people, as contrasted with the dominant classes of the Egyptians. "Are many." They were numerous enough, no doubt, to do the whole heavier work like beasts of burden.

Verse 6. "The taskmasters of the people." The Egyptian officers set over them to see that they performed their full work. It would appear that the Hebrews were not slaves of individual owners, but rather a great working caste employed on the public works, the bond-laborers of the nation.

Verse 7. "Straw to make brick." The Egyptian bricks were made of clay dried in the sun, and the chopped straw was mingled with the wet clay to make it more coherent. The proposition of Pharaoh seems like poor economy nowadays, but according to Oriental ideas the scheme was to get all the possible work out of the people in total indifference to human life, and at the same time to depress them still more by severity of toil, instead in dread of the more rapid increase of the Hebrews.

Verse 8. "The tale." This is another old English word, meaning the quantity of the bricks required, literally the number "told off." The king's idea is that the withholding of the straw would be made an excuse for not furnishing as many bricks as heretofore. "They be idle." We should say in like case rather "they are lazy." It means here "indisposed to work," rather than not actually working.

Verse 9. "Let there be more work." Literally as in the margin, "let the work be heavy upon the men." "Regard vain words." Namely the teachings of Moses and Aaron regarding the sacrifice at Mt. Sinai. Probably the whole plan of the Exodus was not at first confided to the people, as they would have shrunk back from it as too daring.

Verse 10. "The taskmasters." The Egyptian officials, "their officers," their Hebrew subordinates. These last would be, by Oriental usage, the elders of the people.

Verse 11. "Get you straw where you can find it." That is, furnish it for yourselves. "Yet not ought of your work." This was doubtless as great as they could already do. It is not at all likely that anything less would have been exacted.

Verse 12. "To gather stubble instead of straw." Literally "for straw." The stubble after the grain was harvested, left on the soil. This they had to convert into the fine-chopped straw mixed with the clay to increase the durability of the bricks. The excess of labor was therefore very great, including not only the gathering but the preparing.

Verse 13. "Hasted," that is hastened them, "drove them up," as the phrase is.

Verse 14. "The officers—were beaten." This shows that these last were the Hebrew heads of tribes and families, according to Oriental custom. To make these responsible was the surest way to reach the people themselves. The whole business might be paralleled now in Egypt or Syria. The authority of these "heads" was very great over the people under them.

AS THE LIFE IS, SO ITS END WILL BE.*

Let me try to draw out of your own chosen motto the last words of loving counsel I shall speak you: "As the life is, so its end will be." Now, life divides itself into more periods than even the seven stages of "sweetest Shakspeare's" thought, and every stage has its distinct and definite end. Only, all earthly endings have in them this element of earthliness, that they themselves come to an end. And the last end of all on earth has in it the unearthly element of unendingness, for it opens up eternity. And every phase and stage of life, complete in itself, is a microcosm of life. School life tells the story of the whole. And these successive times of termination have their chief value in that they furnish morals and force human truths which, if we lay to heart, we shall be wiser in the next period to which we pass. You know it, all of you, with more or less of gladness here to-day. The prize, the diploma, the medal, "the ribband of blue"—more even than these, the sense of what you are to-day, in furnishing of mind, in grace of education, in discipline of character, in development of nature, in mutual esteem, is proof that "the end is as the life has been." "Nulla dies sine linea;" no day without its trace, is true; and, what might have been, but is not; and, what is, which would not have been; what you have gained, as well as what you have failed to gain; the accumulated effect upon each separate nature tells the story and gives the result. Like the gradual working out of your own problems in trigonometry, which comes from a long series of substitutions and combinations, although the steps by which you reach them are rubbed out to make room for the results; so to-day's attainment means the outcome and issue of all the days and all the duties of your school life; their true value being only that they have brought about this end. "Qualis vita, finis ita," dear children. And I am glad to let the life of the years that you have been with us be judged by the end of them to-day.

And from the end of this you are to go forth, "fearless yet full of trembling," to begin a new and untried phase of this same mystery and responsibility of life, with this same legend speaking always in your ears, till you have come to its last stage—"As the life is, so its end shall be."

What have you learned here about the best way to make that end, that final earthly end—far off it may be, or very near:

"A day of white robes and rewards."

I am no believer in the theory of education which undervalues the separate items that make it up, or in the theory that only values these items for their practical use at last. I should be sorry to feel that even such dry things as dates and paradigms, as the problems of science, or the long lists of names, will be forgotten or lost. I believe it needful for educated people to keep some hold, at least, upon the separate details of what they learned. You will be wiser and readier to understand, to enjoy, to appreciate the glories of nature, the wonders of science, the intense interest of history, if you keep by you the dry bones of tables and statistics which clothe themselves with the beauty and wonder of life, in the world past, present, and to come. So, also, I trust that you will repudiate always the mere utilitarianism which measures learning only by the market value of just what that particular knowledge will bring in, will earn. The trained ear has music in it, even when the deft fingers forget in part to touch the keys. The mind retains—as the crystals keep their shape when the liquid that formed them is all dried away—the mind retains the impression of the exquisite accuracy of the ancient classics, when the Greek and Latin words themselves have lost their meaning. And the imagination floats on buoyant billows of refreshment and delight when it has quite forgotten the corks and bladders of the rules of rhetoric and grammar. If the seamstress knew nothing but her needle, where would the embroideries be in tapestries and altar frontals, that rival and repeat the story of Arachne. If the potter only knew the motion of his wheel and the moisture of his clay, where would be the glories of Sevres and Faience, of Lambeth and Worcester, of Paisley and Timworth to-day. We must strike a true balance between these vagaries. We must value and hold fast to the data of learning. And we must realize that even when they are forgotten, they are to be prized for the training that has come from them. And then we must realize, over all, that neither the remembered words and facts, nor the resultant knowledge and culture are all that comes out of this period that we call our school days—as if there was ever a day on earth or ever a day in Paradise, until the full knowledge, "even as we are known," is reached, that is not a school day. What is the outcome to be, what shall the reached end be, after the manner and shaping of your life here? What is the quality—which is the substantive of qualis—what is the real substantial, secured character, gained at the end of this particular period of your life; that which is to qualify—which is the verb of qualis—all the rest of your earthly lives, and fit them for that end which is only the beginning.

Well, dear children, we should stay long here if I told you all I hoped it would be; all the quality of grace, all the qualifying graces which I want to feel will go to make up your characters. And so I speak of only two things, which I long to have color and shape your lives into that gracious, queenly end of accomplished and accepted womanhood. And the first is seriousness, and the next considerateness. By which first I mean, not that you should go long faced and sour visaged into life, into society, into the world! But only that your "adorning shall be the adorning" of seriousness, of sedateness, of sobriety.

I believe it to be one of the very best and most important results of the discipline, without which this hive of humming industry would be a very Babel of confused noises, that one comes to attach importance to little things. A false quantity, a note wrong in a chord, a letter too much or too little in a word, speech in the time of silence, a minute late at roll-call; these are not great things in themselves, but they destroy the rhythm, make discord, mean carelessness, disturb order. They are little things, and in the home life of one, or two or three, they are passed by and counted at their positive value, and not noted much. But here they take on, what is the truest measure of all things, their relative importance; and so the habit grows of carefulness in little things; and so the tendency is cultivated of looking seriously and carefully at everything in life. It seems to me that the great error of to-day is just this lack of seriousness, in one or other of its various forms, frivolity, trifling, irreverence, superficialness, waste. Child nature is right, as it is often, in this matter. A child is serious, in earnest, real, occupied, intense, about doll-dressing, about its games of ball, about its soldier companies, or its tea-parties; careful and painstaking about its little interests, as though they were matters of importance to the world. And I want you to keep this up, to look at life so. For life is a serious thing, in every phase of it. And the miseries of many people are due to forgetfulness of this. There would be far less sadness, were there more seriousness. For seriousness has in it the two elements of joy, first of real interest, and then of real success. Divide the world, if you will, between bees and butterflies. But remember that the bee is humming and buzzing about its work, and has some song in all its seriousness. And remember, that the butterfly is busy, bent on something, and evidently serious, in his flitting way. And in this two-sided nature of your womanhood, which is half bee and half butterfly, half beauty and half business, be serious, with the steady soberness of a name, an object, some interest, and much reality, even in the byplay of your lives; and let the sweet sense of service and usefulness hum, like the pleasant song of bees, through all the soberness of your work. Whatsoever your hand findeth to do; and the variety of duties is far more the way of rest and refreshing, than the great contrasts between the weariness of overwork and the greater weariness of indolence; whatsoever your hand findeth to do; and it will find much in the hard work of enjoyment and in the greater enjoyment of real work; whatsoever your hand findeth to do, in the various spheres of Church and home, of society, of kindness to your kind, of study, exercise, accomplishment; "whatsoever your hand findeth to do, do it to your might." Let the habit of recognizing and realizing the importance of little things stay in you, and grow in you into the seriousness of earnest thoughtful lives. And let this be your

"wonted state,
With even step, and missing gait,
And looks commencing with the skies."

So too, my children, I beg you to qualify your characters, with the sweet quality of considerateness. Chiefest almost, among the advantages of school life, I count the acquisition of this virtue; let off against selfishness, against seriousness, against frivolity. It is a word of disputed derivation, but I confess I love to think the old Latin thought true: "A contemplatione siderum appellari videtur" it seems to be named from the observation of the stars. For, in the contemplation of that wonderful stellar world, we get just this thought, of mutual dependence and mutual relationship; the very essence of their order and their shining; of the stately sequence of their majestic march, which makes "the music of the spheres" of their groupings, of their service as signs, their guidance to the sailor, their grace and beauty, being in their carefulness of keeping in their place; not wandering stars, not comets that make the wonder of a month and are forgotten, but the steady constellations, "the sweet influences of Pleiades, and the unloosed "bands of Orion"; may we not say, not tautologically, the considerated stars. It is a mighty thought, dear children, which you may well have looked up into the heavens to learn; and the best telescope is that which brings near you this great lesson of life. It is the scriptural word "forbearing one another." It is the good Greek word which we have Englished into sympathy, fellow-feeling, feeling together; "weeping with them that weep, and rejoicing with them that rejoice"; the word which, when it passes into the speech of life, speaks with the tongue of men and angels, for it is the "imitatio Christi," the very likeness of our dear Lord. I do not stop to say how the close pressure of school-life almost compels this, upon mere selfish grounds. The man may step heavily, and stride at large, who walks alone. But in the crowd, the careless stepping that trends on others means necessarily the being trodden on. And to take a child out of the narrowness of home, where weak parental love is tempted too much to make way for it, and set that child into the close crowding of constant companionship, the companionship not of kinship but of fellowship, compels for very selfish comfort, the carefulness of others, which it asks from others for itself. Considerated, constellated children grow to be considerate men and women, as their nature widens and broadens, in that true expanding which, like the sweet action of a flower, lives by giving out and taking in. We are far more made upon the model of the minnow, than after the pattern of the porcupine. The selfishness that guards itself by sticking sharp quills of hurting against all contact with our kind, makes only enemies. The shrinking sensitiveness, which folds up into silence the word that might wound another, is the best protection against the sharpness of bitter speech. It is the sweet expression of those combined features of true charity: "kind, seeking not her own; bearing, believing, hoping, enduring all things." This you have learned here, dear children, it may be from the selfish motive of mere self-defence. Those two old friends in the story of the "Water Babies," "Mrs. Do-as-you'd-be-done-by," and "Mrs. Be-done-by-as-you-did," are teachers of a great lesson in the school of life. And out of school, into life, you need to take them, and live by them as you have learned them here. The bearing of one another's burdens lightens two loads. And there is no such secret of good manners, no such source of true politeness, no such salve for wounded feeling, no such oil for preventing friction and jar in the great machinery that we call society, as this grace of considerateness, of thoughtfulness for others, of bearing and forbearing in all the relations of life.

"Qualis vita, finis ita," as the life is, so its end will be; both ends—the earthly and the eternal. For here, this habit of seriousness and considerateness will work out, the thoroughness of attainment which makes the difference between reality and pretence, and the adjustment of each part to the whole, without which you can neither do your part nor let others do their part, in the great complex, wheel-within-wheel clock-work of humanity. And when we come to face the final end, the contemplation of eternity, the adjustment of the mutual relations of life, the influence and effect of one life on another, we shall have trained our eyes to look on the relations of eternal things, all trifles having passed away; and shall be fit to take our part in that wonderful order which "God has constituted," for everlasting activities, "the services of angels and men."

And as the end is, so the life shall be; the life eternal, only continuing the character wrought out here to its earthly end, in the soberness of intense and overwhelming joy, and in the fruition of perfect and eternal love.

It is not accident—there are no accidents—but sweet and suitable selection, that sets your graduation day on the feast of the Son of Consolation. What greater or more gracious thought for any one than this? What more could you, what other would you be? How better, than by this serious, self-forgetting considerateness, can you become daughters of consolation?

O, Son of God, our Captain of Salvation,
Thyself by suffering schooled to human grief,
We bless Thee for Thy sons of consolation,
Who follow in the steps of Thee their Chief.

And all true helpers, patient, kind and skillful,
Who shed Thy light across our darkened earth,
Connect the doubting, and restrain the wiffling,
Soothe the sick bed, and share the children's mirth.

Thus, Lord, Thy Barnabas, in memory keeping,
Still be Thy Church's watchword, "Comfort ye;"
Till in our Father's house shall end our weeping,
And all our wants be stilled in Thee.

God bless you, my beloved, and good-bye.

BIBLE TALKS TO MOTHERS.*

BY HARRIET E. ROSENQUEST.

The Weary Mother.

"I am weary of my life,"—GENESIS XXVII. 46.

Dear sisters, in looking down at your quiet faces during the waiting moments before service, I have often noticed how predominant is the expression of weariness. And now I have been asking "Our Father" to speak "comfortable words" to you through the lips of His handmaid, who is herself well acquainted with the feeling of weariness, and who herself has so often been refreshed, comforted, and strengthened by His Word through the power of the Holy Ghost, whose whole office is to revive and comfort the children of God. May He now call up to my remembrance "All things whatsoever Jesus hath said" to the weary and heavy-laden, and thus send rest and peace to you whom I so love.

Weariness is akin to sadness. We can feel very tired without suffering any particular depression of spirit, and mere physical weariness can soon be allayed by physical rest, but this is not the weariness which was the cause of the discouraged cry which sprang from the lips of the mother of Isaac's children. Rebekah, under the title of "The Partial and Scheming Mother," is already known to you, so to-day we will but use her words as given in the text; and to make our "Talk" practical we will put it under the heads of cause and remedy of a mother's weariness. And now, as applying more particularly to all, we will place care as the first cause. A mother's cares are, indeed, multitudinous. The father labors, but the mother is the care-bearer. Some of you may not know the full meaning of the word "care." It is "uneasiness of mind, very desirous, anxious, management." Surely here we have a good description of the usual state of a mother. Care, if borne in our own strength, is to our life what the nipping frost is to the beauty of nature. It withers our youth and glad spirit, it causes evil seeds to scatter themselves in our hearts, where they are sure to spring up the baneful plants of discontent, covetousness, and unbelief, and these wretched growths torment us until we cry out in despair, "I am weary of my life." Some poor creatures seek for moments of forgetfulness of their misery in the devil's cup of comfort, or else, heeding his promptings, they think to find rest in the suicide's grave. Satan's words of comfort are, "Drink, and forget. Curse God, and die, for dust thou art, and to dust thou wilt return." His bondage is a bitter one, and there is no remedy. Beloved, we are not of these. We have a sure and perfect remedy for our weariness. Listen to the words of our Comforter: "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and He will sustain thee." My sisters, are you all acquainted with this gracious promise, and are you obeying the call?

The opening words of the invitation, "Cast thy burden upon the Lord," would lead us to think that He intended to wholly remove the burden, but the closing clause, "I will sustain thee," shows us that He means something far better for us. He indeed offers to become our Yoke-Fellow. Precious thought!

Have you ever watched a yoke of oxen draw a heavy load up-hill? and have you noticed that sometimes one of the oxen seems to do the most of the drawing?

So our Yoke-Fellow willingly relieves us of the weight of our burden, and calls the yoke His. "Take My yoke upon you, and ye shall find rest unto your souls, for My yoke is easy." God grant you the wisdom to fully realize the meaning of these words of Jesus. We often speak of the help and comfort that we receive from some earthly friend, to whom we may have unburdened our cares. Now here is a "friend who sticketh closer than a brother," one to whom thousands of heavily-laden ones have turned in their weariness, and found a marvellous sustaining power to help them through their upward journey, and these are continually calling to us to "cast our cares upon Him, for He careth for us."

It is unbelief that drags us down. If we truly believed that Jesus cares for us our cares would turn into blessings, and our life would add glory to His name.

I will close this clause of our "talk" by repeating an apt illustration of our thoughts given by Mr. Pentecost, an Evangelist. He was one day visiting a Christian lady, who had been passing through many and great trials. Her heart was questioning God's love and mercy, as manifested toward herself. In her lap was lying, with its wrong side up, a piece of elaborate canvas embroidery. Mr. Pentecost's gaze coming in contact with it, he abruptly asked what she was making. She said that it was a cushion. "Well, (I will use his own words.) 'I said, 'I must say it is a very ugly and ill-conceived design, if indeed it is not without design.' With a slight tone of resentment, as I so rudely criticised her handiwork, she said, 'Why what do you mean?' I replied, 'Why, I am surprised that a sensible lady like yourself should be wasting your time on so untidy and senseless a piece of work as that; for I can see nothing but a lot of confused ends and bits of wool, apparently massed together without order and even without reference to color. Certainly there is no pattern or design in or about it.' She quickly turned it over and said, 'Why, you are stupid, you are, looking on the wrong side. Of course it looks ragged and confused on the wrong side where all the tangled and odd ends of the worsted are. But is not that a beautiful pattern? and do you not call that worth while to work out?' said she, turning the right side up. 'Ah,' said I, 'that side is indeed beautiful, and I see, after all, you are working to a plan, and one quite worth your handiwork. Even so, my dear friend, God is working out your life after a pattern which He has in heaven. You are just now seeing the wrong side of it. You are distressed and grieved about it, and can see no wisdom or love in it. But be sure that when you get to heaven, and see the wondrous pattern which God has wrought out in your life, stitch by stitch, you will forget all these sorrowful experiences, and will rejoice with exceeding great joy that these 'light afflictions,' which endured but for a moment, were working out for you a 'far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.'"

Hard Work.—There are some of you, my dear sisters, to whom God has said: "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." And this may have been added to an already care-burdened heart, if so you are indeed "heavy laden," yet all the more sure of the Lord's love and help; hear Him: "Come unto Me all ye who are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest." We must remember, in regard to all the invitations and promises of the Lord, that the realization of the blessing comes only through obedience to His Word. For instance, when He now calls you to Himself for rest and refreshment, He first gives the general promise of rest, and then tells how to acquire the blessing. He says "learn of Me," as it were; study My Word in search of the physical rest, while I, through the Holy Ghost, give rest to your soul. So come with me, dear sisters, let us "search the Scriptures" for the remedy that we now need. We will have to go to the very beginning of all things, even to the second chapter of Genesis. In the second verse we find: "And on the seventh day God ended His work which He had made; and He rested on the seventh day from all His work which He had made." This is the example. Now hear His command to us: "The seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy manservant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thy cattle, nor the stranger that is within thy gates."

Here is the "learn of Me" part of the invitation and promise of our Lord; and if all, God's people, should try to keep this number of the decalogue, thousands of poor wearied creatures would find "the rest of the Sabbath" a blessed reality, and the religion of Christ would be magnified in the sight of the world. I know how impossible to many of you this precept seems. Yet, dear sisters, I know, also, that much can be done on this line by us all. There seems to be time enough spared from your busy life for an occasional day of pleasure—a day when father, mother, children, and "the stranger that is within thy gates" can lay aside all work, while all give themselves up to the unwonted pleasant leisure. I have often watched to see if the day thus taken from your working days materially aided to the labor of the succeeding days. Invariably I find that the increased labor precedes the "outing," while languor and relaxed effort follow. Suppose, now, that the preparation day should be used each week for the coming of the Lord's day of rest, and on that day all were to give themselves up to the rest and peace of His sanctuary and the quiet pleasure of family reunion at home. Home and its inmates being in neat order and peaceable, does all this seem visionary and impracticable? I know of homes where this plan is followed, and you know of them also, and we can testify of their Sundays being a true day of rest; while the morning brings no listlessness of manner, nor disagreeable remembrances nor quarrels; no haunting debts or ruined clothes. I feel quite sure that you will not think that I am condemning all "outings," while urging you to seek the rest of the Sabbath. We all need recreation, only our dear Heavenly Father would have us to enjoy them in a healthful manner, to the strengthening of our spiritual as well as physical life. It is Satan who is striving to keep us from our promised rest, for he knows full well that, if we once learned the lesson on rest, and realized the fullness of the promise, we could never be drawn back into the labor, confusion, and profanity of our former Sabbaths. Oh, let us learn of Jesus, so shall we find the true rest of body and soul.

Sickness.—In your poor body worn and weary through disease? Turn to Jesus, and receive "grace sufficient for all your needs." Hear what comfortable words our Father is speaking to you: "The Lord will strengthen him upon the bed of languishing; Thou wilt make—turn—all his bed in his sickness." The Father promises that His Son will strengthen us, and then he gives His Son the command, "Thou wilt make all his bed." We who have gone through weary days and nights of sickness know how refreshing and comforting it is to have our bed turned and remade. Even in the midst of our suffering and weakness, the first contact with it causes a sigh of contentment to issue from our lips, and our eyes veil themselves in thankfulness, for "His arm is under our head," and "He knoweth all our infirmities." And as we cast our weariness upon His bosom "in the night His song will be with us," soothing our pain and distress—just as we mothers have so often soothed, with embrace and softly-sung hymns, our own sick little ones, till, like them, we will turn our cheek to His heart, and there find rest and healing.

Sins of Husbands.—This "cause" is truly a heart weariness. Yet, here again, Jesus is equal to your need. I have been thinking of several husbands whom I know whom Jesus has led, in answer to the faithful prayers of their wives; and, again, we know of wives who are crying out, in their misery, "I am weary of my life." Dear sisters, call up to your remembrance the lives of Abigail, Esther, and the saintly Monica. These lives are replete with examples of wisdom, tact, and spiritual strength while under severe trial. These women exemplified in their lives the power of trust in God. "What times I am afraid, I will trust in Thee." You will need to keep very close to the Lord in this weariness. Every moment you will need to feel His love, sympathy, and power. And unless this same power passes through your life to that of your husband your case is without a remedy. "Long suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith," are the only remedies.

Sins of Children.—Alas! dear mothers. If Rebekah's cry and its cause are yours. I greatly fear that the apparent cause of the sins of her children may be, in part, yours. A partial love and treatment, a lax discipline, and a disregard of strict truthfulness brought Rebekah into a weariness that lasted to her life's end; and the effect of her training brought her sons into bitter travail of spirit, and an enmity which bordered on murder. Come at once, my sisters, and learn of Jesus, the remedy of this weariness. "Therefore shall ye lay up these My words in your heart and in your soul, and bind them for a sign upon your hand, that they may be frontlets between your eyes; and ye shall teach them to your children, speaking of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. And thou shalt write them upon the door-posts of thine house, and upon thy gates."

Thus, "holiness to the Lord" must be written on all the house. Children should breathe the air of prayer, and "drink the milk of the Word." Job used to arise early in the morning to offer burnt offering "according to the number of all his children. For Job said, It may be that my sons have sinned—thus did Job continually." "Continually" a mother's prayers must ascend to the listening ear of God; "continually" our children must be taught God's law; they must be separated from "the children of Heth," "All the days" you and I must kneel before "the throne of grace" with the words on our lips, "Lord, behold me and the children whom Thou hast given me."

And now, dear sisters, I will close my "Talk" with a few words on the weariness through our own sins.

The nearer we live to God the more sensitive we are to the motions of sin within us. However ardent may be our desire for a life of holiness, still we are but pitiable objects to the divine gaze. Yet our deplorable weakness is our strongest plea, and we can with a sure hope cry, "A broken and a contrite heart, O God! Thou wilt not despise."

"Just as I am Thou wilt receive,
Wilt welcome, pardon, cleanse, relieve;
Because Thy promise I believe,
O Lamb of God: I come."

THE DUTY AND NEEDS OF THE CHURCH.

BY THE BISHOP OF IOWA.

II.

"Men should often be put in remembrance to take order for the settling of their temporal estates." This is a wise provision of the Church. The requirement to bring this matter before their parishioners is binding on the clergy. It may well be done from the chancel at the beginning of each half year, and should be enforced by strong and cogent reasoning. And there is another duty linked with it: "The minister shall not omit to move such sick persons as are of ability to be liberal to the poor." The Church, in these rubrical requirements, shows that she recognizes the true ownership of wealth. The silver and gold are not ours, but are God's. We do not hesitate to say that no baptized man has a right, before God or man, to make a will or settle his estate without an equitable recognition of God's share in the property he may have acquired. It is no wonder that the fortunes left by Christian men and Churchmen so often prove an injury rather than a blessing to those who receive them. God has been wronged. His Church has been defrauded. A part of the price has been kept back. The tithes have not been paid into the treasury. Men have dared to lie to the Holy Ghost in that they have professed that they have given themselves "bodies, spirits, souls"—all they are and all they have—to Him who bought them with the price of His most holy blood, and then have spent their lives, thus professedly consecrated to God, in money-getting, and have sought to keep all they got, relinquishing not their hold upon their wealth even when about to pass to the bar of God. There is a grave mistake in this matter. We dare to say that many a rich man will fail of salvation because he has not recognized the duty of giving alms. Prayers without offerings will not save the man of wealth. Dives in torment is a case in point. Faith without works is dead.

Of old our wills began: "In the name of God, Amen." Every Christian's will should thus begin; and there should follow full and fitting recognition of Him who giveth men power to get wealth. The great charities of the Church at large, and those of the Church in the diocese or parish, should be remembered. They should have been remembered all through one's life. With us there are many wills soon to be admitted to probate which shall be disallowed at the bar of God. Wealth often secures a recognition and respect here which will be withheld when "the books are opened," and the record of niggardly charities is exposed to the light of a universe. Beloved, "while we have time, let us do good unto all men, and especially unto them that are of the household of the faith." In other words, "be ready to give, and glad to distribute;" otherwise you may lack "the good foundation against the time to come." The Church, for its missionary, its educational, its general work, asks, needs, claims its share of the gifts given you of God, that you might have to give back to Him. Alas! how many rich Churchmen in Iowa it will be found, all too late, that God's words are true, "He that soweth little shall reap little." Thank God, my rich hearer, that you may yet sow, by promptness and such a liberality as shall stand the scrutiny of judgment, the seeds of an eternal harvesting. But, remember, when your alms are asked, your offerings solicited, your books balanced, your wills made, that "God is not mocked!" Remember, too, that not a penny of your rentals, or that which may have been paid for the support of services and for the stipend of your parish priest, is credited in God's book of accounts as alms. The provision of the services of the Church is as much a duty as the provision of bread for your family, or the advantages of education for your children. The giving of alms is the offering of your means to God in ways in which you are not personally benefited. There is much misapprehension on this point. Men of wealth talk of their gifts to God's Church, reckoning in the sums they have paid for the luxurious sittings they and their families occupy, forgetting that that is not alms for which they receive a return. The services of the priest, the ministrations in the sanctuary, the instructions from the pulpit, the care and consolations in illness, the offices and sacraments of the Church in life and at the last of earth, are a hundred-fold return for the niggardly sums doled out by the occupants of the pews to keep alive the priest of God, and to prevent the closing of the Church's doors. But let no one think for a moment that these small payments for the support of services are in any sense a gift to God in the sense of alms, to come up before Him for a memorial. The man or woman who goes to the bar of God with no other treasure laid up in heaven than the weekly pledge or the quarterly pew-rental, will find, all too late, that God is not mocked. He will not accept that as alms for which there has been rendered more than a full equivalent.

We cannot, if we would, shut our eyes to dangers that threaten us in the ever widening breach between our Christianity and the working-classes. I do not propose to discuss at length this much-talked-of social problem. I do not feel qualified to decide the points of controversy between the one side and the other. I have no panacea to offer for the reconciling of labor and capital; but I am confident of this one thing, that if our Christianity was more Christlike, and, like the Master, went daily, hourly—even more frequently, if needed—to the humble homes of the poor on errands of love, sympathy and brotherly kindness, and, like the Christ Himself, proclaimed the true brotherhood of man, each and all alike brothers of Him who has revealed Himself to man as our Elder Brother, and in his incarnation bore our common sins and sorrows, the line of severance between the working-classes and the Church would be materially effaced. As we sit comfortably on our cushioned pews in church and listen to the story given in the Acts of the Apostles, of the relations between the Church and capital and labor in those first days, when men parted with lands and houses, and sold all that they had and came and laid the price at the apostles' feet, will there not come to our minds some sense of the discrepancy between our own position and practice as Christians and that of the apostolic age? The remedy for trades-unions and communism is simply the observance by the rich and well-to-do of the royal law of loving our neighbors as ourselves; not in a mere generalization, but in doing, laboring, caring for our poorer neighbors, bearing their burdens, or at least helping them to bear them—denying ourselves, really denying ourselves, for them. To do this we must go to our estranged and long neglected brothers, and, first winning their love, then lead, or rather go with them, hand in hand, to the loving Christ. The Church of Christ is failing to do her duty. We, as Christians, are personally at fault if we are making no direct effort, each one in his own immediate neighborhood, to win to Christ and His Church the poor, the ignorant, the neglected, who are everywhere about us. Can we, individually, face the scrutiny of judgment, if, content with saving our own souls, we have never made a personal effort or taken the lightest pains to save a neighbor's soul?

Are we living as Christians when we confer ourselves with our personal church-going, and never strive to bring within the influences of the Church those about us who are living without God and without hope in the world? What will our repetition of the prayer, "Thy Kingdom Come," avail, if we do nothing ourselves to bring in that Kingdom and extend its sway over rebellious or indifferent hearts? Are we Christlike at all, is our professed Christianity other than the thinnest veneer, the veriest sham and hypocrisy, if we relegate our care and keeping of our brother—that is, the man who needs our aid, or might be helped by our effort—to others, or, as is too often the case, if we never give the subject a thought. There are men, there are women, who recognize the duty of personal ministrations to those who need—who, like their Lord, seek in the highways and hedges, in the very slums of our cities, and among the outcasts of society, to raise the fallen, to reclaim the erring, to minister to the needy, to bring Christ's Word and sacraments to the lowly and the lost. The vows of God are upon them. God help them; God multiply their numbers; and may we, individually, help on this work. Help it, not by a pittance thrown as to a beggar, but by personal effort, by actual self-denial, by a recognition of our bounden duty in the sight of God. Opportunities for this work are about us. Every church, even the feeblest, should have its outlying mission work. This work should not be made the excuse for the neglect of other work, but should stimulate to more and greater ventures of faith. Every deacon, every priest, should seek out opportunities for ministering, both in public and private, to the spiritually neglected portions of the community where he serves. The clergyman, by virtue of his office, his commission, his spiritual powers, is, like the Master, bound to seek—and to save the lost. His work is not done when he has ministered to the reputable and outwardly moral congregation who choose to ally themselves to his parish, and who contribute to his support. He is God's priest, and should remember that, at the most solemn moment of his life, ere hands were laid on him in ordination to this office and administration of the word and sacraments, he pledged himself to seek for Christ's sheep that are dispersed abroad, and for His children who are in the midst of this naughty world, that they may be saved through Christ forever. In the redemption of this most solemn vow, which transcends and supercedes other obligations that may seem to conflict therewith, the laity should fully and freely help the priest; and the work of bringing within the reach of the influences of the Church and Christianity those who are living without God in the world, if once faithfully undertaken, will be found one that God Himself will delight to honor. In watering others you will be watered yourselves; in scattering abroad they shall come back to you the full, overflowing measure of God's love and bounty. The recompense will be an hundred-fold.—Convention Address.

LISTEN!

BY H. E. W.

Listen—we cannot hear it
With our faces turned away,
With our hands all laden with baubles,
Like children at their play,
With hearts absorbed by our pleasure,
Our selfish loss, or our gain,
Oh, how can we hear creation's
Great undertone of pain!

Listen—before the silver
And the gold of life are dim,
God asks for a tenth of our portion—
Some give it all to Him;
Aid some, all in some repenting
They kept back part of the price,
Have laid down their spent lives mourning
"Too late for sacrifice!"

Oh, it is not our lucre only
In sign of our faith Christ craves,
Our life is rich gold for using,
Who hoards it never saves.
And the silver of love God asketh
In our gifts to all who need—
The "tenth" alone of our money
Were offering poor indeed.

Listen—a Voice inspiring
Breathes in creation too;
Listen—that Voice will guide us
To something that we can do—Something to lessen earth's groaning
And lay at the Master's feet,
Worthy because He will bless it
And make the work complete.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

HOW THE TWINS KEPT THE FOURTH.

Up in the large cherry tree, perched on the swaying branches like birds, were Edward and Edwin, or Eddie and Teddie, as they were familiarly called, hunting for stray cherries that might have slyly hidden away behind the green leaves and escaped hitherto both the boys and the robins.

There were not very many, you may be sure, but now and then they found one to reward them for their exertions, so they did not give up their search.

They were trying to lay their plans for the coming Fourth of July, and just now they had resolved themselves into a committee of ways and means, and were calculating how to get the greatest possible amount of noise and powder out of the rather limited funds they had in their banks carefully hoarded up during the last few weeks for this patriotic occasion.

"Boys!" called grandma, coming to the kitchen door and looking in all directions for the twins. No one was ever quite sure where they were until after they were in bed and asleep for the night.

A cherry dropping into the basket she held in her hand made her look up among the green branches of the tree overhead, and she saw the laughing faces of the two boys among the leaves.

It would have greatly puzzled any stranger to tell which of the two faces was Eddie's and which was Teddie's, and even grandma was sometimes perplexed. Both boys had the same brown eyes, sparkling with fun and mischief continually, the same rosy cheeks so freckled and tanned that it was hard to distinguish the original color, even the dimples, against which they rebelled as being too "girlish," were in exactly the same spot, and just now hands and faces were stained alike with the cherries they had been eating.

"I see you!" said grandma, as they tried to hide themselves in the branches. "I want you to go somewhere for me, and here are some cakes for you to eat on the way."

The boys always liked to go on grandma's errands, for somehow her supply of cakes and cookies seemed inexhaustible, and she seemed to know just exactly how nice it was to have a pocketful of good things when one started out for a long walk.

"All right, grandma, we'll go," they answered together, and in another moment they were at her side waiting for directions.

The basket was not a heavy one, and the path which the boys were to take was one that they particularly liked, so they started off, whistling as cheerily as the birds who now returned to take undisputed possession of the cherry tree.

"I say, boys, wait a minute, will you?" called a voice, and looking back they saw a boy a little older than themselves, hastening to overtake them.

"You're just the fellows I wanted to see," said the newcomer, as he came up to them. "All the boys that go to our school are going to put their money together, and have a regular glorification on the Fourth of July. We are going to take our dinners and suppers with us, and drive over to Harvey Lake, and spend the day in fishing and having a good time. Then we are going to buy a lot of fireworks and set them off in the "All right," answered Rob. "Well, I must go home again. Good-by," and he jumped over the fence and started home across the fields.

The boys were so delighted at the prospect of spending their Fourth of July at Harvey Lake that they could talk of nothing else during the remainder of their walk, and came very near passing the house to which they had been sent, they were so interested in their conversation.

They knocked at the door, and hearing a voice say, "Come in," they pushed it open, and went in.

"Grandma sent you this basket," said Eddie, who was generally the spokesman for the twins, giving the basket to a woman who was stiteling busily away by the window.

"Sit down, and rest yourselves, while I take the things out," said she, giving them chairs, while she proceeded to empty the basket of its contents.

"Grandma told us to ask how your little boy was," said Eddie presently remembering that they had not given all their message.

"He's feeling a good deal better lately," she answered. "Thank your grandma for all the nice things she has sent him. I know they'll do him good, for they are so nice they can't but tempt him to eat. He's just been asleep for a little while; but I will bring him out to see you. It will brighten him up to see visitors."

She went into the inner room, and soon returned, carrying a little boy in her strong arms. Such a thin, pale little fellow as he was, wasted almost to a shadow, with white cheeks and dark blue rings around his sunken eyes. The boys looked at him in wondering pity, trying to imagine how it would feel to be so helpless.

"How soon will he be well and strong again?" asked Eddie, shyly.

The mother sighed.

"He'll never be able to run about again, poor little fellow," she answered. "The doctors say he can never walk, for he's got trouble with his hip, and his limbs are all wasting away; but we hope he will soon be much stronger and better in other ways than he is now."

"Can't he ever run about and play?" asked Teddie, pitying this poor little cripple from the depths of his boyish heart.

His mother shook her head sadly as she answered,

"No; my poor little Willie hasn't any of the outdoor pleasures of most children, but we try to make him as happy as we can. Some days he has no pain, and then he can pass the time away with evening. Some of the boys thought maybe you would like to go along, so I come over to ask you."

"That will be splendid!" exclaimed the boys in one breath, their faces showing how delighted they were at the idea.

"We'll have to ask grandma and grandma about it," added Eddie; "but I guess they'll let us go."

"You tell them my father is going along to keep us straight, and then they won't be afraid of anything happening to you," answered Rob. "You let me know to-morrow whether you can go or not, and how much money you can put toward it. We're going to take ice-cream along too. I forgot to tell you."

"We'll have a jolly time, won't we?" exclaimed Teddie eagerly. "I'll let you know all about it as soon as we ask grandma."

a bit of paper and a pencil, as happy as a king. "I'll show you some of the pictures he makes," and opening a drawer, she took out some scraps of paper and gave them to the boys.

"Did you draw these all yourself?" asked Teddie, in astonishment.

"Yes; I never had nobody to show me," answered Willie, looking pleased at the boy's evident admiration of his work.

"Willie thinks he could make a great artist of himself some day," said his mother, fondly stroking his head as she spoke. "He's crazy for a paint-box. He thinks he could do everything then. There was a gentleman here once making a picture of that old mill yonder, and he took a good bit of notice of Willie, and gave him some bits of paint. He used them all up long ago; but as long as they lasted, he never once cared that he couldn't run about like others."

"Why don't you get him a whole box of paints?" asked Teddie.

"I have been promising him one as soon as I can lay by enough to buy it," answered his mother. "But somehow, with all the medicine I have to buy, and the doctor's bills and one thing and another, I don't seem to be any nearer it now than I was a year ago. Never mind, Willie, you shall have one some day."

"I guess it's time we were going," said Teddie, as he saw that the hands of the old clock on the mantel pointed toward their supper hour. "Good-bye, Willie; we'll come to see you again," and the boys looked back when they reached the gate to wave their hats to the little invalid.

"Ted, I've thought of something just splendid!" exclaimed Eddie.

"What is it?" asked Ted.

"Let's you and me buy that poor little boy a paint-box out of our own money. Wouldn't it please him?"

"All right, let's do," returned Teddie, eagerly. "We'll get grandpa to buy it the very next time he goes to town, and then we can take it over and give it to him."

"Don't he draw beautiful?" said Eddie. "Everything looked so natural in his pictures; don't you remember how nice that horse's legs looked?"

"Yes, mine never look that way," answered Teddie. "I guess he will make real pretty things when he gets a paint-box."

"Oh, we can't get it for him after all, at least just now we can't," said Eddie, stopping short, with a look of disappointment on his face.

"Why can't we, I should like to know?" demanded Teddie.

"Why, we forgot all about Fourth of July when we were talking about the paint-box. We haven't got much money anyhow in our banks, and if we take the most of it out for a paint-box, we won't have enough to go with the boys. We wouldn't want to go, and then not give as much as the others."

"Oh, dear, I don't see what we're going to do about it!" sighed Teddie. "I've just set my heart on giving that poor little lame boy a paint-box; but if we get him that we won't have enough to go with the boys, and we couldn't give up our Fourth of July. What will we do?"

"I suppose we will have to let the paint-box wait until we save up some more money," answered Eddie. "But it will take so long. Let's see: we have five cents a week apiece, and if we didn't spend a single cent for ourselves it would take a good many weeks before we had enough for a nice paint-box. I do wish we had more money."

"So do I; but it's no use talking about it," said Ted. "We'll just have to wait. Let's see who'll get home first," and off they started, never once stopping till they rushed into the kitchen where grandpa was busy getting supper.

They had a great deal to tell her about their visit to the little lame boy, and then they had to gain her consent to the plan of spending the Fourth of July at Harvey Lake.

"We will see what grandpa says about it," was all she would say, for she was afraid that some accident might befall them, with no one to take particular care of them.

Grandpa's consent was more easily obtained, however, when he heard that Rob's father was to have charge of the party, so the boys went to bed, happy in the thought of their coming pleasure.

They had been in bed for some time and each thought the other asleep, when Eddie's voice broke the silence.

"The days must be awful long when you have to sit still all the time, and haven't got anything to amuse yourself with, either."

"I was just thinking about that very same thing," answered Ted, sitting up in bed and pushing his short wavy curls back from his face: "and I've been thinking about something else, too. Do you know what it is, Eddie?"

"I suppose it's just the same thing that I'm bothering my head about, too," answered Eddie, half impatiently. "I suppose we could give Willie the paint box now, and he would have it to amuse him all summer if we could only give up our Fourth of July, but we couldn't possibly do that, after we've been counting on it for so long, too."

"No, of course we couldn't," echoed Ted rather faintly, and then both boys were quiet for a time.

Their thoughts must have gone back to the poor little invalid, for presently Ted said: "We have lots of good times, not counting Fourth of July days, don't we?"

"Willie don't, though," answered Eddie.

"Eddie," very faintly from under the bed-cloths came Ted's voice, "If you'll give up your Fourth of July I will, and we'll get the paint-box instead."

"All right," answered Eddie, and two brown hands clasped each other tightly in token that the compact was sealed.

There was a suspicious sound coming from the depths of Ted's pillow presently, and Eddie echoed it.

"When we tell grandpa about it, she'll say we did right, anyhow," said Ted, finding this one drop of comfort in his cup of sorrow.

"And Willie will be awful happy and surprised when we give him the paint-box," added Eddie sleepily, as he closed his eyes for the night.

The boys told grandpa of their determination the next morning, and grandpa promised that the very next time he went to town, which would be the day before the Fourth, he would get the nicest set of artist's materials that he could find for Willie.

"And I will promise that you shall have a nice time after all," added grandpa.

When grandpa returned from the city the boys were more delighted with the box containing everything necessary for drawing and painting than if they had expected to use it themselves.

Grandpa did not tell them that he had added considerably to the pile of pennies they had given him, so the boys thought it was entirely their own gift.

"Suppose we go over there in the morning and bring them all over to spend the day," suggested grandpa.

The boys were pleased with the idea; so they started off in the carry-all soon after breakfast.

They peeped in the window as they reached the house, and saw Willie sitting on a little stool, while his sister was trying in vain to coax him to eat his breakfast.

"Just eat a little bit, Willie," she begged, with her arm lovingly about his neck.

Willie's pale face grew bright when the boys entered with their grandfather, and told him of the plan for the day.

The little sisters were no less happy, and it was not long before the whole party had set out on their homeward way.

As old Dobbin turned in the lane leading up to the house it was Eddie's and Teddie's turn to be surprised.

There in the middle of the lawn stood a little tent, just the very thing the boys had been longing for all summer, and beside it were hung hammocks between the great trees, and an easy-chair, that must have been put there on purpose for Willie.

In the tent the boys found a box bearing their names, and when they opened it they fully shouted with delight, for it was full of fire-crackers, torpedos, and everything else that would gladden a boy's heart on the Fourth of July.

"Oh, grandma, you are just too jolly for anything!" cried Teddie, as she came out of the house, smiling at the sight of their pleasure, to receive her visitors, and both the twins rushed at her and tried to express their delight in a hug that was so vigorous that she had to plead for mercy.

The boys at Harvey Lake had a nice time that day, but they did not enjoy themselves any more than did the twins and their little guests.

Grandma sent dinner out to the tent to the children, and it seemed twice as good as any dinner they had ever eaten indoors.

Willie's pale cheeks glowed with pleasure, and when the boys gave him the paint-box his joy and gratitude were beyond expression.

"We've had such a splendid time," said Teddie that evening, when grandma came to give them a good-night kiss.

"Indeed we have," added Eddie, "and, grandma, I do believe the nicest part of all was when we gave Willie the paint-box."

"It is more blessed to give than to receive," repeated grandma, softly, as she left them to go to sleep and live over the pleasures of the day in their dreams.

PARAGRAPHIC.

HALL'S Journal of Health calls attention to the fact that the free use of quinine in malaria very often has an injurious effect upon the bearing, sometimes wholly destroying it. We are surprised that phenic acid is not more generally tried in malaria, for it would seem to be almost an absolute specific, with no resulting ill consequences from its use.

It would seem that microbes are no recent discovery of scientists. As long ago as 1781 Dr. Samuel Johnson said: "I suspect dysenteries to be produced by animalcula, which I know not how to kill." After a century the suspicion of the great lexicographer becomes the certainty of science, but how to kill animalcula is still an unworked problem.

AFTER an existence of sixty-seven years, we learn by the annual report of the Board of Education of this city, that the schools for colored children have ceased to exist in a separate form, having been absorbed into the general system. The report makes a volume of 354 pages, and is full of interest to all who have children to educate in the public schools.

The year's report of the Chapel of L'Emmanuel, Philadelphia, the Rev. M. Zara, rector, shows 2 baptisms and 31 confirmations. There is a night-school for children and adults, with 75 to 100 scholars, and there are 45 children in the Sunday-school. More than 500 Italians frequent the chapel. There is no general summary of receipts and expenditures.

COMPARING the statistics of 1880 and 1880, it appears that during the twenty years the increase of the negro population was 48 per cent., and of the white 61 per cent., despite the unfavorable influence of the war. The colored race is losing rather than gaining on the white. The census of 1870 was made for a purpose, and on this subject is notoriously unreliable.

"God tempers the wind to the shorn lamb," though most familiar to us in the writings of Sterne, may be traced back, almost word for word, to Henri Estienne, 1594. George Herbert says, "To a close-shorn sheep God tempers by measure," and in the same form, nearly, it may be found as a Languedoc proverb. Sterne often forgot to give due credit for his gems.

In Rhode Island, a State not so large as a good many counties in other States, 2,385 divorces have been granted in the last ten years. Owing to loose laws the applicants, in many cases, are persons having only temporary residence, and who belong to other States and go to Rhode Island to procure divorces, as persons go to Philadelphia and Chicago. Rhode Island is about putting up the bars.

The Clergymen's Mutual Insurance League has in seventeen years distributed to the widows and orphans of deceased clergymen $348,989. The number of deaths last year was four, and thirty new members were added to the league. During the seventeen years of its existence the deaths among the members have been 266, and the mortuary benefit has ranged from $550 to $2,150. The laity do much to help the league by joining it without receiving the mortuary dues.

The leading journal of the Congregationalists admits that the Andover Theological Seminary has lapsed from the faith in which it was founded, and deplores the fact. It does not believe that the denomination will approve the defection, but there seems to be no remedy, and the errorists have possession of the institution and its large endowments. There is a preserving power in the creeds and liturgy of the Church, and men cannot in her easily pray like Canterbury and preach like Geneva.

The Trinity Church Year Book for 1885 contains 112 pages of interesting facts and statistics of the great parish, as they relate to the mother church and its various chapels. Including the rector, Dr. Dix, there are 19 clergy in the parish. Of these 18 are known as assistant ministers, but of these only four, Rev. Dr. Weston, Swope, Mulchahey, and Rev. Mr. Douglas are assigned to duty by the vestry, and are the senior assistants. A valuable addition to the year book is the summary of the general statistics of the parish, from which we gather the following items: Baptisms, 1,352; confirmations, 561; communicants, 5,352; marriages, 249; burials, 385; Sunday-school scholars, 4,374; parish school scholars (daily), 699; parish night-school scholars, 255; industrial school scholars, 1,746; parish collections and contributions reported to the rector, $60,909.13; appropriated by the vestry for parish purposes, $42,099.48; for purposes outside the parish, $39,366.06; or a total of collections and appropriations of $142,374.67. It will be seen that the operations of Trinity church are greater than those of a number of our dioceses, and as in days of old its head might well be a mitred Abbot, and the parish a diocese within a diocese.

The Churchman.

SATURDAY, JULY 18, 1885.

THE late Susan M. Edson, in leaving several bequests to the assistant-bishop and other clergy, as also to a number of Church charities, had a very sensible and natural way of "marking her interest in the Church of God and its works." If the gratitude and benevolence of more of the rich and well-to-do could express themselves in this way, it would be far better for the Church, and assuredly no worse for their relatives and heirs. It is said to be the chief concern of people of large means to know how to dispose of their property. It ought to be at least a part of their concern, also, to know how not to dispose of it. It is the misguided and harmful way of making bequests that is so often to be deplored. Something more of giving to the Church and her charities would be, if erring, erring on the safe side, and a way of showing that religion is something to be grateful for and entitled to be remembered.

A PRACTICAL PROPOSAL.

The Revised Bible bears, like its forerunner, the Revised New Testament, the assertion of conscious incompetency on its front. The American revisers cannot agree with their English brethren, and, again, we have two Revisions instead of the one work that was bargained for. This fact is a sentence of death upon the attempt to supersede the well-tried and most satisfactory English version.

Mark the apathy with which the book has been received. Dampened by the utter failure of the Greek revisers, curiosity itself was dead when the Hebrew revisers brought forward the result of their labors, which, as a bookseller's speculation, "drags its slow length along." The American supplement, breathing discontent, and pressing upon public attention amendments which have been overruled, is of itself an indictment of the effort as an entire failure. If the revisionists cannot agree upon a definite result, how can the public at large be expected to reach a conclusion more satisfactory? "Under which klug?" Will you have the American Revision? The English have discarded it. You cannot have a common English Bible save by adhering to the old. Well may the instinct of our own House of Bishops be congratulated for declining to be mixed up with a consequence they foresaw.

What then? Are the real learning and patient industry of these scholars to be quite without fruit? We think not. The work is valuable as the highest evidence of the sufficiency of the Old Version, which they have thrown into the fire and which comes forth—pure gold. But this is not the only service which the revisers have done. For, here and there, they have really cleared up a meaningless verse, or rectified a palpable error. One course remains, in our judgment, to the American Church. Let her appoint a commission to review the whole work, and note what amendments may be profitably introduced into the margin. With the report of said commission, let the next Lambeth Conference be urged to compare the Revision, and by an agreement between us and them let the Old Version remain, but with a margin revised.

CHRISTIAN EDUCATION.

While there has been a great advance in the founding of distinctly Church schools and colleges in this country, there is still a prejudice against the union of religious and secular training, which sometimes shows itself in protest against the name, as well as the reality, of Church schools. It is assumed that religion will not be so well taught when it is combined with secular teaching, and that the secular education will be less perfect, in its turn, because of the time given to the other.

If the object of education was to train up the young in one or two specialties, there might be some sense in this; not so much, by any means, as is often supposed. Specialist training is often accurate at the expense of all breadth and freedom. A water-pipe will convey the contents of a reservoir in the most direct manner, but there may be also loss of benefits in the change from a natural lake and a river running out of it. But the American idea has run altogether too much to the cultivation of specialties. This, in turn, has led to the notion that a little of everything should be taught, so that each pupil should have a chance to learn his or her own favorite. The elective system in the greater colleges is pushed to its extreme, thus combining the two, the worship of a particular branch, with the freedom of choice.

We hold that this is all wrong. It is one purpose, indeed, of the educator to find out the particular thing the pupil is best fitted for, and to develop that. But this can only be done rightly by recognizing the opposite principle, that there is one general end for which all should be fitted, irrespective of disposition and temperament. No man or woman is fit for his or her calling without being also and above the special preparation—a Christian. Now the Church college and Church school recognizes that. It will send out Christian men and women at all events, and for the rest as much in the way of other training as it is able. The fear of some is that this will leave the Church college behind in the race. We distinctly deny this. Whatever may be lacking in surface brilliancy will be more than made up in other points.

To sum up in a word, a scholar who is taught to study with a conscience will, in the end, come out better than if he studies from any other motive. For conscience is the recognition of religious duty, and the source of that can be found only in religious training. The religious training which we believe in, we need hardly say, is Church training.

THE ENGLISH CHURCH AND ENGLISH FRANCHISE.

The extension of the franchise in England is expected to bring about important political and social changes. Two or three millions of Englishmen are soon to be heard from for the first time touching matters of greatest consequence to the Church and the nation. The Liberation Society is, of course, concerned to secure and make the most of this new force in bringing about disestablishment. The Church Defence Institution, on the other hand, would make it an ally in maintaining the present relation of Church and State. It is hard to see, as yet, how these new voters will throw their influence, though this influence is certainly counted on on both sides, and is to become a factor in solving one of the most serious problems which concern the nation.

The one great question which will be likely to weigh with these voters is whether the people of England would be likely to gain anything by disestablishment. What would the Church gain by it? Would it be more united, or enjoy greater liberty, or be more alive to the spiritual needs of the great body of the people? What would the State gain by it? Would the laws be more just, judges more upright, political parties more disinterested and patriotic, the people more loyal and contented? What would the Church and the State gain by it, considered as organized methods and relations by which the people are bound together and enabled to work out their destiny? Would they be the rather held to the idea that society, whether civil or ecclesiastical, is essentially one, and that it makes in one direction; that Church and State, under whatever relations they exist, are bound together by innumerable ties, and that the good or ill of either is the good or ill of both? What if to ask these questions is to answer them? Looking at the matter in the light of wisdom or unwisdom, gain or loss, who believes that either the Church of England or the State of England, or the Church and State, in respect to those co-relations which have a oneness of idea and object, whatever their diversity, would be the better off for whatever disestablishment could do for them?

Happily the champions of the Establishment are beginning to see that the question is simply one of expediency. The Church Defence Institution does not fall back on prescriptive rights, but on what the Church of England is able to point to by way of liberty and practical development. They point to what it is doing in the way of missionary enterprises, in the matter of education, in a vast and manifold work of philanthropy, and in every other way in which a Church can declare itself to be neither cold nor lukewarm. This is the real test of any Church, whether established or disestablished.

THE BOOKS OF THE BIBLE.*

Leviticus.

The name of this book, familiar to readers of the English Bible, is due to the Greek Leuiticon (Sept. Λευιτικόν), the book relating to the Levites, and Latinized into Leuiticus (Vulgate). In the Hebrew Bible it is called Vayikrah (ויקרא), this being the first word of the book and signifying: "And he called." In the Rabbinical writings it is also called "Law of the Priests" (תורת הכהנים) and "Law of offerings" (תורת הקרבנות).

In the Hebrew Bibles it consists of ten sections, viz.: Ch. i. 1; vi. 1; ix. 1; xii. 1; xiv. 1; xvi. 1; xix. 1; xxi. 1; xxv. 1; xxvi. 3—xxvii. 34. The name of each of these sections is due to its initial word, and the modern Jews give the name Vayikrah both to the third Book of the Pentateuch, and to the first of the aforesaid sections, which is the twenty-fourth section of the Pentateuch.

The Book of Leviticus is closely connected with the Books of Exodus and Numbers; with the former, in narrating the consecration of Aaron and his sons (Lev. viii. 9), the directions for which are given Ex. xxix. 1, seq.; with the latter, in giving the chief part of the Sinaitic legislation, which is concluded in the Book of Numbers.

Excepting two historical sections, viz., Ch. viii.—x and xxiv. 10—23, the Book of Leviticus is a Code of Laws.

These laws appear to have been delivered during the first month of the second year after the Departure from Egypt.

The authorship of this book is generally ascribed to Moses. From one passage it has been argued that it must have been written by some one who lived later than Moses; it occurs at Ch. xviii. 28: "that the land spue not you out also, when ye defile it, as it spued out the nations that were before you." As the land did not spue out the nations that occupied it during the lifetime of Moses, it has been inferred that the passage under notice must have been written after his death. Reference to the context enables us to dispose of the objection. The chapter in which it is found treats of unlawful marriages and lusts, and concludes with this exhortation: "Defile not ye yourselves in any of these things; for in all these the nations are defiled, which I cast out before you; and the land is defiled; therefore I do visit the iniquity thereof upon it, and the land itself vomiteth out her inhabitants. Ye shall therefore keep my statutes and my judgments, and shall not commit any of these abominations, neither any of your own nation, nor any stranger that sojourneth among you. (For all these abominations have the men of the land done, which were before you, and the land is defiled.) That the land spue not you out also, when ye defile it, as it spued out the nations that were before you." (Ch. xviii. 24—28). The words rendered, "vomith" and "spued out," are in the same tense in the Hebrew, which, according to circumstances, may denote time past, present and future; we learn from verse 24 that "I cast out" is either a present or a future, and we may render "which I am casting out," or "which I will cast out"; the latter is the rendering of the Septuagint (ἐξουστρέψω), of the Vulgate (exiciam), and of Luther (will austrosen); this shows that the verbs used in verse 28 indicate the same time, and announce the Divine purpose in course of fulfilment. But even rendering the verbs in the perfect tense does not violate the meaning, for we may regard the Divine purpose as already accomplished.

The twenty-sixth chapter of this book also has been branded as an interpolation of a much later date, because the author says that the land shall enjoy her Sabbaths while the people are scattered among the heathen; this, it is argued, Moses could not have foreseen, and therefore the entire section, vv. 3—45, is assigned to a later writer. Moses was not only a legislator, but an inspired prophet; he knew human nature and the temper of his own people too well not to foresee that contact with the surrounding nations would involve them in their degradation, and that their disobedience would draw upon them the punishment of their covenant God; the visitations enumerated in vv. 18—43 are not history, but contingent predictions. These simple considerations dispose of the objection.

The contents of this book, its style, language, and subject-matter, are throughout consistent with the claim of its Mosaic origin, put forth on almost every page in the formulas which introduce and conclude the several enactments, and keep the agency of the legislator constantly before our eyes. The external evidence of the existence of this code is also very pronounced; "the Book of the Law of Moses" is mentioned in Josh. xxii. 6; viii. 31—35; Lev. xxvi. 16, 17 are alluded to in Judges ii. 15, and iii. 4 reference is made to "the commandments of the Lord, which he commanded their fathers by the hand of Moses." That book speaks of "the sacred character of the Levites, their dispersion among the several tribes, the settlement of the high priesthood in the family of Aaron, the existence of the ark of the covenant, the power of inquiring of God and obtaining answers, the irrevocability of a vow, the distinguishing mark of circumcision, the distinction between clean and unclean meats, the law of the Nazarites, the use of burnt offerings and peace offerings, the employment of trumpets as a means of obtaining Divine aid in war, the impety of setting up a king," and affords indubitable evidence "that the Mosaic ceremonial law was already in force."* Eli, the high-priest of the house of Aaron, the lamp in the Tabernacle, the Ark of the Covenant, the altar, the incense, the ephod, are named in I. Sam. iv. 3, 4, 18, 21, 22; v. 3, 4, 6, 7; vi. 19; ii. 28; mention is made of the burnt-offering, ch. x. 8; xiii. 9; xv. 22; the peace offerings, ch. x. 8; xi. 15; xiii. 9; the bloody sacrifice, ch. ii. 19; the unbloody offering, ch. ii. 19; iii. 14; xxvi. 19; of the victims: the bullock ch. xxiv. 25, the lamb ch. xvi. 2, and the ram ch. xv. 22. The Books of Kings and Chronicles contain numerous references and allusions to the "Law of Moses," e. g., I. Kings ii. 3; viii. 9, 53; II. Kings vii. 3, xi. 12; xxii. 8; xxiii. 3, 25; I. Chron. xvi. 40; xxii. 12, 13; II. Chron. xxv. 4; xxxiii. 8; xxxiv. 14. The same applies to Ezra and Nehemiah, e. g., Ez. iii. 2—6; vi. 18; vii. 6; Neh. i. 7—9; vii. 1—18; ix. 14; to Daniel, ch. ix. 11—13; Amos, ch. ii. 7; to Hosea, iv. 10, cf. Lev. xxvi. 26; to Joel and Ezekiel, e. g., Joel i. 18, 14, 16; ii. 1, 14—27; Ezek. xxxiv, 33—31. In the New Testament the references are too numerous to be mentioned here. The evidence in favor of the existence of this book as the work of Moses is too strong to be set aside by cavil or assertion.

We come now to a brief and classified statement of the several laws.

1. Laws on Sacrifice, ch. i—vii.

Without opening the question of the origin of sacrifice, it is sufficient for the purpose in hand to accentuate the fact that all the sacrifices mentioned in this code relate to the covenant entered into by God with the chosen people, and to the disposition of the worshipper. (See this illustrated in Ps. xl. 6; 1. 8—15; Prov. xxi. 3; Is. i. 11—15; Jer. vii. 21—23; Hos. vi. 6; Mic. vi. 7, 8; I. Sam. xv. 22; Matt. v. 23, 24.)

Sacrifices were bloody and unbloody. The bloody sacrifices were: 1. The burnt offering. 2. The peace offering. 3. The sin offering. 4. The trespass offering. The unbloody sacrifices were: The meat and drink offerings.

1. The burnt offering, called olah, that which ascends, ishah, that which is burnt, and kolel, that which is whole; the Septuagint renders it generally θυσιαστα, and θυσιαστωσ, the Vulgate holocaustum. The term denotes a sacrifice in which the entire victim was offered and consumed with fire. The victims were required to be perfect, without spot or blemish, males, and might be oxen, rams, he-goats, turtles-doves, and young pigeons. This offering was the sacrifice designed to propitiate God, and expressive of the entire consecration of the worshipper, by the imperfect means of the consumption of an innocent victim, and doubtless not without reference to a general atonement. Burnt offerings might be offered alone, while most of the other offerings had a burnt offering as a complement; they were prescribed for the daily service, for the Sabbath, for the three principal feasts, and for the new moons as standing, independent sacrifices; and as complementary in the offerings at the purification of women, lepers, etc., at consecrations; it was also customary to offer them as private free-will offerings on all occasions of joy or sorrow, and their general character allowed their presentation even by Gentiles, e. g., the Emperor Augustus had ordered a daily burnt offering of two lambs and a bullock.*

2. The peace offering called shalem, peace, under peculiar circumstances also called tsedah, thanksgiving, rendered in the Septuagint generally επιπροση, also επιπροση, θυσια ερισπια, and in the Vulgate, victima pacifica, and pacificum. The most interesting characteristic of the peace offering was the feast upon the sacrifice in which God, by means of the part consumed on the altar and the part eaten by the priests, and the worshippers, who consumed the remaining portions, engaged, as it were, in a common feast of gladness, which from its memorial character and the festal gratitude of the participants, may be regarded as a symbol of the Holy Communion.

3. The sin offering, called chattath, sin, or punishment for sin, variously and vaguely rendered by the LXX., but concisely in the Vulgate, by sacrificia pro peccatis. The central idea is expiation, not only of conscious guilt, but also of sin contracted through inadvertence and error. The institution of the scape-goat was a striking illustration of sins remitted. Sin offerings were prescribed for the entire congregation on the new moons, at the three great festivals, and on the Day of Atonement, for the priests and Levites at the time of their consecration, for the high-priest on the Day of Atonement, and in a number of special cases.

4. The trespass offering, called shshim, a forfeit, rendered in the Vulgate sacrificia pro delictis, was a kind of sin offering, though less aggravated, and always accompanied by a pecuniary fine equal to the value of the injury done, with the addition of one-fifth.

5. The meat offering, called minchah, a gift, rendered in the Septuagint δωρον, ερισπια, and in the Vulgate ferturn, consisted of flour and frankincense, of cakes and wafers, and of parched grain with frankincense, invariably accompanied by salt and oil; leaven and honey were forbidden; they were generally complementary and eucharistic. The drink offering of wine was closely connected with the meat offering, but could not be offered separately; a meat offering was the concomitant of the daily burnt offering. The meat offering of first fruits, prescribed for the Passover and Pentecost, were known as wave offerings, those offered at harvest time as heave offerings.

II. Laws on the Priesthood, ch. viii.-x. The legislation on this subject is found in Ex. xviii., xxix., xl.; the narrative of the consecration of the priests, of the sanctuary, and of the altar, of the sacrifices connected with the imposing ceremonial, of the first acts of the consecrated priests, and of the death of Nadab and Abihu fills this historical section of the book.

The communication of tithes, vv. 30-33. Statement that this chapter forms part of the Sinaitic code, v. 34 (cf. cxvi. 46).

The vast range of the topics treated of in this book, as well as their interest and importance, make it desirable to supplement the bare outline of the contents by a selection of literature. For all practical purposes the "Speaker's Commentary" and Smith's "Dictionary of the Bible" will be sufficient, while "The Pulpit Commentary" abounds in valuable suggestions, and contains two thoughtful essays on "Sacrifice." Besides the older commentaries and treatises, I call special attention to the more recent works of Kurz, "Der Alttestamentliche Opfercultus," Mittau, 1864; Kuepfer, "Das Priesterthum des Alten Bundes," 1865; Ebers, "Egypten und die Bücher Moses," Leipzig, 1868; Jukes, "Law of Offerings;" Marriot, "On Terms of Gift and Offering;" Eidersheim, "The Temple Service;" Willis, "The Worship of the Old Covenant."

J. I. MOMBERT.

THE CHURCH IN CANADA.

FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT.

Nearly all our diocesan synods have met and dissolved, and the feverish activity of the last three or four weeks is beginning to be succeeded by the inevitable lull. First in chronological order came the session of the Niagara Synod held in Hamilton during the first week in June. Proceedings commenced with a service in the cathedral, at which a processional and recessional was sung, and the bishop's crozier carried by his chaplain. The bishop's charge was lengthy and interesting, and very appropriate to the occasion. His lordship has already accomplished a large amount of work, and has ordained three deacons and a priest besides visiting a number of parishes. The business transacted was not of general interest. The Episcopal Fund is getting leisurely on toward completion, and the general condition of affairs seems healthy. Bishop Hamilton is being well received by all shades of Churchmen.

The Synod of Toronto sat during the following week. There was a large attendance of delegates. Bishop Sweatman's charge was unusually interesting and important, but in some respects, I am sorry to say, the reverse of reassuring. For the first time in six years a deficit in the Mission Fund is reported, and the number of offices show a decrease as compared with the preceding year. On the other hand, the number of communicants has increased, as has the total sum raised for general Church purposes. The Diocesan Temperance Society is flourishing. The sudden departure of the late missionary agent has had something to do with the present demoralized condition of the Mission Fund. The bishop announced that work would be commenced forthwith upon the see house and Cathedral of St. Alban the Martyr. The synod sat for four days, and disposed of a large amount of business. Toward the end of the proceedings a delegation was received from the Methodist Conference then in session. A canon authorizing the appointment of missionaries for a limited term of years, and embodying in a modified form the Methodist "permutation" system was adopted.

The Synod of Huron met in the chapter house of the Holy Trinity, London, Ontario, on the 16th. There was a very large attendance of delegates. The bishop's charge was eloquent and forcible. A new canon, by which salaries are graded according to length of service, was passed. The Mission Fund shows a further decrease of about $1,000, mainly caused by the negligence of clergymen in omitting to take up diocesan collections, no less than 539 such collections having been omitted last year. Stringent measures to remedy this are to be adopted forthwith.

The Synod of Ontario met in Kingston, Ontario, on the 9th. The opening sermon was preached by the Rev. J. W. Forsythe. The Committee on the Division of the Diocese recommended that two-thirds of the present Episcopal Fund remain with the present diocese, and one-third go with the new Diocese of Ottawa, that the old and new diocese be both requested to raise the sum of $20,000, which would bring the Episcopal Fund of Ontario up to $60,000, and that of Ottawa to $40,000. The proposed diocese will comprise the seven easterly counties of the Province of Ontario, with a Church population of 42,983. A motion embodying the right of the laity to have some voice in the appointment of their clergy was voted down.

The twenty-sixth annual synod of the Diocese of Montreal was held in Montreal on the 16th ult. The sermon was preached by the Rev. W. H. Naylor of Clarendon.

The Bishop of Fond Du Lac has recently opened the newly established Home of the Sisters of St. Margaret. This was done with the full consent of Bishop Bond. Dr. Brown held a very largely attended reception in the Synod Hall during synod week.

The Bishop of Rupert's Land recently held an ordination in Winnipeg, when five deacons were ordained to the priesthood, all, with one exception, being graduates of St. John's College, Winnipeg.

The Bishops of Niagara and Toronto very warmly commended the newly founded "Society of the Treasury of God" in their charges.

ENGLAND.

THE LATE BISHOP OF SALISBURY.—The late Bishop George Moberly, who died on Monday, July 6th, was the son of Mr. Edward Moberly, a merchant of St. Petersburg, and was born in 1803. He was graduated at Balliol College, Oxford, in 1825, with first honors. In 1828 he was made Fellow of Balliol, and in 1835 became Head-master of Winchester School, a post which he held until 1866, when he became rector of Brixton, Isle of Wight. He was consecrated as Bishop of Salisbury in succession to the late Bishop Hamilton. Bishop Moberly was a scholar of high attainments and a writer of great power. Among his published works are some that have attained much popularity. His works on "The Sayings of the Great Forty Days," "The Administration of the Holy Spirit in the Body of Christ," and his "Sermons on the Beatitudes" may especially be mentioned.

THE HOME REUNION SOCIETY.—At the annual meeting of the Home Reunion Society, held on Friday, June 19th, the report presented was as encouraging as any report on the subject of reunion among Christians at this time could well be. Speeches were made by the Bishop of Winchester, who presided, the Bishop of Pretoria, and the Rev. Dr. C. R. Hale of Baltimore, Md. Dr. Hale said that when he was in Palestine some time ago he met the Metropolitan of Nazareth, who said he believed the time was coming, and coming quickly, when they would see the reunion of Christians. Their differences were more apparent than real, and that was especially so with the Coptic Church. And that as to reunion among Christians in America he knew of a most important incident in which a young Presbyterian minister applied to the Bishop of Fond du Lac for orders, and whose congregation were impatiently waiting to follow him into the Episcopal Church. The Presbyterian authorities, when they heard of this event, sent another minister to the congregation, but they would not have him.

THE CHURCH DEFENCE INSTITUTION.—At the annual meeting of this society, on Friday, June 19th, a report was presented taking earnest ground against the disestablishment of the Church of Scotland, as a new attempt against the Church of England. It represents the Scottish Church Disestablishment Bill as proving the increasing bitterness of the attack. Each provision that appeared in the Irish measure bearing in any way on the continuity of the Church, or facilitating its prolonged organization, had been omitted, and the complete disintegration of the Scottish Church, so far as legislation can effect it, is attempted by this bill. The report also took strong ground against the bill for providing for compulsory acquisition of any selected piece of land to erect a place of worship on, against the Burial Grounds Bill, and against the Intermediate Education Bill for Wales.

The Bishop of Durham made a very strong speech, deprecating the attempts of the so-called liberationists to overthrow the Church of England. Among other things, he said: "When you strike off a man's fetters, when you open his prison door, when you disencumber him from the debts which cling to him, you may indeed speak of liberating him; but when you strip him of his clothes, when you rob him of his purse or his watch, and turn him into the streets as naked as when he came to the world, then I do consider it a little abuse of the term to speak of liberating him. . . . In these remarks I have viewed the Church of England mainly as an establishment, it is not because I have forgotten her higher aspects as a Divine institution. God forbid that I should counsel her to seek her strength in her establishment! It is because the Church of England, more than any other body in this kingdom, represents the true Church of Christ, because she approaches more nearly than any other to apostolic order and apostolic doctrine, because more than in any other I seem to see in her continuous history the hand of God guiding her course and the working of His Spirit manifested abundantly—it is on these grounds that I venture to predict for her, whether established or disestablished, if she be only true to herself, a magnificent career in the future. But for that very reason I feel bound to draw the utmost that in me lies to avert measures which would in any way fetter or hamper, would impede or delay the high destiny which I conceive awaits her."

Speeches were also made by the Earl of Dartmouth, the Dean of Windsor, and the Rev. Dr. Phin of the Established Church of Scotland, and resolutions were adopted against disestablishment in Wales, and expressing sympathy with the Scotch establishment in the attack made upon it.

The meeting was a very successful one, and the "liberationists" are said to be somewhat alarmed at its effects.

FRANCE.

THE AUTHORITIES AND THE CHURCH.—The Paris correspondent of the London Guardian having written pretty severely with regard to the studied and continuous insults to the Church and religion given by the French authorities, Mr. Joseph Foxley writes to that paper complaining of the Paris correspondent's treatment of the subject, and saying that what the French authorities insult is not religion, but "the follies of Vaticanism."

The Guardian correspondent has rejoined, and among other things in his answer says: "Let us see how this stands. Your correspondent thinks that such insults are directed only against the 'follies of Vaticanism.'"

"To tear down crosses (often under the expostulation of the surrounding population) from churches, hospitals, and schools—is this only to attack the 'follies of Vaticanism'?"

"To turn out Sisters of Charity from hospitals in the teeth of protests from the highest medical authorities; to do this, as is being just now attempted at the Cochin hospital for instance, even where, by the express condition of the founder, the establishment was to be placed under the charge of such sisters—has this anything to do with attacking the 'follies of Vaticanism'?"

"To turn the same sisters and all Christian teachers whatever out of all State schools; to prohibit rigorously from the walls of such schools the exhibition of all texts of Scripture, all religious pictures, every religious emblem of every kind; to exclude, with the same rigor, the clergy of every denomination from the school itself, and often to make the hours of the school such as to render it as difficult as possible for the children to attend elsewhere for the purpose of catechising or for religious instruction; to suppress army and navy, and even hospital chaplains, and to make the access of even the overworked parochial clergy as difficult as possible to the patients, and even the dying, in the latter—is this to attack only the 'follies of Vaticanism'?"

The correspondent in another part of his answer says, that were it not for having to quote names and private conversations, "it would be easy to show how general amongst the ruling party is the mingled feeling between hostility, indifference, and contempt, with which everything which comes under the name of religion is viewed. It is impossible to draw any other conclusion than that the present government of France is irreligious in the broadest sense of the term." "My own conviction is that the country is more adverse to these views [of the authorities] than either its present rulers or other people suppose. . . . All these practices against religion may by no means correspond to the general feeling of the French people."

GERMANY.

AN ALLEGED BIBLICAL DISCOVERY.—The Vienna correspondent of the London Times writes that Professor Karshack has shown him the papyrus which has lately been discovered among the El Fayum manuscripts, and which is alleged to be the fragment of a gospel older than those of St. Matthew and St. Mark. It is a very small fragment, measuring three and one-half centimetres in length, and four and one-third centimetres in width, and contains seven lines having one hundred and five words. Of these ninety-eight can be plainly deciphered, but nine are indistinct. Some lines are mutilated at the beginning and end, and it is supposed that from ninety-one to ninety-eight letters are missing. The writing is in Greek, and Dr. G. Bickell of the University of Innsbruck, who discovered and deciphered the fragment, concludes, from the form of the letters and the abbreviations, that it was written in the third century; but, from the style of the composition, he infers that it dates originally from the first century, and this is the opinion also of Dr. Edward Harnack.

Dr. Harnack argues that the antiquity and genuineness of the fragment is beyond dispute, and says also "that it goes far toward suggesting a doubt as to whether the gospels ascribed to Matthew and Mark were, in the form in which we know them now, composed by those disciples."

CANADA.

DIocese of Fredericton.—Meeting of Synod and Diocesan Church Society.—The General Committee of the Diocesan Church Society, consisting of the clergy and two lay delegates from each parish or mission, met in the Church Hall, Fredericton, on Tuesday morning, June 30th. The metropolitan presided. There was a full attendance, both of the clergy and lay delegates. Much time was taken up with reading the reports of the missionaries. In most instances they were of deep interest, exhibiting a great and increasing work in all sections of the diocese. All the older missions but one are now occupied. The report with reference to the contributions for the current year was, on the whole, satisfactory. There is a considerable increase, compared with last year.

Since the report was presented information has been received of a donation of $3,000 for the objects of the society. The value of this generous offering is enhanced by the request of the donor that it should only be known as coming from "a lady in New Brunswick."

Only a few weeks ago an unexpected reduction, to a large amount, in the grant made by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel to this diocese was announced. The yearly income of the parent society has largely fallen off, at least for general purposes. This large diminution was at first regarded with much alarm and anxiety. It will be met, however, by a small increase in the local requirements from the several missions, and by additional contributions to the central fund. Before many years the Diocese of Fredericton, with deep gratitude for large and long-continued aid from our brethren in England, will be ready to unite with them in the work of missions in foreign lands, and receive no further portion of what is needed so much more elsewhere.

The statement of the treasurer, showing a considerable balance in favor of the society, and the report of the auditor on the accounts, were very satisfactory. Besides other funded trusts for special objects, the society, mostly from bequests, has now a fund amounting to about $116,000, the interest of which may be applied for all time in aid of the missionary work of the diocese.

The Widows' and Orphan's Fund amounts to nearly $18,000, and a pension of $200 a year is thereby secured to the widows of the clergy. At present there are four recipients. Pensions are also granted to two retired clergymen. The special fund for the latter object is steadily increasing, and is attracting deserved attention.

Appropriations for the missionary service for the current year were made in the case of forty-three missions. The several grants are payable only on condition that the required amount from the mission is paid quarterly to the treasurer. New and most pressing work is also laid out in the case of no less than six new missions, which are to be filled as soon as the state of the society's funds will permit. Within a few years no less than eight parishes, formerly aided by the society, have not only become self-supporting, but they contribute largely to the general fund at the present time.

A grand work is being done through the book depositories. The sale of books at St. John from the publications of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge have amounted to about $1,000 during the year. There is also a depository at Fredericton. The works of the society referred to are sold at cost prices.

From the statistical returns, made up for the past year, there is found a marked increase in the number of communicants added, in the number of baptisms, and also in teachers and scholars in Sunday-schools.

The Festival of St. Barnabas was the fortieth anniversary of the installation of the Bishop of Fredericton in his cathedral; an address was presented by the clergy expressive of their deep regard and affection. It is now proposed to show this feeling in a more substantial way, by founding what is to be called "The Bishop Medley Divinity Scholarship Fund." It is known that this will be more acceptable than any testimonial of a personal character.

On Thursday evening, after the chief business of the society was finished, there was a delightful choral service at the cathedral, and subsequently, at 8 P.M., there was a crowded attendance at what is called the Anniversary Meeting, at the Church Hall. The secretary presented an abstract of the annual report, and addresses of deep interest were made by the metropolitan, the bishop-coadjutor, the rector of St. Mark's in the city of St. John, and two prominent lay members of the society.

The Diocesan Synod is composed, to a great extent, of those who form the general committee of the Diocesan Church Society. With few exceptions, the clergy and lay delegates were in attendance at the cathedral on Wednesday morning at 8 o'clock, when there was a celebration of the Holy Communion. The synod met at the Church Hall on Wednesday, at 10 A.M.

The Rev. Canon Churton of St. Alban's, England, and the Rev. E. S. W. Pentreath of Winnipeg, Manitoba, were warmly welcomed to seats on the platform. The roll was called and the usual committees were appointed. A very interesting report was presented from the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Board, from which it appears that during the year contributions for domestic missions (including Algoma and the North-west) amount to $1,120; to foreign missions, for the most part through the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, to $1,450. It seemed desirable to the Synod to have the day of intercession for missions changed to the time agreed upon or suggested by the Church in England and the United States.

A report was also presented from the Committee on Sunday-schools, strongly recommending more efficiency in the system and associations for advancement and improvement in Sunday-school work.

The Metropolitan communicated a letter lately received from the Archbishop of Canterbury with reference to the notice which is hereafter to be sent to the different metropolitans and to the Presiding Bishop in the United States, of the consecration of any bishop in the Anglican Communion. This letter, together with the record of the late consecration of the Bishop of Niagara at the Cathedral in Fredericton, are to be printed in the Journal of the Synod.

A committee of the Synod, engaged during the year in the codification and proposed amendment of the constitution and canons, presented their report. This, taken up by sections, occupied much time and attentive consideration. That portion embracing the declaration and constitution was passed by a majority of both orders, and stands for confirmation at the next annual meeting, when the further consideration of the canons will be proceeded with.

At the meeting on Wednesday there was a long discussion with reference to the proposed affiliation of King's College, Windsor, with that of Dalhousie, Halifax. King's College is a Church institution, and it is felt by many very desirable to form a connection with the college in Halifax, to have more efficiency in the Arts Course for the divinity students. The Synod finally determined to come to no decision on the subject, from want of fuller information as to the proposal.

On Friday morning, after the transaction of business, chiefly of local interest, the proceedings were brought to a close.

AID FOR THE BISHOP OF QU'APPELLE.—On Wednesday, June 24th, the first anniversary of the consecration of Bishop Anson, at a special service held in the northwest chapel of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, England, an offering of $7,500 was anonymously made to help forward the scheme of St. John's Collegiate Farm, which the bishop is now initiating.

MASSACHUSETTS.

BOSTON.—The Leemans Testimonial.—The committee of the university and museum of Leyden has invited the Rev. William C. Winslow of this city to contribute to the superb quarto in press, to be presented on December 3d, to Dr. Conrad Leemans, who will then have completed his fiftieth year as director of the museum of antiquities at Leyden. Dr. Leemans's fame and publications as an archaeologist and Egyptologist, coupled with his long and distinguished serving at the museum, make the testimonial peculiarly fitting.

CONNECTICUT.

WATERBURY.—Church Temperance Society.—Mr. Robert Graham, secretary of the Church Temperance Society, visited Waterbury on Friday, July 3d, and remained three days. He addressed the employees of the Scovill Manufacturing Works on Friday, and in the evening spoke at Trinity church. On Sunday morning, July 5th, he spoke at St. John's church. He was listened to with great interest, and it is hoped that his visit will result in the establishment of a permanent branch of the society in this city.

The principles of the Church Temperance Society were so warmly appreciated by the Rev. Dr. Andrews, (Congregational) that Mr. Graham was asked to address his congregation, which he did on Saturday, July 4th.

NEW YORK.

NEW YORK.—All Souls' Church.—This church (the Rev. R. Heber Newton, rector,) has recently opened a summer home for children connected with the Kindergarten, infant school, Sunday-school, etc. The home is situated on Hempstead Harbor, a body of water opening out from Long Island Sound on the east, and extending southward about five miles. It is about twenty-five miles distant from New York, and is reached by a delightful sail, which of itself cannot be other than greatly beneficial to the children.

The cottages of "The Bureau of Works and Charities of All Souls' Church," as they are called, are situated not far from Glenwood. They were built in 1884, but too late in the season for occupancy. They consist of a cottage for the matron, Mrs. Waddell, and five separate cottages for the children to sleep in. They are in whole or in part memorial structures, having been built by Mr. Stones, Mr. Wise, Mrs. Herter, Mr. Low, and Mrs. Duggins. A sixth cottage is also proposed to be built by Mr. Leyscrafts.

The matron's cottage is a two-story frame building, with large dining-room on the ground floor, in which all the children take their meals. On the story above rooms are for the matron and one or two others, as also a room for a guest or visitor who may need special entertaining. A wide piazza, forty or fifty feet in length, extends through the south side of the building, as also across a part of the ends. In the rear is a kitchen and an abundantly-supplied ice-house. The building is wholly without plaster or paint, and is all the better for being so. It is all that could be desired in the way of roominess, comfort, and convenience, while not a dollar has been wasted on show or superfluity of any kind. The piazza at the east end looks down into a beautiful ravine, in which children might be seen swinging among the tall chestnut trees.

Of the five cottages in which the children sleep, four are built in a kind of circle, having a play ground in the centre. The cottages are simple two-story frame structures, each having a piazza. The rooms above and below are supplied with cots to accommodate twelve children, each of the children sleeping alone, though two or three in the same room. One of the cottages has thirteen cots, and is designed as a kind of hospital for any of the children who may be unwell. In addition to these buildings there is also a laundry, though it is intended that the children shall bring sufficient clothing for their two weeks' sojourn, without extra washing. Just below the bluff a plank walk over three hundred feet in length has been built across the creek, and this will be followed by twelve or fifteen bathing-houses, which were to be completed in a week or two. By means of this arrangement the children can reach the water in a minute or two, and have the additional enjoyment of bathing and playing on the beach.

The first instalment of children to have the benefit of this delightful summer home were children taken from the Kindergarten. They were fifty-two in number, and were accompanied by their teacher. The second instalment, fifty-seven in all, took possession as the others departed, about the first week in July. They were accompanied by their teacher, whose class, indeed, numbers over two hundred, those of the children being taken to the home whose needs most require it. The children were found either playing in the woods, which, save openings to give glimpses of the water, surround the home on all sides, or were amusing themselves on the sloping playground, flanked with locust trees, chestnut trees, etc. The children, white and colored, were playing together, as if all of one race, as they also eat at the same tables and sleep in the same cottages. This, indeed, is a part of their training and discipline in the Sunday-school, all distinctions of race and color being left out of the account. The children of the infant school, after a stay of two weeks, were to be followed by the children of the Sunday-school.

That the children who have the privilege of this two weeks' sojourn receive the greatest possible enjoyment and benefit cannot be doubted for a moment. In addition to the freedom of the woods, and what was soon to be the enjoyment of bathing, they have an abundance of food, and that as good as children of any sort could require. The supply of the very best of milk gives to each of the children nearly a quart a day. They breakfast at 7 a.m., dine at 12, and have supper at 5.30. In the early evening they are all in bed, thus having all that air and exercise, abundance of food and sleep can do for them. As a matter of fact, the improvement in some of the children is so great as to be a matter of surprise to their parents.

The rules by which the home is governed are of a simple character, such as rising at the ringing of the bell, dismissal in case of disobedience to the matron, etc. According to one of the rules, no intoxicating liquors are allowed on the premises without written order of a physician. The chairman of the committee having this admirable work in charge is the Rev. John W. Kramer, M.D., assistant-minister to Mr. Newton.

NEW YORK—St. John's Guild.—This guild, having its headquarters on University Place, near Eighth street, sent out the Floating Hospital on Tuesday, July 8th, on its first excursion for the season. There were over two hundred and fifty children on board and over a hundred mothers. The Hospital started at the foot of King street, and taking in also many excursionists at Fifth street, on the East River, passed down through the Lower Bay, not, however, being able to land at the Nursery, on account of the fog. All on board were served to a dinner, while the children were abundantly supplied with milk. The cost of each trip is about $250, and in case the money is provided the Hospital will make two trips a week during the summer. To this good work those interested in the welfare of sick or enfeebled children are asked to contribute.

NEW YORK—St. Mary's Free Hospital for Children.—This institution, at 407 West Thirty-fourth street, has recently opened its new Home at Rockaway Beach, and now has forty of its sick and otherwise helpless children enjoying all the delights that a seaside home can give. Already some of the children, whose lives in the city seemed little more than a bare existence, have improved wonderfully. But the expense of living, as at all seaside resorts, is considerable, and there was only money enough in hand the first week in June to carry the family through a month. There are children in the Hospital who have recently undergone severe surgical operations, and whom it is hoped to move to the seaside as soon as they can bear the journey. Those in charge of the institution are compelled to look to their friends for the means of their transportation and support.

As the Home was recently put in thorough repair, and with money sent on her wedding-day by the one who gave the Home in the first place, nothing more is asked for than means to meet the daily needs. Any offerings should be sent to the Hospital, 407 West Thirty-fourth street, as above.

NEW YORK—Bequests to Various Objects.—By the will of Susan Maria Elson, which was admitted to probate on Friday, July 10th, the following bequests were made "in special and thankful acknowledgment of manifold blessings and mercies, and to mark my interest in the Church of God and its work": The Assistant-bishop of the diocese, $3,000; the Rev. George Francis Nelson, $2,000; the General Theological Seminary, $5,000; the same of Church music instruction, $5,000; Society for Domestic and Foreign Missions, $5,000; New York Bibles and Common Prayer Book Society, $1,000; Missionary Society for Seamen $1,000; St. Luke's Hospital, $1,000; Trustees of Fund for the support of the Bishop, $1,000; Protestant Episcopal Diocesan Missions, $1,000; City Mission Society, $1,000; Orphans' Home and Asylum, $500; Home of Rest for Consumptives, $500; Home for Incurables, $500; the Rev. W. B. Elson, the Rev. William Paré—presumably the Bishop of Maryland—and the Rt. Rev. Henry A. Neely, $250 each; Professor W. H. Barris and the Rev. Thomas O. Tongue, $50 each.

NEW YORK—Aid to Domestic Missions.—The Secretary of the Domestic Missionary Committee, in response to an editorial in the Spirit of Missions, entitled "Shall Domestic Missions be Contracted?" has received, besides several gifts not so large in amount, a gift of $5,000 from one layman, "to help avert in some small degree the threatened curtailment of the domestic missionary work of the Episcopal Church." The secretary hopes that the publication of this fact will induce others to give, if not as much, at least according to their means for the same object.

CLIFTON, S. I.—St. John's Church.—This parish (the Rev. Dr. John C. Eccleston, rector), has begun the building of a fine parish hall, to be used for Sunday-school services, chapel purposes, social gatherings and meetings of parochial societies. Its front will be of cut stone, similar to that of which the church is constructed, and it is intended to be connected ultimately by a circular corridor, or covered way, with the rectory and the church, between which is its site. It will have various apartments, but for Lenten or Sunday-school gatherings it will seat four hundred. The cost of it, which is all in hand, will be about $9,000. This sum has been contributed by the parish generally, except that Mrs. Pell of Newport, R. I., formerly a member of St. John's, gave $3,000 in memory of the Rev. Dr. Mercer, the second rector of the parish. This liberal offering started the present undertaking.

With the completion of this important work the parish will be well provided with all necessary equipment for a long time to come. The elegant rectory of stone and brick was built three years ago. A tablet in the north wall preserves the name of a generous benefactor, the late John P. Appleton, Esq., long senior warden. The rectory, within and without, is beautiful in design and execution, enriched by many artistic effects. The church edifice was erected thirteen years ago, at a cost of $120,000. Its windows especially are a study, many of them being memorial windows of the finest imported glass, and wrought by the best artists. The present rector has been for thirty years in charge altogether, this being his second rectorship of this parish.

YONKERS—Legacies for Church Purposes.—The will of the late Mrs. Hannah Jones Dobias was filed for record in the Register's office in New York, on Wednesday, July 8th. The following legacies are contained therein: To St. John's church, Yonkers, $1,000, to be used in reducing the church debt; to St. John's Riverside Hospital, $1,000; to St. Luke's Home, New York, $1,000; to the Home for Old Men and Aged Couples, New York, $1,000; to the Bishop of Minnesota, $500; to the Western Church Building Society, $500; to the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, $500; to the Trustees of the Fund for Aged and Infirm Clergymen of the Diocese of New York, $500; The remainder of her estate is bequeathed to the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America.

LONG ISLAND.

BROOKLYN—St. Luke's Church.—The Sunday-school of this church (the Rev. George R. Van De Water, rector), at its closing session, June 21st, made an offering of $145.50, as a contribution to the fund already started for a new parish hall. This amount was raised in a few weeks by the scholars by means of dime cards. The interest felt in this proposed building is indicated by this zeal of the children to bear some part, though small, in so important an undertaking.

The chapel of St. Luke's parish, which is on Pacific street near Bedford Avenue, has been closed for the remainder of the summer to admit of repairs and alterations which will be made before September. For some time past there has been felt to be a serious lack of accommodation for the choir, the Sunday-school, and the auxiliary of the chapel, and the need of more sittings for the people has been apparent. The result is that an enlargement has been decided upon in accordance with plans prepared by Mr. George P. Chappeil, architect. An extension will be made of the present building in the direction of Atlantic Avenue, to include a choir and sacristy, guild room, and choir room, and an increase of space will be secured in the nave and transepts, providing for one hundred and fifty additional sittings. It is believed that these alterations will meet every demand until the growth of this chapel enterprise admits of its organization as a separate parish with a new and permanent house of worship. The cost of the enlargement and repair now begun is covered by subscriptions in hand and pledges made.

CENTRAL NEW YORK.

CANASTOTA—Trinity Church.—The cornerstone of this church (the Rev. F. P. Winne, in charge,) was laid on Tuesday, July 7th, by the Rev. J. E. Cathell, acting for the bishop of the diocese. Besides these clergymen, there were present and assisting, the Rev. Dr. J. M. Clarke, and the Rev. Messrs. E. W. Mundy, T. E. Pattison, J. A. Staunton, R. Paul, and H. B. Goolyner. There was a large congregation present, despite the fierce heat and the threatened showers.

Many years have passed since Church services were first held in Canastota, but it has seemed impossible for the Church to gain a permanent footing in the place until now, and the present hopeful condition of the mission is due, under God, not less to the fostering personal care of the bishop of the diocese, than to the faithful ministrations of many clergymen, and the courage and patience of the handful of Churchmen residing in the village.

At the close of the service all guests, clerical and lay, were entertained in Beecher Hall, where the ladies of the mission had provided a bounteous collation.

Utica—Grace Church.—A festival of the Church choirs of this city was held in this church (the Rev. T. C. Olmstead, rector), on the evening of Wednesday, July 8th. There were present, besides the rector, the Rev. Messrs. F. P. Winne, G. W. Gates, Charles Gardner, C. C. Edmunds, Bernard Schulte, W. B. Coleman, J. E. Cathell and W. H. Cook. The musical portion of the service was under the direction of Mr. G. F. Le Jenne of New York. The service was choral, and conducted by the rector and the Rev. J. E. Cathell. The music was simple, yet grand and Churchly. The congregation joined heartily in the hymns, and the offertory hymn was sung by the choir and congregation alternately, with the doxology in unison. The music was as follows: Processional, G. F. Le Jenne; Deus Misericors, Goss; Hymn, the Evening Hymn; Address, "Church Music," by the Rev. W. B. Coleman; Anthems, "King of All Glories," Baraby; "Lord, for Thy Tender Mercy's Sake," Farrant (1854); "Jerusalem, that Killst the Prophets," Mendelssohn, sung by Mr. Felix Wendelschaefer, New York; "O Love the Lord," Sullivan; "The Radiant Morn," Canon Woodward; "On These Each Loving Soul Awaits," Haydn; Offertory, "Sun of my Soul;" Recessional, "The Church's One Foundation."

The address given by the Rev. Mr. Coleman was a very sensible discussion of Church music. He made a plea for scientific advancement in Church music as well as in secular matters. Old methods should not be adhered to, just because they are old. An exploded method is unscientific. We discriminate between the faith once delivered to the saints and those human, temporal fashions in the Church which are subject to the changes and improvements of science. Church music ought, of all kinds, to be most scientific, i. e., most suited to its purpose. Whether simple or difficult it should be severe, grave, expressive. It may be sweet and lovely, but not too tempting to the vanity of the singers. Modern scientific harmonies are of a simple, expressive and reverent character. The tunes of the German Lutherans combine solidity with limited compass, are simple and reverent, and our compatriots have drawn largely upon their tunes. The Anglican and German churches have here common ground and requirements. In this respect there is a marked contrast in the popular religious music of this country. Doubtless the hymns of Sankey and Moody have done much service in the cause of religion, but they have done much mischief as well. Being, as a rule, of a lively, emotional nature, with pleasing, pretty harmonies, they have been quickly caught up and used all over the land, not only in religious meetings but on occasions of social entertainments as well. If the music were suited to the words, and the words what they ought to be, religious hymns would not be misused. Christians do not praise as conscientiously and devoutly as they pray. It is singular that many people who have the greatest dread of a religious turn to the conversation have not the slightest hesitation in singing before a social company solemn words addressed to the Deity. Let hymns be carefully chosen, with sentiments that Christian intelligence can approve, set to music expressive of those sentiments, and the spirit of devotion will follow naturally. Such hymns can not be abused, they would never be sung in the streets, nor borne thro' the air by a jovial picnic party returning home by boat or wagon. It is a characteristic of Mason's tunes, in general, whatever merit they may possess, that they utterly fail to interpret the words to which they are attached. The best tunes must be selected both from ancient and modern music. Up to the time of the Ambrosian chant the tunes of our Christian forefathers were rude and inelegant. The Gregorian tones, introduced two and a half centuries later, gave way to chords of still greater advancement. The development of ecclesiastical music has been exceedingly rapid. The Church is not called upon to give musical entertainments at her services—that is to be found at operas and concerts, but her music is to suggest and aid in worship.

The speaker also pointed out fitness in musical expression, and concluded that a choir of male voices, both men and boys, decently robed, was the most proper for leading the praise of the congregation in an orderly, expressive and reverent manner. The kind of Church music herein advocated is best rendered by such a choir, which sets forth the true dignity and importance of praise, and prevents it degenerating into a mere entertainment.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

BUFFALO—Trinity Church.—The services at this church (the Rev. Dr. L. Van Bokkelen, rector), on Sunday, July 5th, were very interesting, being the last held in the present church edifice. At both morning and evening service the congregations were very large, and the church was beautifully decorated with flowers. Morning Prayer was said by the rector, assisted by the Rev. C. P. Lee. An impressive address was delivered by the rector.

In the afternoon there was a large attendance both of clergy and laity. The offerings were devoted to the removal of the memorial tablets to the memorial chapel of the new church building. It was announced that regular services would be held in Christ chapel. The closing sermon was delivered by the bishop of the diocese, who reviewed the history of the parish, spoke of the removal of the church, and paid a warm tribute to the present rector.

At the close of the sermon the bishop proceeded to the formal secularization of the edifice. The bishop and clergy passed down the north aisle and returned up the south aisle, reading responsively Psalm xc. After a prayer, the bishop read the decree of secularization, pronouncing the fabric "secular and unconsecrated, and no longer within our canonical jurisdiction, but given back solely to the protection of the laws of the land, and to no other than such common uses and control as by said laws are recognized and allowed." The bishop said the closing prayer and benediction, and with the Nunc Dimittis the last service in Old Trinity church was closed.

NEW JERSEY.

CATE MAY—St. John's Church.—During the summer the following clergy will officiate at this church: July 19th, the Rev. Dr. W. P. Orrick; July 29th, the Bishop of New Jersey; August 2d, the Rev. Dr. J. H. Darlington; August 9th, the Rev. Arthur Brooks; August 16th, the Rev. Dr. R. F. Alsop; August 23d, the Rev. Dr. S. Corbett; August 30th, the Rev. Dr. B. Watson; September 6th, the Rev. Dr. C. G. Currie; September 13th, the Rev. J. D. Newlin.

CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA.

PARADISE—Sunday school Institute.—The fourth bi-monthly meeting of the Sunday-school Institute of the Harrisburg Convocation was held in all Saints' church, Paradise, (the Rev. J. McA. Harding, rector,) on Thursday, June 25th. There were present of the clergy, besides the assistant-bishop and the rector, the Rev. Messrs. A. C. Powell, H. Sharpe, F. J. Clay-Moran, J. E. Pratt, J. Baker, and J. Graham; and nearly one hundred lay delegates.

After the celebration of the Holy Communion, (during which a special thanksgiving was made by the assistant-bishop, for the merciful escape of the Rev. Dr. C. F. Knight from serious accident at the railroad station on the previous Monday, the institute met for business.

A model lesson was taught by the Rev. John Graham, the subject being "The call of the Publican."

A paper was read on Sunday school marks and prizes by the Rev. L. F. Baker, in which the writer argued strongly against them.

The Rev. A. C. Powell made an address on the best method of imparting distinctive Church teaching in the Sunday-school.

The Rev. F. J. Clay Moran read a paper, by a lady of St. James's church, Lancaster, on the need of uniformity in Sunday-school lessons.

Each paper was followed by a general discussion, that succeeding Mr. Baker's paper, being especially interesting.

The next meeting will be held in Reading, on Thursday, October 20th.

MARYLAND.

BALTIMORE—St. Luke's Church.—Mr. W. H. Whittingham, Choir-master and Director of Music in this parish, has made a full and very interesting report to St. Luke's Guild of the work of the choir during the past season. We give some of the most important portions. As the work of this choir is in a parish that is not, financially, a very strong one, it may give encouragement to many of the poorer congregations who are anxious to adopt choral or cathedral music.

The report covers from October 1st, 1884, to June 1st, 1885. During the summer months the attendance, especially of the men, is always small and uncertain, the music sung is of the simplest description, and the week-day practices reduced to a minimum, or dispensed with altogether. As it is not generally until October 1st that the choir is in condition, with full numbers, to resume active choir work in its integrity, the report is only dated from that time.

In one particular the past season has been especially notable. The experiment was begun, in October, of printing and distributing to the congregation service lists for a successive number of Sundays. These have been issued regularly without interruption, and it is considered by those having the matter in charge that the experiment has been successful. There have been several objects in view in issuing these service papers. The principal one was that all who wished to do so might have a more intelligent participation in the choral worship of the Church, not only by having before them the words of the anthem, but also by being enabled to recognize, through the composers' names, the music of the different "services" or settings of the canticles as they occur in our use. It has also been thought a great gain, being enabled to do away with the many interruptions to divine service in announcements of what was to follow: the words of the anthem, the psalms for the day, the hymns, etc. By obviating the necessity of these irregularities the services have been enabled to proceed with a much greater degree of smoothness, quiet, and dignity. Not only have these service papers been issued gratuitously to all, but any one wishing a number of copies could have them.

During the nine months embraced in the report there has been choral service in the choir of the church seven-fifty times. There have been thirty-five Sundays with two services each. There have also been special extra services on the eve of St. Luke's Day, Thanksgiving Day, Christmas Day, on April 2d, and the eve of Ascension Day. There has been a considerable amount of new music added to the list. Six morning "services" (that is, settings of the Morning Canticles), six evening "services," and four Communion "services" have been in use during the season. Eighteen anthems have been added to the list, and forty-seven anthems sung during the season, of which only two have been sung more than twice.

The average attendance in choir for the entire season has been eight men and seventeen boys. Frequent practising for the men only have been held on Wednesday evenings, and for the boys on Wednesday afternoons and Saturday mornings. Any one who has realized the complex and difficult character of the music produced, will at once recognize that this is a record of industrious, painstaking labor on the part of the choir. In view of the fact that the greater number, indeed nearly all of the gentlemen of the choir are giving their time and services entirely gratuitously, consideration of this point is not out of place.

The report concludes with these forcible words: "It is a very simple matter to go to church and hear an elaborate and impressive service, but how many ever think of the careful and tedious practice and preparation it represents?"

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Church of the Epiphany.—Two hundred and two names have been added to the roll of membership in the men's meetings of this parish; the total being 448; average week's attendance, 60. The mission house is being enlarged in consequence of the large membership and by reason of recent very generous gifts for that purpose, $1,400 of the $3,000 debt on the mission property having been paid; $150 are in hand toward the Fresh Air Fund; $1 provides a trip for five adults or ten children. The present number of communicants in this parish is 1,205; total contributions for year last past, $24,179; pupils in Sunday-school, 1,000; in sewing school, 809; catechisings, 307; Church services, 1,200; sermons or lectures, 290; Holy Communion, 193; communion alms, $1,580; baptisms, 301; confirmed, 77; marriages, 27; burials, 49; clergy, rector and two assistants.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Church of the Ascension.—Though the money for the debt on the church building of this parish, (the Rev. Dr. J. H. Elliott, rector,) is in hand, the holder of the notes refuses to receive payment for one year yet, and cannot be compelled to accept it sooner, hence the completion of the church, as the "Pinkney Memorial" is inevitably postponed until Ascension Day of '86. The communion alms in this parish are $383; all other sums, $29,549; sittings, 1,000; baptisms, 32; burials, 23; Church services, 275; lectures and sermons, 125; Holy Communion, 32; the present role of communicants, 659; married, 8; confirmed, 22; industrial school, 85; Sunday-school, 350; the value of the elegant church, $160,000, on which is insurance of $40,000.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Death of the Rev. J. H. Chew.—The Rev. John Hilary Chew died at his residence, in Washington, July 6th, and was buried at Rock Creek Cemetery on Wednesday, July 8th. Mr. Chew was in his sixty-fourth year, having been born in Prince George's county, Maryland, in 1821. He was the grandson of Bishop Claggett, the first Bishop of Maryland, was graduated at Princeton in 1840, and ordained by Bishop Whittingham in 1843. Mr. Chew was at one time rector of a parish in Prince George's county, and for some seven years was rector of St. Matthew's parish, near Bladensburg, succeeding the late Bishop Pinkney. For about fifteen years he was rector of St. Alban's parish, Georgetown (now West Washington), D. C. For over twelve years Mr. Chew was a member of the Standing Committee, resigning at the last session of the convention on account of his health. On motion of the bishop, a vote of sympathy was unanimously adopted.

At the funeral a large number of clergy attended from Baltimore and other places in Maryland, and a minute of respect was placed on record.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—St. James's Parish.—Besides the addition of a porch and another bay for use as guild and choir room, this parish (the Rev. J. W. Clark as rector,) has raised liberal sums for parochial work; total, $3,639. St. John's seats now 300; 85 communicants at present represent its communicating membership; 93 pupils in Sunday-school; 50 in Industrial school; Prayers and Litany have been said 799 times; 114 sermons delivered; occasions of Holy Communion, 385; 15 were confirmed last year.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Church of the Holy Cross.—In this parish, (the Rev. Dr. J. A. Harrod, rector,) some seventy-five families, composed of some 500 individuals—99 communicants—work heartily along. The chapel seats 300, and the people have generously raised $600 for church work; value of the small brick chapel, seating some 300, is supposed to be $8,000, with a valuable lot adjoining. Services here are numerous, 300 having been performed during the year, with catechising every Lord's Day, and some 100 sermons or other discourses; the Holy Communion, 131 in the year.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—St. Andrew's Church.—This parish (the Rev. J. B. Perry, rector,) has added 42 to its list of communicants, giving now a roll of 333. The rector and his assistant have conducted prayers over 200 times, and preached or lectured some 150 times, celebrating, in the twelve months just passed, the Holy Communion 34 times. The church is valued at $28,000; all sums gathered for church work in the parish since last report, $5,460; a Sunday-school of some 250; capacity of building since enlargement, 640; 700 persons comprise the parish.

WEST WASHINGTON, D. C.—Christ Church.—This parish (the Rev. A. R. Stuart, rector,) has raised $6,585 during the year, its membership being 125 families, 600 persons, communicants, 368; Sunday-school pupils, 160; the church property is valued at $41,000. For foreign missions it has sent off $185; for mission's committee, $200; the church seats 890. There is a talk of its place being applied by a new and more commodious one.

EASTON.

CAMBRIDGE—Christ Church.—The Rev. Dr. T. P. Barber observed the thirty-seventh anniversary of his rectorship of this (Great Choptauk) parish on Sunday, July 5th, by delivering a discourse suitable to the occasion. During his rectorship he has built up the Cambridge congregation into an active and vigorous body. He has established two mission churches in the parish—one, St. John's, in the Neck District, and another, St. James's, at Maple Dam Bridge, in Blackwater—both of which, under his zealous care, are now in a flourishing condition.

SPRINGFIELD.

BUNKER HILL—Christ Church.—On the first Sunday in November, 1884, the present rector (the Rev. Philip McKim) took charge of the two parishes of Christ church, Bunker Hill, and St. John's, Gillespie, they having been without a rector for more than a year. The church at Bunker Hill being then in a most deplorable condition, having been struck by a cyclone two months before, which shook off the plaster, moving the building on its foundation, badly damaging our handsome windows—in a word, almost ruining the whole edifice, thus making it little less than martyrdom to worship there during the winter, inasmuch as daylight penetrated the walls in every direction. Still the congregation assembled, Sunday after Sunday, to shiver with the cold and nite in the Church service. But by the kindness of brethren outside the parish they have been enabled to restore the building in some degree, so that at least they can now worship there comfortably. But they must raise not less than $1,500, so as to strengthen and secure the edifice from further and niter damage.

During the seven months referred to above the bishop has visited those two parishes twice, and thirty-one persons have been presented for confirmation, varying in age from seventy-one to nine years, one of whom had been a preacher in the Methodist body, another an educated and refined member of the Roman Catholic Church, who had three children baptized in that Church, two of whom are now candidates for confirmation. The bishop proposes to visit the parish again in the autumn.

WISCONSIN.

DELAWARE—Deaf-Mute Reunion.—The Rev. Messrs. A. W. Mann and John Chamberlain of New York attended a reunion of the deaf-mutes of Wisconsin, held from June 20th to 25th. Services were held at Christ church (the Rev. Charles Holmes, rector.) At the last service the Rev. Mr. Mann baptized two adult deaf-mutes and a child of deaf-mute parents.

MINNESOTA.

FARIBAULT—Deaf-Mute School.—The State school for the deaf is located in this beautiful village. The graduates have just held their first reunion, with a large attendance. The Rev. A. W. Mann was present by invitation, and conducted a service, besides opening and closing the sessions.

MINNEAPOLIS—Deaf-Mute Services.—Combined services in the interest of Church work among the deaf-mutes were held on Sunday, June 29th, at Gethsemane and St. Mark's churches, the Rev. Mr. Mann being assisted by the rectors (the Rev. Messrs. A. E. Graves and T. B. Wells). Besides these services, Mr. Mann conducted a service for deaf-mutes only at Gethsemane church in the afternoon.

IOWA.

OSKAJOLLA—Convocation.—The convocation of the Central Diocese was held in St. James's church, Okaloosa, (the Rev. Allen Judd, rector,) on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, June 23d, 24th, and 25th. There were present the Rev. J. E. Ryan (dean), the Rev. Dr. T. B. Kemp, and the Rev. Messrs. F. E. Judd, W. H. Van Antwerp, W. P. Law, P. C. Wolcott, and the rector of the parish. The convocation sermon was preached on Tuesday evening by the Rev. Dr. T. B. Kemp. There was a celebration of the Holy Communion on Wednesday, and a missionary meeting was held on Thursday evening, at which all the clergy present made addresses. At the meeting on Wednesday afternoon the subject of "Church Missions to the Jews" was discussed, and the importance of supporting the diocesan schools was set forth by the Rev. P. C. Wolcott.

The next meeting of the convocation will be at Marshalltown, in September, when a joint meeting of the Northern and Central Dioceses will be held.

MISSOURI.

St. Louis—St. Peter's Church.—On the evening of Tuesday, June 23d, the altar cross presented to this church (the Rev. W. Herbert Ambeton, rector,) by the Princess of Wales, a notice of which appeared in our issue of July 4th, was formally received with appropriate ceremonies. The church was crowded long before the hour of service. There were present the bishop of the diocese, the rector of the parish, the Rev. Messrs. J. N. Chesnut, S. H. Greene, P. G. Robert, C. M. C. Mason, G. C. Tecker, and others. Representatives of the girl's guild of St. Peter's parish bore the cross into the church and placed it on the retable. As they did so the rector addressed them, and bestowed on the guild the name of the Alexandra Guild.

The address of presentation was then made by the rector.

The service was choral, conducted by the Rev. Messrs. P. G. Robert and S. H. Greene. The Bishop of the diocese made an address, in which he referred very happily to the unity which exists between the Church of England and the American Church, specially emphasized by this gracious gift of her royal highness, whose praise, he said, was on everyone's lips. He also spoke of Victoria's noble example of family life, which one could well see would be perpetuated in England's future queen.

After the address the senior warden accepted the gift in the name of the congregation, and expressed their thanks to the princess. Resolutions expressive of the congregation's high appreciation of the gift will be officially adopted, engrossed, and forwarded to her royal highness.

In concluding the service the prayer for the royal family was said.

WYOMING.

THE NECESSITY FOR CHURCH EXTENSION.—At the annual convocation of this missionary jurisdiction, held in Cheyenne, May 20th and 21st, the Committee on Church Extension and Christian Education presented a report of such great importance that we give the main portion of it below. It will be seen that the Territory of Wyoming is vast in extent and resources; that the development of these resources has already begun, and that the need of a large outlay of Church energy, of men and means, is imperative.

After a brief introduction the report proceeds as follows:

"According to the federal census of 1880 the territory had then a population of about 21,000. Intelligent calculation makes it clear that the number has reached quite 35,000. This population is collected in cities, towns, villages, and initial and crude settlements, and embraces ranch life and the herdmen of the range.

"The results of Church work in the diocese since the last convocation have been feeble. This feebleness is attributed to the lack of facilities for Church instruction and influence, of parochial and missionary organizations, buildings, libraries, teachers, and funds. The contrast between that inhabitation and these facilities presents a deplorable inadequacy of religious supply to religious want. The field is relatively large, but largely lies in the fallow. The soil is extensive, but the plowmen and sowers are few; the harvest is broad, but the reapers and garnerers are wanting. Without further statement, the necessity for the Church's extension within the jurisdiction is indubitable, prominent, and imperative. But the addition of a single fact enlarges and intensifies the need. That fact is, the singularly admixed character of the population in respect to race, religion and irreligion. The population is interwoven of native Americans, Irish, Scotch, English, Norwegians, Swedes, Finlanders, Germans, Danes, the Dutch, the French, the Chinese—of Protestants, Roman Catholics, Mormons, heathens, and skeptics. The skepticism, which lurks in the older communities of this country, wears here a bold front and unblushing face. The profanity and other vices which skulk there carry here the high head with brazen effrontery.

"Viewing the future of the territory through the medium of intelligent and sober judgment, the necessity for the Church's extension in the diocese rises to immense proportions.

The territory has an east and west extent of seven, a north and south extent of four degrees; its counties have the areas of States; its climate is pure and healthy, and in large measure genial and delicate; its surface is supplied with abundant water, which is well distributed by river, creek, and streamlet, and is becoming more so by irrigation, rapidly increasing, and conducted upon a wide scale of canal and ditch; it is not only rich, but very rich, in wild grasses, suitable for grazing and hay-culture; and, in its northern parts, in agricultural capacities; it is not only rich, but very rich, in minerals, of oils, sodas, tin, copper, iron, and coal—letting alone the richly graded gold hills in Carbon, and the finely-grained marble bed in Johnson county—hills and bed yet undeveloped."

The report gives summaries of the different resources of the territory: live-stock, mineral resources, travel and freights, and the prospective railway system, and then proceeds:

"This material development is assured. It will be imperial. It can be brought to just proportions and normal life only by the ruling and crowning power of Church instruction and Church influence. The present work of the Church in the jurisdiction is large; its future will be immense. It calls for great and indefinite increase in Church organisms, buildings, libraries, teachers, and revenues; for a high order of Church intelligence, energy, diligence, patience, fortitude, and faithfulness; for that compound of Church income, methods, conveniences, talent, spirit, and culture which can alone constitute and effectuate adequate and true Church enterprise. It calls for prompt, vigorous, continued, and permanent Church extension. The territory should be converted into a very garden of the Church. Proper Church enlargement here is a high indispensability; without it the community, powerful in numbers and in industrial intelligence, pursuits, and wealth, may wander away into the wilderness beyond the following of the shepherd.

"The territorial branch of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States of America is entitled to, and should receive the devotion of each of its members, because the Church should be the centre of his duty and affections. It is entitled to, and should receive the sympathy and aid of the rest of that Church, because the power of that residue, by manifold organisms, large wealth, and advanced intelligence, put upon it a most grave and responsible stewardship, and the trunk, and the thousand other branches that thrive and bloom out of it may not leave this feeble and struggling branch to itself."

SOUTH DAKOTA.

ELK POINT.—St. Andrew's Church.—On Tuesday, June 16th, about midnight, a terrific thunder-storm, connected with a hurricane and cyclone, passed over this village. Buildings, fences, and large trees were prostrated, and among the disasters, St. Andrew's church (the Rev. J. V. Himes, rector,) was lifted and carried off from its foundation twenty-five feet, and set in an upright position in the middle of the church yard. It was wrecked, but not destroyed, and it can be replaced and repaired with much less expense than to rebuild, which will be done speedily. Some of the chancel furniture was injured and broken, but most of the lamps and furniture were saved.

The church here is still small, and most of its members poor in this world's goods. Most of them suffered by the cyclone, by laying their houses and out buildings in ruins. But they are hopeful, and are taking measures with their rector to restore the chapel by the aid of friendly citizens, without asking the Church, which has long helped them through the Missionary Society, to help in the matter. And so our beautiful village chapel will soon stand complete on its old foundation to welcome all who may come to the Divine service within its hallowed walls.

SPRINGFIELD AND YANKTON.—The Indian Mission.—The Rev. Joshua V. Himes, the venerable rector of St. Andrew's, Elk Point, in the letter containing the above account of the disaster to that church, writes as follows of a visit to the Indian Missions:

"By invitation of our beloved bishop, (after the disaster to our chapel) I left this place on the 23d of June, and went to Springfield, D. T., to attend the anniversaries of the Indian schools and missions there, and at the Yankton Agency, with a visit to the Santee Agency as well.

"It was my first visit to our Indian missions and schools. And after a week's observation under favorable circumstances, I must say that I never got any true idea of the great good of these missions and schools to the Indian people by reading reports as by actual sight and demonstration of their great usefulness. Bishop Hare is, with the teachers and missionaries, doing a great and grand work. The sacrifices of the Church for these missions have borne abundant fruit, far beyond my conception, until I saw with my own eyes, and heard with my own ears the wonderful work of God, in the great improvement and salvation of a degraded race.

"How sad it would be to close the schools and missions for want of means to sustain them. It would be a calamity to them and the Church as well. And yet there is a danger of this disaster to all our missions and schools. Can it be that the means will be withheld, and our missions and schools be crippled or closed? I hope not. The Church, with her wealth and power, cannot afford this. Our bishops must, with the mission and school teachers, be kept in the field at all hazards."

PARAGRAPHS.

A LEADING denominational paper criticised a little sharply the Old Testament Revisers, because they said the pronoun "it" does not occur in the Bible of 1611. It seems the Revisers were right, and the introduction of "its" was the work of later printers or editors.

CLAMMER'S Bible, carefully renovated, has been replaced on Cranmer's desk in the northeast aisle of Canterbury Cathedral, where it was chained in Queen Elizabeth's time. It was the place from which the first English Bible was read in the English Church for the benefit of clergy and laity, or in "a tongue understood of the people."

THE Charity Organization Society of this city is in fact a clearing house, exchange and mercantile agency for 206 societies and churches. In two years and a half it has registered more than 64,500 persons and families seeking charitable relief, and has dealt with 10,060 cases. It systematizes the charity of this great city, and it should receive the most generous support.

A NEAT chapel of Monson granite, as a memorial of the late Samuel W. Hall and his wife, of Waterbury, Conn., has been erected at the entrance of Riverside Cemetery in this city, and it was dedicated on June 11th. Mr. Hall was a public benefactor of Waterbury, and was one of the strong men of St. John's church under the late Dr. Clark and his successor. The existence of the cemetery was largely due to Mr. Hall.

A SECTION of the Edmunds law against polygamy in Utah has been found at last, which the Mormons have not been able to evade. There has been a number of convictions under it, and the chief Mormons are in hiding. It is hoped to find in it the beginning of the end, and that ere long that relic of barbarism which has been so long tolerated will be banished from the land. The Mormons themselves are in a state of terror at the onward march of the majesty of the law.

A PRAYER BOOK, three inches by two, originally the property of Queen Elizabeth, is on exhibition in London. It contains sixty-five leaves of vellum, and on them in the queen's own hand, are written prayers in English, Latin, French, and Italian. The shagreen case, adorned with ruby clasps, has a miniature of the queen and one of the Duke d'Alencon. The book was probably a gaze d'amour in 1581. It has been owned by James II., the Duke of Berwick, Horace Walpole, the Duchesses of Portsmouth and Leeds, and the present owner.

At a recent meeting of the Victoria Institute, London, Professor Stokes, who occupies Sir Isaac Newton's professional chair, and is Secretary of the Royal Society of England, delivered an address in which he said, when reviewing the scientific results of the last quarter of a century, "that as scientific truth had developed, so had men to give up the idea that there was any opposition between the Book of Nature and the Book of Revelation." The institute, of which F. Petrie is Hon. Secretary, seems to be in a highly prosperous state, and it has a good many members in this country.

COLLEGIATE AND ACADEMIC.

RACINE COLLEGE, RACINE, WISCONSIN.—The closeness of Racine College this year passed off with all the success of former years, notwithstanding the fact that no class was graduated on this occasion.

The enthusiasm for the college developed at the recent meeting of the Alumni and "Old Boys," and at the trustee meeting here is calculated to inspire the friends of Racine with fresh hope that the spiritless tenacity and pluck with which she has maintained her position for so many years will extend a penny of endowment, to be at last recognized and rewarded.

The trustees acknowledge the fact that the burden of sustaining such a work as this ought no longer to be left upon the shoulders of one man, and the life of destruction of the admirable foundation subjected to the risks of dependence upon its earnings from year to year. A committee has therefore been appointed to immediately to commence work on the spirit manifested, there seems little doubt that good results will soon be seen.

The event of commencement week were initiated on Sunday, June 9th, by the annual sermon—not this year to be called "Baccalaureate," since no distinguished prelate was to be made, but delivered by Bishop Brown of Fond du Lac, and exhibited all the usual eloquence of that distinguished prelate. The text was from St. Luke vi. 36, "Be ye therefore merciful as your Father also is merciful." That the perfection of the Christian religion is exhibited in the quality of mercy, was the subject of the discourse.

The hearty singing of the Racine boys is a feature of the chapel services which the stranger does not easily forget. On this occasion a solo song by an exquisitely sweet and clear soprano voice was particularly noticeable. We learned that the singer was a grandson of the venerated Bishop Komper.

The college programme provided for no public exercises on Monday, but that deficiency was amply atoned for by a most beautiful ceremony of another kind from those for which college authorities are wont to provide, namely, the marriage of a daughter of the Rev. Dr. Elmonder, former years Professor of Theology in this college, to the Rev. Mr. Parker of St. Paul's School, Concord, N. H. The marriage was followed by a civil celebration of the nuptials at which the Rev. Mr. Elmonder and his wife, kneeling side by side at a table set at the sanctuary steps, we recalled the exclamation, "Who can tell the happiness of that marriage which the Church effects, the oblation confirms, and the blessing seals."

On commencement week is known at Racine as Reunion Day. It is devoted especially to the Alumni, who have their annual meeting and reunion at an association at the Racine Arms Hotel. The students and school boys had their athletic contest upon the campus during the prior dinner, the prizes were distributed, and held, embracing not only the prizes won on this occasion, but more especially the cups and other trophies of the various contests between the Redger and Clarkson clubs upon the base-ball and football grounds of the year. The occasion was graced by felicitous speeches from the champions of the respective clubs, which were fully appreciated and greeted with enthusiasm. The feature of the evening was the students' concert at 8 o'clock, which was undoubtedly the best that has resulted at Racine for several years.

Wednesday, the closing day, dawned clear and bright. The grounds, with their fresh green lawns, and the red brick colleges, the red brick and the Gothic buildings, half buried in the luxuriant growth of the Virginia creeper, the great lake in the foreground, and the sun shining brightly, tempered by its passage over limitless waters, with the unclouded sky and radiant sunlight, all combined to make the day the most charming of the year.

The regular programme of the day was here again extended by the addition of a special service at 10 o'clock, when Francis Joseph Hall of the class of '82, late of the General Seminary, was admitted to the Diocese by the Bishop of Fond du Lac, assisted for the Bishop of Chicago. The other Bishops present were the following: Messrs. W. C. Wiscasset, Springfield, Indiana; and W. C. Wiscasset, Wiscasset.

A public grammar school exhibition was held at 10:30 o'clock. The speeches of the boys were very creditable. A prize was awarded by a committee of visitors to the speaker who made the best speech.

Other prizes were also awarded, and the heads and seconds of the various forms announced. The enthusiasm with which the names were received indicated very clearly that the selections made coincided in most cases with the judgment of the boys themselves.

At 3:30 o'clock the closing exercises of the college took place. The junior exhibition, held the place of the regular commencement exercises, was presided over by the Masters' Orator, by Chas. H. Williamson, '82, a student of the General Seminary.

The junior oration was also a prize competition, two prizes having been recently instituted for this purpose by Mr. G. W. Ames of Omaha, an "old friend" of Racine, who has resided here the other 23 years. The speeches were universally declared fully up to the level of commencement orations generally, and many of them have reflected credit upon the junior class of any college in the land.

The programme was as follows: "Political Education," by Brigid; "The American," by Lloyd; "James A. Garfield," A. L. Reed; "Leaves from the German," "Ideal March," F. C. Willson, the first prize was awarded to Mr. D. C. Lloyd, the second to Mr. F. W. Willson, while Mr. Willson's prize was awarded to Mr. D. C. Lloyd. The Deists' prize was awarded to Mr. D. C. Lloyd, Field Mathematical Prize, recently instituted, and conferred for the first time this year, was won by Mr. D. C. Lloyd, on an eight-page original presentation, and the invention of original problems in geometry, analytic geometry and the calculus. The Edwards' Prize was conferred upon Mr. M. D. Williamson of Williamsport, Pa., for a successful examination in the Prometheus Vinctus of Aeschylus and St. Paul's Epistles to the Romans and to the Corinthians, these having been read in the course. The Master's Oration, which was an exceedingly strong one, was on "Responsibility the Test of Progress."

At the close of the exercises the degree of Master of Arts was conferred, and was conferred by the Masters' Orator, by Chas. H. Williamson of the class of '78, and also upon the Rev. Theo. C. Hudson, '78. The degree of Bachelor of Arts was conferred upon Wm. J. Udd, Prof. of Latin and Greek, who has recently resigned his position at Racine to go to the University of Chicago. The degree of Bachelor of Arts was vested in the hood appertaining to the degree by the Rt. Rev. the Bishop of Wisconsin, assisted by the Rev. Dr. Falk, the senior professor of the college.

The ended one of the most successful occasions of this kind which Racine has known since the death of Dr. DeKoven. My enthusiasm aroused at this time in the presence of the great assembly of the college, which needs only this to achieve a success such as no other school in the West has ever known in the history of the race, and I have not been reconciled, and the college, after a unique experience, still remains unreconciled. But such was the grandeur of the occasion, and the end, inspire respect, and the more so men recall from the sold materialism which has gained so strong a hold upon the race, and the more so the great West.

Report of the Board of Visitors.—The Board of Visitors, through a misunderstanding of their appointment, were not present this year at the examination of the classes, but, from information received from the warden, Professors, and teachers, are convinced that the high standard of scholarship for which the college and school have been so noted, has been maintained, and it will not suffer in this respect by comparison with the best schools and colleges in the country.

We can cordially commend the college and grammar school to Churchmen throughout the West as worthy of their support, and the ardor with which we can safely entrust their sons to its care with the assurance that the physical, intellectual, and moral training of the students will be of the highest quality. The relations of the warden with the "old boys" of the college, is not only very gratifying, but gives us security of active interest which is most pleasing.

The evidences are very plain of the wisdom, energy, and conscientiousness with which the warden prosecuted his work and of the right spirit which animates his co-laborers.

Bishop of Indiana,
GEORGE D. GILLESPIE,
Bishop of Western Michigan.

At the COLLEGE OF St. JAMES, MARLBAD, Tuesday morning, June 9th, the closing exercises were held at the college chapel, in the presence of an audience of those from foreign countries, left for their homes to spend the summer. The ceremonies were held in the college chapel, in the presence of an audience which entirely filled that beautiful room. The Rt. Rev. Wm. C. Williamson, Bishop of Wisconsin, and the officio visitor of the college; the Rev. Dean Rich, Principal of Hannah More Academy, and the Rev. Henry Underdonk, of the diocese of New York, were present and conducted services, which coincided in the confession, absolution by the bishop, and several collects, and the reading of the Epistle and Gospel, and singing of hymns. Mr. Underdonk made an address reviewing the history of the school since it was re-established, and the resolution of the Diocesan Convention. He told how he had found the buildings in such a state of ruin and dilapidation as to be unfit for occupancy, and the grounds in a condition of absolute waste. How he had received no encouragement or sympathy from the trustees of the college, and the diocesan authorities, but he had struggled through every difficulty, applying all the revenues of the school, besides the thousands of dollars which he had personally means to repairing the buildings and establishing and sustaining the school. He said that now the reputation and character of the school established, and quoted the high opinions boys who had been educated at St. James had won for themselves and for the school. He had confidence in the future of the school, and in the world.

Bishop Williamson made a brief address, explaining the relations of the diocese to the school. He said that he had first listened to Mr. Underdonk's remarks with feelings of the deepest sympathy, but that as he went on and showed how he had come through trials and tribulations and had gained a noble victory over adversity, that feeling of sympathy had given place to those of another kind. He then went on to talk to the boys—listening to him that he had been so long a student of the school, and the closest attention. Three gold medals were awarded to boys of the highest class. The Bishop Pinkney was thanked for his services to the diocese, and a gold medal was given for a number of years by Bishop Pinkney, but when upon his death no provision was made for the maintenance of the school, the school kept it in existence. This medal was awarded to Lawrence N. Lee of New York. The Wm. J. Udd, of Racine, was awarded a gold medal to Julian Hartridge of Georgia; the principal's gold medal for the most progress in his studies was awarded to Mr. Henderson, and the gold medal of Henderson of Hancock. When Mr. Underdonk was asked to give out the Bishop Pinkney Medal Bishop Pinkney presented it, and begged that he might have the pleasure of bestowing it, and he promised that hereafter he would continue this as a tradition. "Bishop Meade's" gold medal was awarded to Henry Williams, two to Adrian Underdonk, two to Samuel Quittmann, one to Richard Chaney, two to John W. Williamson, one to Henry Underdonk, four to Joseph Wilkins, four to Charles Rich, two to Burbank Schley, four to Fairfax Dorsey, two to John W. Williamson, one to Claude Grimes, two to Sherry Underdonk. Other boys would have received prizes, but for the rule that no more than one prize was to be drawn, on the part of the pupil, of any claim to the honors of the school."—Harvardian Mail.

EPISCOPAL ACADEMY OF CONNECTICUT, CHEBBING, CONN.—The commencement exercises of this academy were held on June 19th. They commenced with an address on "The True Education" by the assembly adjourned to the Town Hall. The following was the programme: Latin salutory, by Dudley Chase Abbott: "Industry," by James Edward McCabe; "Central America," by Wilbert Cole Shepard; "Moral Culture," by W. H. Burdett Scott; "Washington Irving," by Charles Merrill Henning; "Modern Education," by Robert G. W. Ross; "Choice of a Profession," (Valdeiotica,) by Howard Livingston Ibbell.

The graduates were: D. C. Abbott, H. L. Ibbell, W. G. S. Chambliss, J. E. McCabe, H. C. Shephard, L. Gill, E. B. Moss, E. H. Styles, C. H. Hemingway, G. W. Addick and S. W. Tupper.

The president, the Rev. Dr. S. J. Horton, announced the prize winners of the year, and commended the conduct of the board, and a reception in the evening.

The following is the report of the committee of the trustees attending to the graduation of the students: To the Trustees of the Episcopal Academy, Cheakley: Your committee respectfully report that, in accordance with the instructions of the board, they attended the annual examinations of the pupils of the academy, asking such questions as they deemed fit to test the actual acquirements and readiness of the students. They were thus present at the examinations of the classes in English grammar and history, arithmetic written and mental, geometry, trigonometry and algebra, Latin and Greek. They thus came in contact with all the masters, and it gave them pleasure to report that they found no unmistakable evidence of good and faithful instruction in each department, and of pleasant relations—so far as they could be ascertained—between the pupils. The bearing and manners of the students seemed all that could be desired. They find much to commend in the management of the academy of the school during the past year, as indicated by the examinations. On the whole, their impression was that of an increasing interest and eagerness, due to difference in the scholars themselves. The material necessarily varying from year to year. They noted especially the industry and thoroughness in the studies, the recitation of the sixth form in Greek writing very creditably, and the excellent recitation of the instruction with the work done in the Greek mathematics, in which the students are now carried farther than in any other school in this country for entrance at any scientific school. The instruction given in practical surveying and mechanical drawing is such as few schools of this grade ever afford.

The committee trust that this brief statement will amply testify to the fidelity of their work and deserving of the patronage of the Committee of the diocese.

ST. JOHN'S ENGLISH AND CLASSICAL SCHOOL, PATERSON, ILL. MAINE.—The closing exercises of the first year of this school were held on Friday afternoon, June 14th, at 4 o'clock, at the school building. Monday evening, a comedy from the German of Benedict, was performed by the students, which drew before it a very large and appreciative audience. The surplus over necessary expenditures will be devoted to buying books for the coming year. Exercises on Tuesday were opened by morning service in the chapel, the head-master officiating. The opening hymn: "As Parents Gaze on Friday afternoon," was beautifully rendered by the young ladies, and the response throughout the entire school was given with an earnestness which the scholars singing the Trinity Hymn, "Holy, Holy, Holy," marked into the lower school room. The examinations on themes were in ordinary productions, and all showed care and study of the various subjects. The literary exercises ended, the after-noon was devoted to the dance on grounds, which was witnessed with keen enjoyment by large numbers. In the evening reception at the house of the head-master. The first year was the most successful

Prof. Geo. S. Atwood, late of Bowdoin College, as head-master has been an entire success. It is an earnest endeavor to make this a fitting school of the highest grade, and the influence which may be exerted by this school by the State upon a community largely composed of non-Church people is incalculable. It is confidently hoped that the future of the young men of the diocese, supported by the head-master may be ably supported by all friends of a thorough classical and business education throughout the diocese, and thus increasing and broadening the mind of the Church has a great work in the Diocese of Maine.

BY LEE'S SCHOOL, BOSTON, PHILADELPHIA.—On Thursday, June 14th, this school held its first commencement. The Rev. Dr. Miller, of the Rev. Messrs. Hotchkiss (rector of St. Luke's church), Booth, Graham, Bassett, and Updegraves were present together with many friends and visitors. The school is admirably situated in the country, and affords every access to the proper. The large grounds, fine shade trees and excellent houses afforded much comfort and enjoyment. These showed that the school was well managed, and that the weather was all that could be desired. Some thirty-five (35) boys have been under the instruction of Principal Mr. Charles H. Strout and three masters during the past year, and they acquitted themselves most creditably in the speaking, the instruction being given in the Latin, French, and German. After the exercises were over all present were entertained most hospitably by the Principal, Rev. Dr. Miller, of the Rev. Messrs. Hotchkiss, Booth, Graham, Bassett, and Updegraves were present together with many friends and visitors. This is preeminently a Church school. It has grown out of the well known Try School, which belongs to the Diocese of New York. The Rev. Dr. Strout being one of the masters. This gentleman is in every way fitted for his position as head. He is a native of the diocese, and has been a member of prominent churches and laymen. The Rev. S. F. Hotchkiss, Rector of St. Luke's church, Boston, is a constant visitor, and the boys attend his church, situated only ten minutes walk from the school.

THE CHURCH SCHOOL, WASHINGTON, D. C.—The sixteenth annual commencement of this school for girls and young ladies was held at Fort St. Tuesday, June 18th. The rector, the Rev. Drs. Wm. A. Leonard, J. H. Elliott, J. A. Harold, and the Rev. Messrs. J. W. Clark and W. M. Barker were present. The rector made some pleasant remarks of cheer and welcome, and distributed the honors, the Rev. Dr. Elliott giving her diploma to one of the school who was one of his own flock, Miss Julia Watkins. The first honor, a gold medal, was awarded the Rev. Dr. Elliott, the second by the Rev. Dr. Wm. A. Leonard, and the third by the Rev. Dr. J. A. Harold. This school for girls and young ladies in this city is the only school for girls in the Diocese of the Church. It is strictly of the Church, Churchy.

APPEALS.

I desire to interest some charitable persons in behalf of a very aged and weak, but intelligent widow, who require more and other relief than I can extend to them. They are respectable communicants of the Church, and have been long and faithfully with the needs and such inadequate assistance as their friends could extend. I wish to secure money orders or pledges to plans them for the brief remainder of their days above want and anxiety. I will gladly furnish their address to such a extent, or will receive and account for any funds entrusted to me for their benefit. I am a secure home for them in the country at a very moderate cost.

Address Rev. Wm. N. DUNNELL, Rector All Saints', 228 Henry St., New York.

St. Paul's church, Bantou, Ill., is a poor struggling parish, in the parsonage (Springfield) during the last of the year, and has no funds, having no rector, the services have been held by a lay-reader as often as possible. Chastly the efforts of a few noble-hearted laymen, the rector has been almost erected. The funds, unfortunately, are now exhausted, and a debt of more than $500 hangs over this faithful man, who may seem small, but to us it is very great, for we cannot get it without outside help. Will not some kind Christian help us? Their gifts will be very welcome, and they may rest assured that they have aided a good work. Address, T. H. WELLS, Jr., Bantou, Ill., Minister-in-Charge.

MESSIANIC PREDICTIONS.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

In a sermon on the revision of the Old Testament version, one of our clergy in New York is reported as having said: "The famous passage in Isaiah, which has been the chief proof text for the dogma of the miraculous conception has long been of more than questionable authority. If such be the case, the judgment is that the word there rendered virgin should properly be translated a young woman or young wife. The passage has no possible reference to anything beyond the horizon of the immediate day in which Isaiah was speaking. It is only by the most arbitrary and unnatural emphasis upon the description of the young woman, and upon the title given to the young child that any possible allusion can be found to Jesus. The doctrine of the immaculate conception must stand or fall upon the historic evidence of the New Testament, and not upon such a flimsy foundation as that which theologians have laid in this passage of Isaiah."

One wonders in reading this whether the man who makes these statements is simply ignorant, or whether he expects, by bold assertion, to set aside the learned conclusions of others, and mislead the ignorant. Charity suggests the former conclusion, and if this be true, profound grief, if such be the case, of the man who can assert: "The consensus of scholarly judgment is that the word there rendered virgin ('Behold a virgin shall conceive') should properly be translated a young woman or a young wife."

This is a bold assertion. It may be the consensus of Jews, and some modern German writers: it is not the opinion of Justin Martyr, Irenaeus, Eusebius, Bishop Pearson, or Bishop Wordsworth. The Hebrew word Naamah, translated "the virgin," comes from the root alm, to hide, to keep at home; Bishop Wordsworth adds: "as Eastern virgins were kept," and therefore rendered naamah by Jerome, a Jew. In Hebrew there are two words used to describe the state of virginity, betulah, which describes the virgin state as such, and almah, which describes a virgin growing up, approaching marriageable age, and "can denote (says Hengstenberg) nothing else than puella nubilis." But still more decisive is the usage of the Greek, Latin, and Syriac corresponding words are never used of married women, and Jerome remarks, that in the "Punic dialect also, a virgin proper is called almah."

It is true Hengstenberg says that almah in this passage is improperly translated virgin, and should be a young woman, or a young wife, but this is merely the assertion of a Jew, who would naturally oppose the reference of Isa. vii. 14 to the Messiah, which is utterly unaverted by evidence.

In the Hebrew Scriptures, besides the passage in Isaiah, the word almah is used elsewhere six times. Gen. xxiv. 16, 17, 27, 28, 30, 31, 32, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100.

Hengstenberg says: "In the Christian Church throughout all ages the Messianic explanation was the prevailing one. It was held by all the fathers of the Church, and by all other Christian commentators down to the middle of the eighteenth century."

Luther's remark is even now in full force: "If a Jew or a Christian can prove to me that in any passage of Scripture almah means 'a married woman,' I will give him a hundred florins, although God alone knows where I may find them."

Ptolemy Philadelphus, 280 years B.C., sent for seventy learned Jews, who, according to Josephus, each one by himself made a translation of the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek. The translations were collated, and the Septuagint was placed in the Alexandria library, and was appointed to be read in the Egyptian synagogues where Hebrew was not understood. The seventy united in translating almah by the Greek word parthenos, which has never any other meaning than virgin.

But says our modern Nestor: "The passage has no possible reference to anything beyond the horizon of the immediate day in which Isaiah was speaking." This is the old assertion of Trypho the Jew, with whom Justin Martyr had a controversy towards the end of the second century, and most ably refuted his allegations. Trypho says: "The whole prophecy refers to Hezekiah, and it is proved that it was fulfilled in him, according to the terms of the prophecy."

But far is the man being true this sign was given, and this promise made ("a virgin shall conceive and bear a son") at some time in the reign of Ahab. This Ahab reigned but sixteen years in Jerusalem ("II. Kings xv. 2; and Hezekiah his son, who succeeded him, "was twenty and five years old when he began to reign" (II. Kings xviii. 2), and therefore was born several years before Ahab was king, and consequently not able to be conceived when this sign was given (vide Bishop Pearson).

How strikingly all this illustrates the saying that the interpretations of modern rationalistic writers, if investigated, will usually be found to consist of falsehoods, errors, and exposed sometimes hundreds of years ago.

The modern sage, who, by the study of modern rationalistic writers, has learned how to interpret the Bible, and so is competent to teach his brethren how, rightly, to use it, asserts with emphatic dogmatism: "The famous passage in Isaiah, which has been the chief proof text for the dogma of the miraculous birth (of our Lord) has long been of more than questionable authority." We come to examine this, and it requires very little learning for the purpose, and we find Trypho the Jew quoting for his purpose Theodotus and Aquila, also Jews, making the same statement before the close of the second century, and that he was most completely and satisfactorily answered by Justin Martyr, Irenaeus also, in the same century, ably answered the heretics of his day, having left us an exhaustive examination of this very passage of Isaiah. Our preacher goes on: "The consensus of scholarly judgment is that the word there rendered virgin etc. We examine this and find that the Hebrew will not bear it; every Christian writer of note, from the fathers down, many of them, be it remembered, men of profound learning, with a knowledge of Hebrew and Greek, which puts to shame much of our modern superfluity, condemn it; so that the consensus is simply that of Jews and rationalists."

It would seem to a Churchman that the fact that St. Matthew quotes this very passage from Isaiah, and tells us that it was a prophecy of the birth of Messiah, and was fulfilled in our Blessed Lord, ought to settle the question, Jews and rationalists to the contrary notwithstanding, but when the inspiration of even the Gospels is questioned, of course their authority is questionable. In view of this empty dogmatism one is tempted to exclaim with Holofernes in the play: "O thou monster ignorance, how deformed dost thou look!"

POINTING OF THE PSALTER.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

The letter of Mr. Matthias in a late number of THE CHURCHMAN prompts me to suggest an idea which has occurred to me.

Why would it not be well to abolish, entirely, accents, emphases, etc., occurring on the reciting note of the chant, and let the ordinary rendering of the melodic portion of the chant provide all the necessary accent and emphasis?

The panning on a certain word under the reciting note in each verse, certainly produces, in my mind, a bad effect. In the first place, as Mr. Matthias quotes from the Rev. C. L. Hutchins, it tends to "produce a monotonous, drawing effect," for, as far as my experience goes, all choirs dwell too long on the emphasized word or syllable.

In the second place, it produces, I think, a lame, halting, indecisive rendering of the canticle. In reading the canticles or the psalter, no ordinarily good reader would be tempted to fall upon a word in the middle of a sentence. No more should it be done in a musical interpretation of the same words.

I believe the idea entertained in having these words to be dwelt upon thus, is to provide a point where all the voices may rally, before proceeding to the cadence of the chant. But, if all the voices can reach the rallying word at the same time, or nearly so, they can go a trifle further, and reach the first word of the cadence just as well. The idea is, to pause on no word at all; but, in other respects, to sing the words under the reciting note, and those in the melodic portion, respectively, in the same time as now.

As for taking breath, it can be done in a verse of ordinary length, at the double bar, in the middle and at the end of each verse; and, for a verse of more than ordinary length, it can be done as now, at the end of each phrase or clause of the sentence.

HOW SHALL THE PSALTER BE READ?

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

When the Gloria Patri is said (not sung) after each psalm, how shall the psalms be read? That is, shall the minister begin every psalm, or if the minister has repeated the last sentence of the Gloria, shall the people then take up the next psalm? Or, in other words, if, when the Gloria Patri is sung, it acts as a round off or completion of that psalm, leaving the minister always to begin the next, when it is said, does it have a different effect, making, as it were, one continuous salmo of the whole Psalter for the day? I have frequently seen awkward pauses and confusion on this subject, and would be glad to know the proper ruling.

GUIDE TO BOOK ANNEXED?

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

On comparing the Guide to the Book Annexed, published by James Pott & Co., with the Book Annexed, I find they do not agree in several places—notably on page 18 of the Book Annexed, on page 34, and on page 60, not to mention other places. Now, as both "Book Annexed" and "The Guide" seem to come from the same source, viz., the Joint Committee on the Book of Common Prayer, will some one who knows—member of that committee or otherwise—decide which is to be trusted in the matter of the changes in, or additions to, the Prayer Book, the Book Annexed or The Guide? NEW BOOKS.

THE RUSSIAN QUESTION. Its Causes, Conditions and Prospects. By Edmund Noble. (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co., pp. 369, $1.00.)

The Russian question is the question of the day. Years ago, before the Crimean war, a popular lecturer, J. S. C. Abbott, was wont to depict in alarming and brilliant paragraphs the colossal power of the great Northern Empire, and to predict in the words of Napoleon I. that "in a century all Europe would be republican or Russian." That fear passed away when the military inferiority of Russia was tested on the fields of the Alma, Inkermann and Naktir Bridge. A new peril has taken the place of the dread of Russian conquest. It is the fear which springs from internal commotion. When a neighbor's house is on fire, proximus ardet Utalegor, one fears for one's own combustible premises. When the cholera is over the border one has to regard one's own drains. The fear of Europe, and indeed of all civilization, is the fear of the social conflict which in Russia is developing such despairing and such conscienceless extremes. This book of Mr. Noble's is a brief, philosophical and able treatise on the evils of the Russian State, tracing them back to their source in the overthrow of early liberties. The struggle in the empire of the czar is on the part of autocratic despotism, a struggle for self-preservation; on the part of the people, so far as they are aroused, to destroy all government, because they have no other idea of government than this tyranny from above. But Nihilistic ideas are not so preposterous as to a Western European mind they seem. It is a striking fact that the two most despotic countries in Europe have been also in the outset the freest. Spain and Russia both had a system of popular self-government, which was absorbed into a centralized despotism. Russia once possessed a complete idea of local self-government in the Mir, something equivalent to the English "Hundred" or the New England town meeting. The thought of the Nihilist is the practical return to that, by the abolition of all superior official life. This is very different from the German Commune or the French Red Republic. The points which Mr. Noble tries to establish, are that Russian civilization has a definite form, due in part to the peculiar nature of the country; that the autocracy of the empire is something alien to it, is a Byzantine idea; and that the pressure of authority is as an ever-growing nightmare, aggravated by the terrible struggles of despotic power to maintain itself. Unhappily the Greek Church which, on the popular side, might do immense service, is on the wrong side, and the policy of the czars, when it has tended toward liberalism, has moved in mistake grooves. The vast size of the country is also against reform. It is difficult for the people to combine. Paris delivered France in the supreme agony of the French Revolution, but Russia has not, and can never have, a true capital—a place where the popular will can be felt. But the consequences of a procracy are three: an immense army, and a perpetual work for the army in foreign conquest. Walled in on the European side, Russia is constantly on the aggressive in Asia. Fortunately an army constituted as that of Russia, must be an abused, pillaged and incomplete army. A government as gigantic as that of the czar must be necessarily corrupt. "Everybody cheats the Czar," is a Russian proverb. It is one of the inevitable evils of imperialism. Moreover Russia, though a military nation, is not a warlike one. England is warlike but not military. The famous saying of one of the Russian grand dukes carries a world of meaning. He said "he hated war, it ruined an army so." We have said enough to show, we think, how deeply interesting the Russian question is to the world. Both in its external efforts and in its internal struggles, Russia menaces the well-being of Europe. Whatever throws light upon this subject is of great moment to the thoughtful reader, and this book of Mr. Noble's is not by any means the least important of those which are now appearing.

ARMS LONDON; OR, WILD ENGLAND. By Richard Jefferies. Author of "The Gamekeeper at Home," "Wood Magic," "Bad Deer," "The Dewy Horn," etc. In Two Parts. (London, Paris, Melbourne, and New York: Cassell & Co. Limited.) pp. 442.

The "two parts" of this volume are entitled: I. "The Relapse into Barbarism." II. "Wild England." The effect of this volume is not unlike that of a landscape looked at through the wrong end of a telescope. The idea of the book is that some wonderful catastrophe destroys London and makes it hopelessly uninhabitable. All the better part of the population flees. The rest of the world seems to be blotted out of existence, and England, transformed by the rising of a great lake in the centre, relapses into the condition, say of the times of the Heptarchy. One hardly knows what to make of all this. It is a picture of primitive life in the early middle ages, and yet it is not.

There are curious little bits of survival, and, on the other hand, there is a loss of past civilization which is inconceivable. When Rome passed away the new Europe which rose on the empire's ruins was made up of the fresh life out of the German forests. This represents a race sprung wholly from the lower orders, one much resembling the remnant left in Judea after the sweeping raid of Babylon, which bore into captivity the last king of the House of David. Whether this book is meant as an allegory, or as a warning, or what, we cannot say. It is wonderfully entertaining reading, though it ends with the utmost abruptness.

Only we are inclined to look for some hidden meaning, since as a speculation it is unphilosophical. A nation can decay, lapse from an over-wrought civilization into a very barbarian estate; but the race of mankind cannot go backward. There are certain ideas once got which cannot be lost, certain stages once outgrown to which there is no return. Thus the fixity of custom, superstition, and the inability to grasp at new truths belong to the immature, childish period of a race, or to a people (like the Australian black, for example,) which has reached by a wrong road its final condition of development.

We commend this book to our readers as a very curious study in ethnological development. It gives an idea of the way in which the ancestors of Lord Salisbury and Mr. Gladstone used to live, and the curious power which the old Roman civilization continued to have upon barbarous Britain. It does so, not in the usual way, by romantic pictures of a past seen only in graceful or pathetic survivals, but by a wonderful showing of the way men most likely did live. It is "Ivanhoe" and "The Tales of the Crusaders" seen, not in a stage pageant, but, as we said, through the reversed opera-glass.

It supposes the tide of Time to have flowed backward, and landed us in the days before the Norman Conquest.

Seen in this light, it is a very powerfully-written book, albeit a most tantalizing fragment. The first part is mainly a general outline of the state of the country—a sort of overture, or descriptive chorus, or prologue—and then the curtain rises upon the entrance of Felix Aquila, the hero of the story. His plans, his purposes, his adventures are given up to the point where everything seems to promise a great revolution and a wondrous regeneration of the races left in Wild England. Then Felix disappears, and the story is left untold. But the vivid picturesqueness of the whole, its absolute apparent verisimilitude is unsurpassed in the literature of the present day. One says, as one reads: "That man verily sat on the crest of the hill of 'The White Horse,' and dreamed out all the story—saw the lakewaters rolling over Midland England, and the strange tribes which dwelt on their shores."

WILD TALES. By E. T. W. Hoffman. A New Translation from the German, with a Biographical Memoir by J. T. Bealby. Vols. I. and II. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. 1883.) pp. 359, 401.

We have in these two handsome volumes eleven of the tales of Hoffman, the German romance writer, with a biographical sketch and notes. He has been dead more than two generations, but these weird stories, selected from his voluminous works, still possess a wondrous fascination in Germany, and we are glad to see them made accessible to our readers in a good English dress. Hoffman was long ago made known to the English public by Carlyle, and it was a certificate to his genius, who gave a translation of one of his stories, with a brief biographical notice. He is in his writings a good deal like Poe, but in some respects superior to him, and there was a resemblance in their lives. Hoffman lived recklessly and died pitifully and slowly. For a time before he breathed his last his body was dead to his neck, but his mind was as strong and vigorous as ever, and his imagination as fantastic. His last act was to direct one to read to him a portion of one of his own grotesque tales, and then he turned his face to the wall and died. The tales of Hoffman are not novels. The strange and impossible characters do not work out their own life and history before the reader; but they are stories, and he, a born story-teller, narrates the history of the people he has invented—their sayings and doings. Some of the tales in these volumes are autobiographical, as "The Fermata" and "The Entail," and tell us of the man who was author, painter, and musician. He writes simply and plainly, and impossible in heaven and earth as are his creations, he throws over them such an air of verisemblance as makes them appear possible and probable. Hoffman's works, as a whole, would not make good reading for young or old, but in these two volumes the stories are healthy in tone, and present the author at his best, and may be warmly commended.

RUSSIA UNDER THE TSARS. By STEPIANI. Author of "Underground Russia." Rendered into English by William Westall. Authorized Edition. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.) pp. 351.

In a calm, restrained way Stepiani has drawn up the most terrible indictment ever brought against a government. He has, in these pages, described the system of political repression in which the imperial government is engaged; a system so utterly at variance with all the ideas of the races of Western Europe as to be astounding in its details. It seems to combine the atrocities of French despotism before the Revolution with the horrors of the reign of terror, and to superadd to both a peculiar cruelty of its own. Nothing more hatefully lawless than the police proceedings of Russia can be conceived. The methods are those of the Spanish Inquisition, but the temper is the temper of an inquisition in dire alarm and frantic struggles for its own preservation. We commend this volume to our readers as furnishing a key to the motive of the dynamite conspirators of Russia. If Stepiani is right, they are not as illogical and animal as they seem. They are fighting a foe which cannot be met on any ordinary terms. Their sole hope is to inspire a terror which shall at last induce the doing of justice. They are fighting for bare life against a slavery which would bind body and soul, which would subject the whole land to ignorance, military rule, and maladministration. The history of the ways in which the government rules are evaded is full of interest. One fact is full of meaning, and that is that with all the terrors of Siberia, and the fearful journey thither, the friends of a political prisoner will do all they can to have his sentence changed to exile. Detention in the State prisons is a fate too frightful to be endured. The position of the imprisoned for civil (non-political) offences is delightful compared with that of the nobly born, educated, and refined who fall under the suspicion of the State.

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF HENRY TAYLOR. 1800-1875. In two volumes. (New York: Harper & Brothers.) pp. vol. I. 307, vol. II. 299.

It is a pity that this should be an autobiography. It seems to us that another would have described a life not without its triumphs in literature and politics better than the subject of it has done for himself. An autobiography is interesting just in proportion as a man has to tell the story of other people, and therefore goes out of himself to chronicle the things he has seen and heard. It strikes us that in these two volumes Mr. Taylor has been greatly hampered by the natural feeling of dislike which one has to tell too freely his own doings. The author of "Philip Van Artevelde" was a true poet. One gathers from the hints, rather than the precise statements, that he had no small share in much of the political life of his day. But we learn very little of his literary work, and only in fragments of his public career. "Philip Van Artevelde" is a noble drama, not one of the kind wisely read, but all the more admired and prized by the discriminating few. We are told that he was the son-in-law of Lord Montague, that he was in the colonial office many years, and he retired without taking a peerage. But the book, we must say, is a tantalizing one. It is gossipy, rambling, and disconnected, entertaining in parts, but unsatisfactory as a whole. To sum up in a word, it is one of those books which seem to take for granted that the reader knows almost as much of the subject as the writer. Very likely a London critic will take it to more kindly than a more distant one, but in the swift change of time and circumstance every new generation becomes, as it were, foreign to the people of the past. After a few years Waterloo and Marathon relapse into the same antiquity.

THE OFFICES OF THE ORIENTAL CHURCH, with an Historical Introduction. Edited by the Rev. Nicholas Bjerring. [New York: Anson D. F. Randolph & Co.] pp. 166.

The editor of this work was some time a minister of the Greek-Russian Church in this city, but later became, strange as it may seem, a Presbyterian. He has given in this volume a good translation of the principal offices of the Greek Church, viz., the offices for the Eucharist, Baptism, Christ, Confession, Ordination, Matrimony, and Unction, which are regarded in that Church as sacramental offices, and also the liturgies of St. John, Chrysostom, and Basil the Great, and the nocturnal service on the eve of a festival, when the great vesters are connected with the matins. Mr. Bjerring was every way competent to make such a translation as this, and has done his work faithfully, without any indications of his new bias, and it will be readily seen how important a contribution the volume is to all who are interested in the study of liturgies. Many lessons of wisdom may be learned by comparison of the liturgies of the various branches of the Church—lessons that pertain to doctrine, worship, and discipline. Such a comparison would seem especially desirable while we are discussing the merits and demerits of the Book Annexed, and Mr. Bjerring has our thanks for making it possible as to the offices of that branch of the Apostolic Church to which he once belonged. He has made his volume the more valuable by prefixing to it an introduction, in which he explains the doctrines, rites, and religious life of the Oriental Church, and he has given to the world a valuable contribution on liturgies.

AT LOVE'S EXTREMES, by Maurice Thompson, Author of "A Tallahassee Girl," "his Second Campaign," "Songs of Fair Weather," etc. [New York: Cassell & Co., limited.] pp. 266. Price $1.

There is no doubt that the South is the field for the novelist. It has every convenience for the art. There is not one of the stereotype characters of fiction but can be brought with the greatest ease into the regions of the Tennessee mountains. Either in shooting, fishing, sketching, geologizing, or in mere love of travel, there is a reason ever handy for the production of the personages familiar to modern society. But besides this, there is abundant material for capital writing in the life of the indigenous population of the interior of the Southern States. Whatever may be the merits of the rest of these novels, the home portion is almost sure to be vigorous, graphic, and deeply interesting. It is a virgin soil which yields a rich harvest. This is particularly the case with the novel whose title is given above. It is not above the average in its dealing with the "society people," but the picture of the mountaineer family, who are at one of the "extremes," is as good as anything in American fiction. Not only in language, but in character, is the drawing as life-like as can be.

Tom White, Milly, his daughter, and Mrs. White, his wife, are three portraits which are masterpieces. There is another good sketch, viz., the "lady reporter," Miss Crab, who is not ill naturally depicted, which is saying a good deal, as the temptation to make a broad caricature is certainly quite a strong one.

TALKS OF A GRANDFATHER. Being the History of Scotland from the Earliest Period to the Close of the Reign of James the Fifth. By Walter Scott. Abridged and edited by Edwin Utan. [Boston: Gray & Co.] pp. 396.

We are so thankful to the editors of the "Classics for Children," that we are disposed to overlook much that is not exactly to our taste. But in the matter of abridgement they sometimes go altogether too far. For instance, in this volume the reign of James V. is cut down to a degree which renders it all but worthless as a history. It is a little to be questioned whether any abridgement of Scott's charming book is desirable, though the editor has said in his preface that he has left out some of the details of barbarous punishments inflicted. But granting him this liberty, he is going quite too far to cut down the history of the fifth James to one-third of Sir Walter's, to omit the mention of the Reformation, and to leave out some of the most striking of the anecdotes in the original. We object, too, to any modifying of the language. This is to write a new history, not to abridge the old one.

VENUES OF A COLLEGE. By Edward G. Gerstle. [New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.] pp. 72.

Our advice to any young friend who has the rhyming impulse would be this: "If you must write verse, write burlesque, at least the worse of society. Then, if the spell is upon you to write seriously, you will at least forbear to do it till you have something to say." The trouble with nine-tenths of the poetry we have to review is just this, it has no excuse for coming into being. It is good versification, correct, nay, capable in all its points, but it might just as well have been omitted. That is to say, it might have been anything else than what it is equally well. It came about because its author had a longing to write poetry, not because he had anything in particular he wished to say. That is the trouble we find with "a collegian's" verses. We do not judge them severely. We simply take the old, wholesome rule. Verse is intended to say what cannot be so well, so tersely, so impressively said in prose. Therefore, that which there is no reason for saying in prose is not bettered by being versified, no matter how well it is done.

The motive of this story is twofold—factory life in England, and political persecution in Russia. "Red" Ryrington is an English mill-owner, who is so called to distinguish him from his cousin of the same name, popularly known as "Deep" Ryrington. A Russian Nihilist is introduced evidently for the purpose of telling the story of government atrocities toward political suspects in Russia. It is a well-written story, and the characters are ably drawn. The picture of middle-class life in England is evidently studied from the facts, and the general impression is that social questions can be dealt with successfully if capitalists will only care for the interests of their operatives and avoid speculative hazards. We are not so sure of this conclusion as Mr. Westall appears to be, but we are strongly inclined in its favor. The Russian part is but too unhappily true, and is rather under than overstated.

LYRICAL POEMS BY ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON. Selected and annotated by Francis T. Palgrave. [London and New York: Macmillan & Co.] pp. 365. Price $1.25.

For a selection from Tennyson's poems, this is as good a one as we have seen. A true lover of the laureate will hardly be content with any selection, and we do not quite understand Mr. Palgrave's distinction of "Lyrical." He certainly includes and excludes according to no canon that we are aware of. Nevertheless this is a charming little volume, and one which a Tennysonian missionary would be sure to put into the hands of an intended convert, as a preliminary to introducing the complete works to his notice. One is apt to begin one's love and study of a new poet with some floating quotation or single piece picked up in periodicals. Some remember "Lariana," others the "May Queen," others "Locksley Hall" as the starting-point of their Tennysonian fervor. We trust this little book will do good service in the increase of disciples.

CONSECRATION OF THE TEMPLE CHURCH. Sermons Preached at the Celebration of its Seven Hundredth Anniversary. By the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Reader at the Temple, and the Master of the Temple. [London and New York: Macmillan & Co.] pp. 78. Price $1.

London has hardly an older or more interesting monument than the Church of the Knights Templars. These three sermons by Archbishop Benson, the Rev. Alfred Alinger and the Rev. C. J. Vaughan, D.D., are exceptionally good, and contain not a little of interesting matter respecting the ancient church. This little volume is strikingly bound, half in black and half in white, with the red cross of the ancient shield of the Templars laid across the dividing line. "Testis Sum Agni" is the subject of the archbishop's sermon, "The Knights of the Red Cross," that of the Reader's, "The History of the Temple Church, or rather its place in History," is the subject of Dr. Vaughan's.

TUNNELING UNDER THE HEADOAK. [New York: John Wiley & Sons.]

This is a work of seventy pages, quarto, profusely illustrated by folding plates drawn by the author himself from measurements personally made during the progress of the tunnel. The writer is Mr. S. D. V. Burr, A.M., who, at the time at which the greater part of the matter was prepared, was the associate editor of the Engineering News, and who is now on the staff of the Scientific American. There is no other history of the great tunnel accessible in book form, and to engineers and others interested in such subjects this work will prove of great value, if it shall not, indeed, make itself an authority—a result which, if the illustrations and descriptions are as accurate as they appear on a cursory examination, will most likely be speedily gained by this elegantly printed volume.

PALESTINE: Its Historical Geography, with Topographical Index and Maps. By the Rev. Archibald Henderson. [Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark.] pp. 251.

This is one of a valuable series of books in process of publication in Edinburgh for Bible classes and private students. They are in the nature of hand-books, and will be found very convenient and useful. Palestine contains the most recent results of explorations in the Holy Land, and gives the present geography of the various epochs of biblical history. It is admirably arranged, and will make a useful manual. There is an appendix which, among other matters, contains the text of the Masbete Stone, and a topographical index, so full as to serve the purpose of a gazetteer, and the excellent maps are from Captain Conder's "Hand-book of the Bible."

ASTRONOMY FOR ENGINEERS. In Thirty-two Lessons, with Illustrations. By Francis Baily, M.A. [New York: John Wiley & Sons.] pp. 185. "Begin at the beginning." If it is possible to get at anything simpler and more elementary

than this we cannot conceive of it. It comes to one's thought whether it be worth while to teach astronomy at all to pupils who should need a book like this. But if it be worth while to try it, then this book is the book for the purpose. And since the best way of giving such instruction to such young children as this progresses is oral instruction by a parent or friend, this book will be an excellent guide for the teacher. We are inclined to relabel it, "Astronomy for Beginners at Teaching Astronomy." Very often children are woefully misguided by the random answers their elders make to their curious questionings.

WHY THE CAPES. By Howard Pyle. [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.] pp. 296. Price $1.

"The Capes" are the Capes of the Delaware, and the time of the story is that of the war with England in 1812. The hero is a privateer-son, and the heroine a Quakeress of an inland Pennsylvania town. Without being an exceptional novel, it is a fresh, original story, and is told in that sort of semi-autobiographical way which Thackeray made so effective in "Henry Esmond." Practically the hero is the story-teller, but this fact is kept in the background just enough not to interfere with free handling. The nautical part is well written, but with less of the sea-flavor than a true marine story is apt to have.

THE TWO SIDERS OF THE SHIELD. By Charlotte M. Yonge, author of "The Hair of Keadyffe," "Unknown in History," etc., etc. [London and New York: Macmillan & Co.]

Miss Yonge is a wonder. She has entertained two generations of grown people and children, and is now engaged in putting into the hands of the third generation some of the safest and wisest stories ever written to divert, amuse and instruct. Her admirers, both young and old, number up among the thousands, in this country as well as in England. The present story is much like its predecessors in that a very numerous family is the motive power, with their troubles, misfortunes, pleasures and adventures.

STREETS IN ROME. By Augustus J. A. Barn, author of "Walks in Rome," etc., etc. [New York: George Routledge & Sons.]

One of the most interesting books ever written about this peculiar and still little known country. Every page is full of valuable information. The numerous extracts, both in French and English, from well-known authorities, upon Russian life, manners and customs, contained in it, lend additional interest to the sketches. The many illustrations are by the artist's own pencil, drawn under great difficulties, owing to the peculiar police regulations of the country, and consequently doubly valuable.

LORENA. [Harper's Handy Volume Series.] A Novel by Katharine S. Macquoid. In Two Volumes. [New York: Harper Brothers.]

Miss Macquoid is a well-known writer of well-liked, lady-like, uneventful but readable novels. In this long story of an English wife wedded to an Italian husband, who has a fascinating and generally distracting element of a beautiful niece in the household, she assigns to greater things, and ends a very commonplace story with a tragedy—the death of the husband—neither probable or necessary in the solution of the family difficulties.

LITERATURE.

The July Electra (Louisville, Ky.) gives much pleasant reading for quiet summer days.

The July Sideral Messenger (Northfield, Minn.), is filled with interesting papers and editorial notes relating to astronomy.

"GEORGE ELIOT'S Poetry and Other Studies," by Miss Cleveland, the sister of the President, is announced by Funk & Wagnalls in a seventh edition.

VICK'S ILLUSTRATED MONTHLY for July, with its colored plate of "Godetias" and other illustrated articles, will be welcome to lovers of flowers.

E. P. DUTTON & Co. are importing a limited edition of Fouque's Undine, beautifully illustrated in color by Julius Hopper. It is a Paris edition, and will sell at $25 a copy.

Mr. WHITTAKER announces the "New Clergyman's Companion," a volume of offices and prayers compiled by a parish priest, and intended to be a successor to the work of Bishop Hobart with the same title.

The July number of the Star and Crescent, the organ of the Alpha Delta Phi, is devoted chiefly to the fifty-third annual convention of that fraternity, which was held with the chapter in the University of Michigan.

The Builder and Worker for July has eight plates devoted to dwelling houses, and a varied table of contents. It is not an advantage to readers, if it is to publishers, the admixture of reading matter with advertisements.

A illustrated pamphlet gives an interesting account of Racine College from its foundation. If we mistake not it is from the pen of Warden Gray. It closes with a poem, "De Koven and Racine," signed with the warden's initials.

The July African Repository makes mention of the consecration of Bishop Ferguson, and of the fact that he was educated in the schools of Liberia. The Repository is largely devoted to the interest of Liberia, and is published quarterly by the American Colonization Society at Washington.

The Addresses and Historical Papers of the Centennial Church of Virginia is in press, and will be issued by Mr. Whittaker, in cloth, by the first proximo. A similar volume for the two dioceses of New Jersey has been issued by the same publisher. They are valuable contributions to our historical literature.

The Sanitarian is one of the most valuable of our scientific journals; it deals with the most important questions pertaining to health in a practical way. Three articles in the July number deserve special attention: "Causes of Typhoid Fever in Munich," "Typhoid Fever Epidemic at Plymouth, Pa.," and "The Plymouth Drinking Water."

"The First Century of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Massachusetts" is the title of Bishop Paddock's centennial discourse, published in handsome quarto, with broad margins and uncut leaves, by order of the convention. His annual address is also issued separately from the Journal by Copples, Upham & Co.

PART IX. of the Churchman's Family Bible, published by the Christian Knowledge Society, and bearing the imprint of E. & J. B. Young & Co., concludes the Book of Job and begins the Psalms. The notes are practical, the illustrations are good, and judging by the five parts which we have seen it can safely be commended to families as a valuable and safe compendium.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS, in the early fall, will publish "The Lives of the Presidents," in words of one syllable; "Great Cities of the Ancient and Modern World," in two separate volumes; "History of Ireland," monosyllabic; and other books of a high class of juvenile literature. They also announce "Paul and Virginia," with three hundred illustrations; "Golden Hours," with colored plates; "The Idyls of the Months," with designs in colors and verses by Mary A. Latbary; and two Kate Greenaway books—"The Marigold Garden" and the Kate Greenaway Almanac for 1886.

"TARRY THOU THE LORD'S LEISURE."

BY E.

Our Master loves not haste ;
The world is full of gentle ease ;
The slow unfolding bud or flower ;
The nests of birds in leisure built ;
The calm, majestic course of stars,
Or the seasons' gradual return ;
These make a mock of hasty toil,
And prove man in his best estate
But turbulent, impatient, rash,
Beginning work he ne'er can end—
Imperfect work, in haste begun,
And left unfinished, ragged, lost.

O copy, then, the Master's life—
The thirty years of calm retreat,
And slow preparing for the God like end,
Then two short years to sow the seed
From which must spring the whole world's life.

Though short His time to teach and feed,
We see no haste nor toil unmet—
A few meek hearts receive the word,
A few sweet souls perceive their God.
With slow steps towards Jerusalem
He waits His death with folded hands,
Then rests his weary head in Joseph's tomb,

And in the appointed three days' time
He rises God-like, glorious, Christ,
Anointed now to all eternity
The Man of God, the God of man.

He leaves to time, His gentle handmaid,
The completing of His work—
His sun and rain bring fruit and flower
From dead and dying seed.
Patiently He waits for earth's best fruit,
The hearts of men, which time shall bring
In beauteous sheaves, from harvest fall.
He well can wait a thousand years—
To Him 'tis but a day ;
And every day to us may be
A thousand years of blessed service,
If we fill well each moment
With the overflowing of His love to us.

We seek to do too much,
We're not content unless we grasp
The rules of science and the skill of art.
The world, the Church, the poor
Must claim our time.
And our hearts are scorched and burnt
With the heat and fire of unfulfilled endeavor.

Is this too much for one man's life !
I answer yes ; far, far too much,
And care and trouble wait on such
When, in divers ways and difficult,
They seek to spread a few short hours
And talents small and scant
Around a universe as vast as heaven itself.
It may not be.
Our lives must have one central point,
One object clear and plain,
Our orbit but one centre,
And let this centre be God's love.
We soon shall find each thought of double value,
Each hour of twice the length
Of that we dissipate on objects vain,
Each work, however hard,
Be crowned with best success,
Because when done for Christ
He will fulfil the end of our desires,

If we see it so or not,
And in the peace that comes of loving service,
The heart's content 'neath this directing hand,
How swift our feet, how sure our aim,
No doubt detains our willing hand,
And all the earth so fair
Is seen with eyes made new
By this refreshing light ;
Each strain of music rare,
A clear, new speech and language sweet,
Speaking to souls made ready to receive it.

All time is ours, as if it had no end ;
Eternity is ours, within, around,
The best of gifts ;
The knowledge of the Lord—
This is eternity in time.

ROBERT ORD'S ATONEMENT.

BY ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY.

CHAPTER XXV.

A Storm in a Teacup.

" M.—They make this thought too plain.
They wound me—Oh, they cut me to the heart!
When have I said to any one of them,
I am a blind and desolate man?"

F.—Never, my brother—so you never have!
M.—What could she think of me
If I forgot myself so far? or what Could she reply?"
—John Ingelov.

Neither Garton nor Rotha was likely to forget that day in the Burnley Woods; very serious consequences will sometimes result from comparatively simple causes, and "Be sure your sin will find you out" is an adage that will hold good to the end of time, be the sin ever so venial.

Rotha had no idea that her pleasant ramble afforded food for a dozen gossiping tongues. Blackscar had got hold of the whole affair from beginning to end, and was making the most of it, after its usual amiable fashion; and, quite in contradiction to that wholesome proverb that "Rolling stones gather no moss," the Burnley story grew and flourished to a fabulous extent.

Miss Mattie O'Brien had met the little party on their way to the station; quite by chance Miss Mattie mentioned this fact to a choice committee of ladies at that time sitting in the Travers' drawing-room, and Rotha's red cloak and gypsy hat were discussed with a zest and enjoyment of which the other sex can form no adequate idea. It was rather singular, therefore, that Miss O'Brien should repeat the same story at Mrs. Stephen Knowles's and at Nettie Underwood's; the most inveterate story-teller is apt to grow weary of repetition—memory becomes treacherous, a little judicious touching up here and there becomes absolutely necessary and heightens the interest. Mystery is always acceptable; a word will sometimes imply so much. The last person who heard this titbit of scandal was a deaf lady, Mrs. Effingham, the widow of a half-pay officer. The whole story was shouted through her ear-trumpet, and she ever afterwards firmly believed that Garton Ord and Rotha were engaged.

Some of these reports reached Robert Ord's ears. Young Jack Effingham often went by the same train to Thornborough. One day he formally congratulated Robert on his brother's brilliant prospects; Robert was first incredulous, and treated the whole thing as a joke—probably a hoax on Jack's part, and then he waxed wroth. Belle told him she had heard the same thing from Mrs. Effingham and Amy Travers; she could not understand what had given rise to such a report, neither could Robert; but, all the same, he determined to give his young brother a hint.

Robert never took any pains to disguise his contempt for Garton. Garton's thriftless ways and want of success were very sore points with him; he could not understand a sturdy young fellow, with such thews and sinews as Garton's, being content to eat another man's bread. He had no patience with what he chose to consider his morbid views; he had many angry arguments with Austin on the subject. The vicar, who was keenly alive to the young man's faults, was yet very tender over this intense longing of his to enter the Church, and was always inculcating patience on Robert.

"I know it is very hard for you to have this burden," he said once; "but we must be careful not to press him too closely. I fear, indeed, that he must resign all hope of entering the Church; it is more application than ability that is lacking; but what a faithful priest he would have made! Let us give him a little time to get over the disappointment, and then you can speak to him about Mr. Silthers; but I think, after all, the New Zealand scheme would suit him best."

The vicar had made the foregoing speech at the time that he was so sorely pressed about the coal bill, and since then Robert had spoken very seriously to Garton about the emigration plan, which Garton had taken in very bad part; and there had been some ill blood between the brothers in consequence. Garton had promised to think over it, however, which he did every hour of the day, but as yet he had arrived at no determination; and Robert was just getting impatient again when Jack Effingham's unfortunate speech, and the absurd reports that were at present rife in Blackscar, made him more than ever desirous of Garton's obtaining some useful post at a distance. To do Robert justice, he took a very unprejudiced view of the matter, and was far more inclined to blame Garton than Rotha. "Gar has no right to be always n'at Bryn," he said to himself as he left his office one evening; "of course people will talk about it. It is all thoughtlessness, for he can't be such a fool as to think she would have him. Besides, I don't believe Gar cares for her a rap; why couldn't he have married Nettie and settled down like a sensible man? Why, I am sure the girl was half in love with him; women have droll tastes sometimes. I'll speak to him to-night; he has no right to allow Miss Maturin to be talked about like this. In spite of his stupidity Gar is a gentleman, and I can touch his pride there;" and Robert buttoned up his coat and looked very resolute as he jumped into the Blackscar train.

About an hour after this the brothers were sitting over their comfortless meal in a nondescript sort of apartment upstairs which went by the name of the study.

The dining-room, where Garton ate his solitary dinners, was a dismal room on the ground floor, as damp and almost as cheerless as a vault. Belle never entered it without coughing; the damp came through the walls in dark unsightly patches; the few articles of furniture were more for use than ornament. The carpet would have blushed over its patches if it had any color left; traces of Garton's mnddy boots left indelible marks here and there; no fire ever burnt in the rusty grate. While Garton ate his dinner he would open the door that led into the kitchen for warmth and company. The kitchen was the only bright place in the house—a long low room, with a beam across, from which an occasional side of bacon or a York ham dangled in company with strings of onions and bunches of sweet herbs. The small latticed windows were laced across with vine-leaves, and the door opened on to the lawn. Garton liked to dangle his long legs from the spoolless table and talk to old Sarah as she shelled peas or sliced beans by the hearth. Sometimes on a cold winter's day he would eat his dinner there by preference. Sarah and he were great friends; she spent hours, with her iron-rimmed spectacles on, darnng his dilapidated socks. But for her care and providence he would often have had a scanty meal; he would deny himself proper food sometimes to leave the joint presentable for Robert. Garton had a healthy appetite, and used to make up with bread and cheese. Sarah always baked a pie-crust cake, or some such simple delicacy, on these occasions. When the old woman fell ill Garton's attentions were almost filial. In the winter she suffered much from rheumatism; Garton would black his or Robert's boots, or fetch water from the pump, and do many a menial office to relieve the faithful old servant. Perhaps the highest praise that Garton Ord ever won was spoken by old Sarah. "He mayn't be clever, your reverence," she said once in her droll way, "and nought but a blind fool 'ud call him handsome, but when it comes to our taking our places at the Supper up above it is the young master, God bless him, that will be called to the upper chamber." And the vicar, who heard these words, drew his hand before his eyes and said, "God grant it, Sarah."

The study, as it was called, was a tolerably comfortable apartment immediately over the dining-room; and, in spite of its shabbiness, had a cosy, well-used air about it.

The hangings were faded, it was true, but there was plenty of light; the old brown-stained book-shelves fairly groaned with books. Robert was a great reader, and would go without a meal to purchase a book; the old arm-chairs were capital places for a lounge. In winter the kettle sang merrily on the old-fashioned black hob, and a bright fire was necessary for the making of toast. Garton, who was housekeeper, butler, and gardener in one, always made extensive preparations for his brother's comfort. In the evening he would begin his proceedings by clearing the table for the tea-tray—a very simple process, which consisted of pitching a dozen books into a corner with a well-directed aim; this having tested his muscles, he bustled the black cat off Robert's particular chair, and turning up his coat-sleeves, proceeded to make toast. Amongst his other accomplishments, Garton considered himself great at making tea. It was the drollest sight in the world to see him presiding over the tea-tray with the gravity of a judge; it always excited Mrs. Ord's risibility. He would peer into the tea-pot a dozen times, with the fragrant steam curling round his nostrils, while he tenderly stirred up the brown liquid; he would describe all sorts of mysterious circles with the tea-pot as he filled the cup—"to be shaken before taken" was a standing joke in the family; he never talked at such moments, but his forehead would be a mass of wrinkles. He had a knack of carving a bare bone of mutton, too, and of making a little go a long way. Robert knew nothing about the bread-and-cheese dinners, but he often praised old Sarah's economy, and wondered at Garton's appetite; the pile of toast would disappear in a twinkling; Robert would look up from his book with a joke at his brother's expense. Garton shared all his choicest morsels with old Cinders, the black cat. Cinders would sit for hours on the arm of his chair, purring softly if he touched her. Garton would drink his last cup of tea without milk, that Cinders would have her saucerful.

Robert rarely made more than one or two remarks during the course of tea; he liked his book better than Garton's conversation; they seldom agreed on the same point, and wrangling is apt to be tiresome. On this occasion, however, Robert seemed inclined to depart from his usual rule: for, as he passed his cup to be refilled, he asked Garton, with some appearance of interest, what he had been doing all day.

Garton, who was peering into the depths of the teapot, oscillated it gently from side to side before he answered.

"Doing? oh, much as usual; it was Wednesday morning, and we had Litany, and a funeral; and I dug up the new onion-bed before dinner, and cut up some more firewood; and afterwards Rube and I went up to Bryn and took the ladies down to the shore. It was such a glorious afternoon. I have only just got back; they asked Rube to stay to tea." Garton might have added, with perfect truth, that he had been much aggrieved that the invitation had not been extended to him. But Rotha, who had been a little shy with him ever since the day in the Burnley Woods, had prudently refrained from such asking, as Mrs. Caruthers would be away.

This was the opportunity that Robert wanted; he had decided to give his brother this hint, and he had determined also on two things—he would speak very plainly to Garton, so that there should be no misunderstanding of his meaning; and he would take care to preserve his good temper, that Garton should have no excuse for any sullenness. He commenced the conversation, therefore, very good-humoredly.

"Gar, my dear fellow, I hope you will not take it amiss, but I want to say a word or two to you on that subject." Garton, who was giving Cinders her tea, looked up rather surprised.

"About Rube, do you mean?"

"No, about Miss Maturin, and I hope you will not mind my speaking very plainly; but you have no idea how people are talking."

"Why shouldn't people talk?" returned Gar stupidly. He had not the faintest suspicion of his brother's meaning. Robert looked disposed to be annoyed for a moment, but he repressed his impatience and went on:

"No man—no gentleman, I mean—is justified in allowing a woman to be talked about as people are talking about Miss Maturin. Do you know what Jack Effingham had the impudence to say the other day?"

"Not I; Jack is impudent enough for anything," returned Gar indifferently.

"Jack is a keen observer, and a man of the world in spite of his youth; which is more than I can say of you," returned Robert, exasperated by Garton's unconscientiousness; "and of course, when he congratulated me on my brother's brilliant prospects in life, and Mrs. Effingham and Amy Travers said much the same sort of thing to Belle, they must have some ground for their speech."

"What did Jack mean?" asked Garton, now thoroughly bewildered; but he grew a little hot nevertheless. Robert was driving at something certainly.

"Why, he only repeated what other people are saying—his mother and Amy Travers, for example—that you and Miss Maturin are on the eve of an engagement."

What made Garton turn so suddenly pale? Did the arrow shoot home?

"Oh, Bob, they never said that surely!"

"Indeed they did, Gar. I can vouch for it that Jack believed it too; he was quite crestfallen when I pooh-poohed it. I had some difficulty in persuading him that such an idea had never entered your head."

"How dare people tell such lies?" interrupted Garton, warmly.

"They think they are speaking the truth. Don't get hot about it, my dear boy, but let us think how we are to put a stop to the scandal. I don't mind telling you the whole thing touches my pride very closely; that one of the Ords should be accused of fortune-hunting; that a beggar—forgive my speaking plainly, Gar—should be courting an heiress, and she Miss Maturin! No; it cannot be borne for a moment. Don't you see for yourself now how wrong you have been?"

The unusual paleness still overpread Garton's face; it was easy to see the unexpected accusation sorely troubled and bewildered him; but at his brother's last words he raised his head indignantly.

"Wrong! I am always wrong, but I don't exactly know how. Come, out with it, Bob. I can see you think I have been to blame."

"You have assuredly been to blame, Garton."

"What! You dare to insinuate that this has been the reason of my visits to Bryn? And Gar's dark eyes flashed with a look never seen in them before. Robert liked this display of pride in his young brother; it showed some degree of manliness. His next words were spoken most kindly.

"Hush! sit down, Gar—what is the use of losing your temper? Of course I don't accuse you of such meanness—or are you not an Ord?"

"If you had meant it—" returned Gar more calmly, as he reeated himself.

"Well, what then?" interrupted Robert, with a laugh; for Garton did not seem inclined to finish his sentence.

"Oh, nothing; but I wouldn't have broken bread with you after such an insult—that is all. I may be a beggar—I thank you for reminding me of the fact—but I am not an unprincipled one. I was always under the impression that I was a gentleman."

"So you are, Gar, every inch of one," returned Robert, anxious to soothe his brother's hurt pride; he never respected Garton more than during this little ebullition of natural resentment. It was not Robert's words, but some strong uncurrent of feeling that made Garton so sore.

"If I blame you," went on Robert, "it is for want of thought and due consideration of what is owing to a woman. You are so unlike other men, and have led so strange a life, that I hardly know how to make you see this; but I can only repeat that you have quite forgotten your position with regard to Miss Maturin. May I speak more plainly?"

"I think you are sufficiently plain, Robert."

"All the same, I cannot allow you to misunderstand my meaning, Gar. I am eight years older than you, and have eight more years' experience—that ought to go for something; and I tell you this, that no one but an accepted lover ought to be doing what you are doing."

"Does friendship go for nothing, then? I think you forget that Miss Maturin and I have been friends from the first. Austin and Mary know that I visit at Bryn. They have never found fault with me."

"Neither should I if you were prudent in respect to those visits. I don't think either Austin or Mary knows how often you are at Bryn—of those daily visits, daily walks, and long excursions. Do you think Blackscar and Kirkby don't draw the only natural conclusion from all this? Of course people's tongues are loquacious on the subject. Jack had a good foundation for believing that you and Miss Maturin were engaged."

A hot flush passed across Garton's swarthy face. There was a tight pain at his heart that nearly suffocated him. Were all these pleasant visits, these delightful rambles to be given up? His voice was changed and husky when he next spoke. Robert thought his manner very strange.

"I am afraid you are right, Bob; I have been very thoughtless." He kept his face averted from his brother, and went on: "I forgot that people are fond of meddling in our business. I thought an Ord would be above such a suspicion, but I see they have misjudged me. I think Miss Maturin would be grieved if she knew of what I was accused."

"Every one would not consider you a fortune-hunter," returned Robert, in a tone so meaning that Garton started at him in surprise. "They might think—I am only supposing a case, you know—but they might think, Miss Maturin being young and not so bad looking—at least, it would be a more natural conclusion—that—that you, in fact, had fallen in love with her." And Robert, who had strong suspicions during the last few minutes that his brother was not quite so indifferent as he had at first imagined, looked steadily at Garton; but Garton met his eyes almost fiercely.

"Well, what then?" he replied, clenching his hand rather unnecessarily.

"Only—only that you would escape with a scorching, that's all. Don't go into a passion, Gar; I am only guessing at other people's thoughts."

"Or retelling your own—which?" replied Garton in the same fiery tone. "Look here, Robert. You mean well, I believe. You think you are pulling me out of the fire, eh? and you want to do me a good turn. But you are not doing it in the pleasantest sort of way. You are insinuating that I am a fool, and that I have been a fool all along. So I have, but an innocent one. I have thought it no wrong to indulge a harmless friendship—only a friendship, Robert. Miss Maturin has been very good to me—his voice trembled a moment—"and it is my nature to be grateful for kindness. If the world chooses to misunderstand it, it is more of a fool than I."

"My dear fellow, no one but you can afford to set his opinion at naught. Depend upon it, 'In the multitude of counsellors there is wisdom'; one cannot dispense with his rules."

"I have never meant to dispense with them, Robert. If I did not follow your advice now I know what I know, I should be more of a knave than a fool. In future you will not have need to complain of my frequent visits to Bryn."

Robert looked pleased. He really had his brother's welfare at heart.

"That's right, old fellow, you have taken my advice very sensibly, and it is first-rate of you." But Garton did not respond very cordially.

"Yes, it is all right. I suppose I ought to thank you for making me so uncomfortable, but I will tell you the honest truth. I would snap my fingers at Blackscar and its old women's tales if it were not for the fear that it might do her harm, and that perhaps in time she might get to believe it. No, I couldn't stand that. Besides, there is danger of scorching, you know." And Garton laughed a hard, bitter laugh, that had more pain than merriment in its sound, and which made Robert look at him again; and then he got up and put his hand on his shoulder.

"Gar, old fellow, I have not quite finished my advice."

"Haven't you, Bob?"

"No, the hardest part remains; don't think me cruel, lad. I only speak for your good. But do think once again of the emigration business."

"I knew that was coming, Robert." His face was paler than ever, and he set his teeth hard.

"Gar, dear boy, I swear I only mean it for your good; you are wasting—rusting here. Better go away."

"Why?" asked Garton, moodily; but Robert drew his arm round his neck as though they were boys again; and then he stooped down to the dark cropped head and whispered something very low in his ear.

What made Garton suddenly look up and wring his brother's hand?

"Too late! God bless you Robert. Yes, I will go anywhere—anywhere; but she shall never know why—never, never!"

CHAPTER XXVI.

In the Dark.

"No backward step; ah, no returning.
No second crossing that ripples flow;
Come to me now, for the rest is burning;
Come, ere it dawns; ah, so; ah, so."
"Then cries of pain, and arms outstretching—
The beck grows wider, and swift and deep—Passionate words as of one beseeching—
The loud beck draws them; we walk and weep."
"Farther—farther; I see it—I know it—
My eyes brim over; it melts away;
Only my heart to my heart shall show it,
As I walk desolate day by day."
—Jean Ingelow.

Robert rather congratulated himself on having done a good stroke of business that night; he had struck when the iron was hot. He drew a long breath of relief when his brother had left the room.

"I have brought him to his senses about the emigration plan. Thank heaven, that bit of troublesome business is over for good and all," he ejaculated devoutly. "Poor old Gar!" he continued, with a pang of natural sympathy; "who would have imagined that he would have been so bitten?"

And he thought with some degree of bitterness of the hand that had dealt this fresh blow. His heart was full of pity as he heard Garton's restless footsteps overhead. He lay and listened to them far into the night; a touch of compunction haunted him as those weary footsteps passed to and fro. He was glad to remember now that his words had been wise and temperate; considering all things, he had rebuked Garton's thoughtlessness very mildly; the poor fellow's hot denials and reproaches, his indignant refutations, his irate defence, had been far from displeasing to the elder brother.

"I did not think he had so much in him," he said to himself over and over again.

Robert's sympathy was very real; but he had no conception of the fierce misery that was making the night a long torment to Garton. The incessant movement, the long, restless strides, the hasty stumbles in the darkness, when the candle had guttered to its feeble end, were so many proofs of the intolerable feelings of the young man, who took no heed of the cold and darkness—groping from end to end of the narrow room in a blind, helpless way.

Sometimes he stood, with folded arms, looking blankly through the darkness, or rocking himself in his old accustomed manner. A little glimmer of light from a street lamp cut into the darkness and showed him like a swaying gray shadow on the wall. A dull surging broke the silence. Under the lamp there was a stretch of white, shining road; a barrier of darkness seemed to close it in. As he stood and looked out at it a dull, hopeless gloom seemed to settle round his heart and rob him of all courage.

He wondered now how it had come about. Robert's shrewdness had brought this sudden revelation of his own feelings home to him. He was racking his memory to discover when it was that he first loved her; but his mind was too confused, his pain too real, to follow out any given clue of reasoning. He had called his love friendship, and under this disguise had tasted of her sympathy and found it very sweet. He had blundered out all his troubles to her with an eagerness that should have revealed his own feelings. No other woman had ever seemed so sweet and gracious to him. And now all this pleasantness of intercourse must be broken up. She was the light of his eyes and the desire of his heart—ah, he knew this now. The one woman whom he could and would have dared to love, despite his beggary, but who was never to know—never, never—that he had so dared to love her.

He wondered with a sort of terror how he should bid her good-bye. A sudden anguish filled him as he thought of her youth and graciousness. What a simple, kindly friendship had existed between them! On his side he had always been very loyal, but with a sturdy independence of opinion which she had found amusing. What nonsense he had talked to her, and how patient she had always been with him! She had never been weary of his discontent and moodiness. Her eyes would shine with a tender pity as he blurted out his grievances. She always seemed pleased to see him, no matter how troublesome he had been. She would meet him half a dozen times a day with the same shy, bright smile; a kind hand would be put out frankly to him. Sometimes she would indulge in a little joke at his expense, but the joke never hurt him.

He thought of that day in the Burnley Woods, and the wonder with which she had regarded his simple castle-building. She had been a little disappointed with his lack of ambition, he thought, and so marvel. How paltry it all looked now—the little cottage with the bow-window, Reuben, Johnnie Forbes, the lame boy, with Deb to keep house. Ah, what a different castle he would build now! A dull misery of longing took possession of him as he cherished the bitter-sweet fancy—a little room all sunshine, gleaming white lilies outside, a tall, slim girl with a plaintive face, with sweet, frank eyes.

"Oh, my God!" cried the poor fellow in his anguish. "And I must never tell her that I shall love her to my dying day."

It was the hour of his weakness. By and by a certain strength of acquiescence came to him—he struggled no longer; in a word, he accepted his fate.

One by one he put away his hopes from him. One by one he looked the bitter conditions in the face; his love was hopeless—unrequited; he must give that up—he must renounce all hopes of entering the Church. He had given his word that he would go anywhere; he would keep his promise. There should be no delay, no looking back, no undue dallying with regret. The stern sternness of Garton's nature came to his assistance here. As soon as possible he would leave Blackscar and England. The sacrifice might be a cruel one, inasmuch as it involved all he held most dear, but at least it should be complete.

He did not tell himself that he should not dare to trust himself often in Rotha's presence, but, all the same, he knew that such was the case. A few bitter drops, of which even his manhood was not ashamed, were wrung from his eyes when he thought of his boy-friend Reuben, who would fret after him sorely. The thought was a bitter one, but he put it away from him as soon as possible.

"He has a friend in her—she belongs to her now," he repeated, with a vague pleasure in this mutual property, and a fresh dimness crossed his eyes as he thought how Reuben would never allow her to forget him.

There was much painful work in store for him. It was nearly morning now, and he was terribly jaded, almost worn out; but with that unselfishness which was part of his nature he resisted the temptation to seek his bed, but lay down for an hour in his clothes that he might not over-sleep himself, and so that old Sarah, who was very ailing, might find the fire lighted as usual.

He went through his self-imposed tasks as sturdily as ever. He smiled bitterly once or twice as he blacked his own and his brother's boots. "What would she say if she saw me do this?" he thought, with an odd mixture of pride and pain. "Fancy a beaver of wood and a drawer of water daring to love the mistress of Bryn!" He looked up and nodded to his brother as he came whistling through the courtyard with his arms full of faggots. The whistle was very sweet and shrill, but Garton's eyes had purple rings round them, and the dark face was as pale as a girl's.

"Good morning, Robert," he said, with an attempt at cheerfulness. "Sarah has the rheumatism very badly this morning; I hope you are not in a hurry for breakfast."

"Pretty fair; I suppose I shall catch the usual train," returned Robert, carelessly. "Sally would do very well if you did not spoil her so. I'll be bound you were up at six chopping that wood; and I don't think we, either of us, had too much sleep last night. I might have had a dozen men overhead, to judge by the tramping."

"Did I disturb you? I am sorry," answered Gar. "I always walk a mile or two if I am restless. If you are waiting for breakfast I may as well put on my coat, for I want to speak to you." He broke into whistling again as he followed his brother upstairs.

"What a fine fellow he is, after all," thought Robert. He was full of pity at the sight of the dark rings—Garton's pale face and puckered forehead haunted him through the day; once or twice he had twinges of remorse. How he had undervalued him! A hundred instances of the poor boy's goodness of heart rushed to his mind; he had nursed him in that long illness of his; and he remembered how Garton lay for hours parched with thirst rather than wake him, when he knew he was overtired; he had broken down under the strain of that watching, and then Garton had nursed him in his turn; he recalled Garton's clumsy attempts, his odd mistakes, the patient way in which he set himself to retrieve his queer blunders. Those strong brown hands had been as gentle as a woman's. It made Robert's heart very soft to remember these things; it struck him all at once how he would miss Garton, and how empty his daily life would be without him. He looked up when Garton's whistle ceased.

"Did you say you wanted to speak to me, Gar?"

"Yes, but begin your breakfast, please, or you will lose your train. Of course I want to speak to you. I did not waste much time in sleep last night, as it happens, so I went over everything in my own mind; and I want you to know that, as far as I am concerned, it is all settled."

"What is settled?"

"That I will go to New Zealand—Timbuctoo—wherever it is; and the sooner the better. I will go for my outfit to-morrow if you like."

"It won't be much of an outfit, I am afraid," returned Robert, ruefully, "but I have a few pounds at your disposal, to which you are heartily welcome. And you have really made up your mind, Gar?"

"Yes, Bob."

"My dear boy, you are doing very right, and I honor you for it, old fellow; you are just the sort of man to get on over there. I should not wonder if you come back with no end of money."

"I don't much think I shall come back, Robert."

"No, not for some years—eight or ten, perhaps. It's a bit of a wrench, Gar—I know that; but anything is better than this rusting life down here. It will make a man of you—it will, indeed."

A faint smile came to Garton's lips. Robert was kind, very kind; but how could he know—how could any one know—that death would rather have been preferable to him than this lifelong separation from those he loved? Come back! He would never come back. Reuben might come out to him by and by; but Blackscar, and Kirkby, and Bryn he should never see again! A profound sadness seized on the unfortunate young man as these thoughts occurred to him. Robert cleared his throat once or twice as he looked at him.

"You must not lose heart over it, Gar." "I don't see that it matters what I lose; it will be all the same a hundred years hence. I suppose you and Austin will write sometimes; I shall tell Miss Matrin"—a new, strange falter over the word—"to send Reuben out to me. I forget if you said it was to be New Zealand, Robert?"

"Well, Mathias has offered you a free passage there; so, unless you prefer Canada or Melbourne—"

"All places are the same to me," interrupted Garton, indifferently—"out of England, I mean. Oh, yes, of course, New Zealand will be the best. What made Mathias offer me a free passage, I wonder? Have I ever heard of him before? I forget all about it."

"I was of great service to Mathias once. It does not matter, so I need not refresh your memory," returned Robert, hurriedly. It was his way to ignore any good deed he had done. "A man is always grateful to the person who happens to help him, but few men make so much fuss over it. He heard me talking about this emigration business, and then he offered me that free passage for you."

"I thought you were too proud to accept such a favor, Robert?"

"One must swallow one's pride sometimes—I am learning that. And then I have done Mathias more than one good turn. It was a great many years ago, when we were young fellows. In short, he owes me money."

"Ah! that is a very different affair."

"Anyhow, it would not do to lose such a chance; and then Mathias has an influential friend or two over there, to whom he will give you letters of introduction. The whole thing speaks for itself—it does indeed."

"I am quite of your opinion, Robert, that it will be the best possible thing for me to do—under the circumstances, I mean."

"I am so glad you agree with me, Gar."

"Of course I felt you were right, Austin and you, from the first; but now it is doubly my duty. Whatever happens, remember you have nothing with which to reproach yourself."

"I hope not," returned Robert bewildered at the solemnity of this address. Garton's face was haggard with want of sleep, and his eyes were dim, with no lustre in them; and then there was that sternness of repressed feeling in his voice. Was he cruel in thus driving him away? But when he thought of the allotments of Bryn his heart hardened itself.

"There is nothing like putting a good face on a thing, Gar, and keeping up your courage," he began in a cheery tone; but Garton again solemnly interrupted him. "You will tell Austin what I say. I don't care to go into the matter again with you one—at least of all with him." And Garton's lip trembled as he thought how he had hoped to work under that kindly rule. "The decision was for me, and I have made it; and there is no one to blame, but only circumstances. As far as I am concerned, as I said before, I am ready to get my outfit to-morrow. Shall I go up with you to Thornborough-to-day and do it?"

"Gently, gently, my dear fellow; we have not spoken to Austin or Mathias. There is plenty of time, plenty. You need not get into a fever about it." He was more bewildered than ever by the young man's sternness and vehemence.

"Things have gone worse with him than I imagined," he said, as he put a stop to the conversation by rising from the table.

Garton eyed him wistfully as he went out. "I suppose he will miss me when he finds things are not quite so comfortable," said the poor boy sadly, as he took down his cassock from the peg.

Old Widow Larkins was cleaning the church when he went in. He nearly stumbled over her pail as he went swinging down the aisle. He had plenty of work to do there that day. There were a village wedding and two funerals, and later on a baptism. Some strangers to the place commented afterwards on the strange, dark young man who seemed to do everything for everybody. When the people had all gone away, he locked the door on the inside and went up and knelt down alone before the flower-decked altar. He was only a young man, very faulty and not over wise, not much more than the hewer of wood and the drawer of water to which he had likened himself. But, as he knelt there, Garton Ord prayed the noblest prayer but one that ever was prayed—"O Lord, I am oppressed, undertake for me!" And he prayed it thrice with a patient sigh, as though his heart were broken. Was his manhood less strong when he invoked another and a higher Strength? Surely such men as Garton Ord are the little ones of the Kingdom. (To be continued.)

THE QUIET CORNER.

BY THE BISHOP OF EASTON.

XIX.

In our thoughts, last week, of the dove returning to the ark, we were led to consider the numerous symbolic allusions to that gentle bird that are found in the Bible.

And to what does this symbolism point? Who is the Harmless One and the Pure, the Author of all innocence and purity? Who is it that dwelleth apart from noise and tumult, and seeks a home in the heart that has learned to be very still? Who is it that is frightened away by the violence of pride, and that is grieved by our obstinacy and reluctance, whose reproaches are heard in the inner chambers of the soul: "O my people, what have I done unto you? Wherein have I wearied you?"

Nay, who is it this that flieth very swiftly, viewless as the wind, and more rapid than the lightning? Who is that awful One, the flash and splendor of whose sevenfold gifts are like the rainbow that arches the eternal throne of God? It is the Spirit of God, who at our Lord's baptism descended like a dove and abode upon Him. It is the same Holy Ghost who moves upon the face of the waters, and whose chosen rest is in the Church of God.

It belongs to the necessary faith of a Christian man to affirm, I believe in the Holy Ghost. The Nicene Creed instructs us to add: "The Lord and Giver of life." In the economy of grace each person of the sacred Trinity hath His appropriate function. The Holy Ghost is the Life-Giver. As Pharaoh said unto Joseph, "I am Pharaoh, and without thee shall no man lift up his hand or his foot in all the land of Egypt," so also in the counsels of the ever-blessed Trinity is the Holy Ghost constituted the ministrant to men of life, and all that belongs thereto.

And what, we may well ask, is the limit to His beneficence? Is His mission of grace to the Church alone, and is the outside world destitute of His awakening and healing presence? No. He is abroad everywhere. The Holy Dove disdains not the expanse of weary waters and the devastation of the curse. With rapid flight He goes abroad, seeking if haply He may find emerging from the ruin some olive-leaf of peace, some token that man's heart yearns after reconciliation with his God.

Wherever there is life, even in its rudiment and germ, there we recognize the presence and the power of the Life-Giver. In the high aspirations of ancient philosophers, in the severe morality of some of those emperors who persecuted the early Church, in the nice sense of honor among men who are not devout towards God, and in their manly, chivalrous sympathy for the weak and for the wronged, in the very faith which had men keep, one with another, and in the maternal solicitude which lingers in a woman's heart where little else that is womanly remains, the Christian recognizes the fitting of God's Holy Dove. There is no human soul in which there doth not linger some trace of the image in which he was created; and the Life-Giver wearies not in His endeavor to restore each lineament of the divine likeness which is not utterly destroyed.

There is a disposition among men to antagonize what they call natural goodness and divine grace. We are pointed to a man who has eliminated all thought of God from his scheme of life—a prayerless man, a man who smiles pleasantly at the very name of religion, as if it were an exploded fable or an emotional superfluity. And yet, one says, who so generous and open-hearted to the suffering as he? Who so scornful of a lie? Who more genial and affectionate in his family?

To this the answer is very plain. Men alienated from God are not therefore God-forsaken. There are diversities of operation, but the same Spirit. Even where there is no yearning after better things, the Holy Ghost disdains not to keep alive the lesser qualities of goodness. The rain falleth everywhere, not only on the cultivated garden of the Lord, where the grapes may give out their pleasant smell, but on the bare rock also, promoting the growth of the lichen and the moss, which may, at least, cover its nakedness. Yes, such is the order of God's working, wherever anything, no matter how mean, can be made to grow, there is hope that, beneath the invincible patience of rain and sunshine, the soil will be deepened, and better seeds take root and grow.

Ignorance of this world-wide working of God's Holy Spirit has led Christian people to assume positions that are not tenable. Did you never know one actually to groan over the austere morality of a godless neighbor, and to intimate not obscurely that there would be more hope of him if his life were profligate? Depend upon it, a pure morality can never indispose the heart to the higher attainments of faith. The pride in one's moral excellence is indeed an almost insuperable bar to spiritual progress; but let us fault the pride, not the morality, for the one is man's enormous crime, the other is a testimony to the presence of a long-suffering Spirit, who, while often grieved, is slow to withdraw Himself and to leave the house desolate, while anything lingers there by which it may be recovered.

It is no part of our religion to deny the worth of anything good, however its goodness may be imperfect. We deny, indeed, the adequacy for the emergencies of life and duty, and for the scrutiny of the unerring judgment, of all spiritual energies which come not from the vital union of an explicit faith with the true Vine, which is Christ our Lord. But where, apart from the confession of Him, we recognize any nobleness of soul or the fragrance of domestic and social virtues, instead of seeking to trample on it as a plant which God hath not planted, we shall see in it a proof that the Lord is long-suffering to us ward, notwithstanding that any should perish, enriching, despite itself, the thankless soil. If so be that amid its wild grapes of a human goodness it may presently entertain the better seed of a holy vine.

ISRAEL IN EGYPT.

The Passover, and the Last Night in Bondage.

Exodus xii. 21-30.

Verse 21. "The elders of Israel." Moses, having received of the Lord the commandment concerning the Passover, calls for the elders, and communicates to them the directions they were to follow. "Draw out now." That means "withdraw"—that is, go to your several homes. "A lamb." That is a generic word, signifying either a lamb or a kid, a male of the first year, of the sheep or the goats. "According to your families." That is explained in verses third and fourth of this same chapter—viz., that there should be one for each household, or, if the household be too small, the same was to be done conjointly with another family of small size. The purpose was that the lamb should be wholly consumed. Hence the household could not be too large, since it was a sacrificial eating, but might be too small. "Kill the passover." That is, the Paschal lamb, the sacrifice especially known by that name.

Verse 22. "Hyssop." Not the plant now so called, but a species of thyme, the Arabian siter or ziter. "In the bason." When the lamb was killed, the blood was to be drawn off into a bason, so that none of it should remain in the carcass. "The lintel." The stone or beam forming the top of the doorway. Thus the blood dropped from above on the threshold and on the two side-posts traces the form of the cross—a sign which can hardly be called here accidental.

Verse 23. "The Lord will pass over." Of course, this does not mean that this sign was necessary to distinguish the homes of the Hebrews from those of the Egyptians, for the Lord's information, but that the sign of covenant might show the people's faith. "Suffer the destroyer." The angel of death, the agent of the Lord's work. The Lord would restrain him from entering the houses which were guarded by the mark of salvation. The sign thus becomes doubly significant.

Verse 24. "Ye shall observe this . . . forever." It is observed in the Christian Israel by that which He who instituted the Passover, Himself transferred it to—viz., the Eucharist of the Church. That is now the memorial sign of the Lord's death, as the Passover was the prophetic sign. The union of the two on the night of the betrayal shows that the one was to take the place of and continue the other. Hence the ordinance is kept.

Verse 25. "When ye be come to the land," etc. This seems to imply that the service was suspended in the desert wanderings, and began as a yearly observance after the entry into the land of Canaan. At that time the forty years were a provisional prospect merely. If Israel had been stout-hearted after the return of the spies, it would have gone at once into the possession of the promised land.

Verse 26. "What mean ye by this service?" The memorial intent of the Paschal Feast is thus provided for. It was expected to survive the personal memory of the events which it preceded. It was history linked with an institution.

Verse 27. Here was a brief sentence, which in a few words gave the meaning which was retained in the little word "Passover." The English version gives that sense very clearly. It was a passing over to destroy, and a passing over in another sense, which is of preservation. The English and the Hebrew thought are thus identical. The last clause is not part of the word of Moses, but declares the way in which the people received this communication. "Bowed the head," that is, prostrated themselves, and worshipped God, whose word they listened to.

Verse 28. The effect of the nine visitations thus far inflicted on Egypt had greatly stimulated the faith and obedience of the people, especially as these called for very little of endurance or trust on their part.

Verse 29. "All the first born." If the idea is a correct one that the first born of all families under the patriarchal dispensation was the family priest, and that the first born male of each animal fit for sacrifice was sacred to the Lord, then this becomes the excommunication of Egypt. Its priesthood and its offerings are alike cut off. It is rejected from the eldest covenant. This is also the sign perhaps, that the new covenant, by which one nation is taken out of the families of the earth to keep the Lord's name alive, and one family of that nation is to be the priestly family, has now begun.

Verse 30. This death of the first born was not a pestilence, since that could hardly be supposed to discriminate, but a special miraculous infliction of death. It took place at midnight, when the land was wrapped in deep sleep, thus making it more appalling.

"A great cry in Egypt." The effect of this visitation was to rouse every household. Probably the death seizure was not instantaneous, for then it might not have been perceived in many instances till the morning, but as still is the case, the roused watchers by the bed of the dying, sent up the shrill, piercing cry of distress which signalled the moment of death. This would also aid to spread the news of this final infliction and make it appalling as it was intended to be.

In earlier time I mark'd the manly mien
Of him whose voice and eye illum'd the page
Where Sacred Truth lay hid, and thought
No age
Could mar the beauty of the solemn scene.
Then, clad in white, he held with look of love
My latest born, and blessing with a kiss,
Received him in the Church of Christ—

O clear-eyed man of God! Not less sincere Saluted thou my daughter on that day,
And pointed where high duty led the way
Toward happiness, and heaven where dwells

THE FILIAL RELATION OF THE SOUL TO GOD.*

"And when they saw Him they were amazed; and His mother said unto Him, Son, why hast Thou thus dealt with us? behold, Thy father and I have sought Thee sorrowing. And He said unto them, How is it that ye sought Me? Wist ye not that I must be about My Father's business?"—ST. LUKE II. 48, 49.

You all know the circumstances. How the Child was taken to the temple for the feast, and how, when the company left to return home they left the Child behind, and after long search He was found in the Temple with the doctors, both hearing and asking their questions. What a revelation was the answer He made to His mother! Hitherto He had been her Son, and all had gone in ways she could understand; no wonder she was now astonished. It was a critical moment in her life. No wonder that though He was still subject to her she felt that the life of her Son was changed, and she kept all these things in her heart.

His mother shows the experiences of all human hearts. It is the common experience. Let us take some examples of it. The Virgin Mary is a perpetual type of the people who, invested with some sacred interest, identify themselves with it, and when it shapes its own methods and ways are filled with perplexity. They would keep all things under their own control, and so they ask of the objects for which they live, "Why hast thou thus dealt with us?" Mary had felt that Jesus was more her Son than God's Son, and there is a tendency among the most conscientious people to think the objects in which they are deeply interested are more their children than God's children. One set of people must find some assistance in the story of Jesus. The first is that which each father gets in his child. As the boy grows up it shows a sign of individual character and individual purpose. What he was and what he did was as a member of that little household; but now he develops individual energy and takes some action of his own. It is a critical time for child and father. The child is perplexed with the pleasure, almost pain, at the idea of doing some act conscientiously his own, and the father has some pleasure in seeing his boy doing something original, and something perhaps which he could not do himself. The real understanding of that moment rests on whether they can see the real truth that the child is not only the son of his father but the son of God. When that is so the child passes not into a looser but into a stronger responsibility, and the father is satisfied to see his child grow so because he cannot be jealous of God. It is a noble progress of life when the first venture of the young man on a career of his own is looked upon in that way. "Wist ye not that I must be about My Father's business?"

The mother was interested with the care of Him who was to be the Saviour of the world, and she accepts it entirely, and she is willing to work out the task, the supreme privilege which God has given her. The quality of her self-sacrifice shows its defect elsewhere. She is not able to see where the limit of her work comes and passes from under her hands, because He deals directly with His Father.

Another illustration is that of the champion of the faith. He undertakes the cause of the belief in Jesus Christ; it is a noble task for a man. It gives him sleepless nights and weary days, but to all of this he is perfectly equal. There comes a time when, as God is working for Himself, the truth begins to show a vitality which he has not counted upon and develops new associations. No wonder he is troubled. No wonder, unless he is a very thoughtful man, he cannot understand it. But if he be thoughtful, he will see that the truth is working for itself in a larger way than he could work for it. Another man champions the justice of God. He has been willing to stand for it anywhere. "The necessity of the punishment of wickedness," he says, "lies in the nature of God, and he has supported that doctrine in its simplest form, viz., the endless punishment of man." Suppose the day comes when that claims a more spiritual meaning, and means that the punishment of sin is bound up within itself, in its own degradation. No wonder he is almost dismayed, and feels that his faith is slipping away from him. He is bewildered as Mary was when Jesus began to show His individual ways and will. But the time came when she rejoiced at it. And so the believer and champion of faith becomes, if he be a really reverent man, to rejoice when his belief outgrows himself; when his belief is not the special form in which a dogma has been conceived, but the special thing to which knowledge must give more and more spiritual meaning. When he sees that what he has to guard over is Truth, not definitions—the truth seems to be slipping away from us in these tumultuous times—then the man says to the doctrine which he holds, "Why hast thou thus dealt with me?" Truth is God's child, and it must be what He wills and not what the believer will, and it is a blessed day when the believer accepts this, and looks what new forms God will give His faith from year to year, and into what new regions He will send it forth. There are men who try to reform the world, but they want to keep it in their own hand and never outgrow their control; others think the reform is outgrowing their strength, and that they can only give a helping touch here and there when it lies within their power. The first says how evil it is to be eradicated and good sustained; the second does not know anything except that all is under God, and under God he has the hope of assisting a little. The first is the reformer with a theory, and the second is the reformer with devotion. It will be seen what is to become of these two men. If humanity has a will of its own and leaps to some special judgment when we expected slower steps, the first is entirely lost, as he sees the reform which he thought could only come to pass in one way accomplished in another, leaving him behind. The devoted reformer is glad to see that God is far larger than he can comprehend, and only too pleased if he can lend his little skill in some corner working out to unknown results. There are people who are always uneasy unless things improve in their little way. There are people in church who begrudge work unless it is done in their own school. They have the care of some one of God's children, and they treat it as if it were their child only, and grumble if it is growing strong in ways they do not understand. A thoughtful man would see that if it grows God himself is holding it in the hollow of His awful hand, and helping it in ways that His servant cannot know. He sees it taken out of his hand, and yet works for it in the way that he can. You believe that your Church has a vast work to do in your own little country, but it is very near to the heart of God, and if we think that we cannot limit our sympathy to that one Church; if that Church has somewhat failed in its duty and another has stepped in, we shall have to rejoice even while we work, seeing that God has other ways of doing His work in which she does her part so feebly.

I believe this principle applies to every work which each of us does. The responsibility lies on you for some precious life. You don't seek it or go after it, but there is some one for whom, because there is no one else to help him, the responsibility has fallen upon you. The responsibility is no light one, as you know, and the story you have heard to-night can help you. Is this not the truth, that the child over whom you are watching is the son of God also? The beggar whom you are trying to reform, or the gambler you are trying to keep from the gaming-house, is not each of them the true son of God? At last it has entered into your souls that they are under God's care as truly as under your care, and is it not to be expected that He will develop them by ways of which you can never have dreamt? It is hopeless for any man to help another unless he is aware of that fact. Mary learned that His life was mysteriously greater than her own, and that God was over and behind her, caring for that life for which she had been caring. That made her service more faithful and more sacred. You, too, must learn this truth about the lines of any man you are trying to help, or you cannot help him as he needs. You must know the mystery of his life and his kinship with God. You have undertaken your task very flippantly. "I don't see who else can help him; I will patronize him; I see what can be made of him, and this is what he shall be." You take your scholar into your school, your friend into what you dare to call your friendship. How strange it will be when you discover that he is something more mysterious because of the mystery of the Son of God. We talk about the neglect of men for each other's lives, and hear them say, "Am I my brother's keeper?" Besides the pain of seeing how men disown the care of their fellows, there is something more painful—to see a man help another all wrong, with such ignorant hands that they lead them all wrong. Suspicion and jealousy of God make worse than worthless the sincere desire of a man to help his fellow-men. Blind leading the blind all over the world. What they want to say is that "There is a mystery about this man that I must understand; he is a child of God. You say, how can I feel it about this son, whom I want to keep out of the group-shod? Can I count his life mysterious, and count him a child of God?" Unless you can do so, you cannot help him with any true, deep help. The moment Moses said, "Shall I bring you water out of the rock?" his highest power was gone. The water that he gave them as though it were his own, and not God's, was an insult to him and to God, and from that day the ruin of that great leader had begun. If we ask what are the characteristics of any man who follows the principle I have laid down, they would be these: He will have the characteristics which we can believe to be in the treatment of the child Jesus, general inspiration rather than general detail; in making good the objects of the case, rather than in the special forms in which they shall grow. The advisers are best who give the ardent desire to act right always and help us through many blunders to find that end at last. The best you can do is to try to keep the man from doing wrong. This is better than the patronizing tone which is a check on a man's desire to be good. So you may help a stronger man than yourself; but when he is at liberty leave him to go, and be thankful if the power leading him is something truer and higher than your own. There are small men to whom this would be absolutely depressing. They do not want to do any work for God unless they take it in their own hands. To a larger man it is nobler to work for God and with God. Mary put all these things in her heart, and she learned that it was nobler to bring her boy to God, and take God for His Father than to keep Him for herself. So you will understand that the type of the truest relationship between God and man is not the spiritual directorship of spiritually governing yourself for another, but the frank friendship of generous men. We each rejoice to see the other in God. There is a deeper, closer care of every man for himself who is careful for his brother. A man cannot execute his responsibility aright unless in that for which he is responsible he sees something mysterious. How a man seems to separate his life and to stand in criticism of his own life! Know thyself, says the old proverb, as if the two spoken of were two persons. The mill of wisdom stands guard over the conscience of the man who has a reasonable capacity of self-care, and he blames and praises himself with a more even-handed justice than that with which he judges the lives of other men. There is something outside him with which all his fortunes are inextricably bound up. He lays his plans and says, "I will bring myself to the best in this way or that way," and he finds himself the subject of some other will and wisdom. His plans are overruled and interfered with. In the government of ourselves we sometimes forget that there is any other; but our plans are so altered that we cannot neglect the greater force. We meant to be that, and, lo! we are this; we thought we would be that, and we are this instead. We never meant to believe this, and now we hold it with all our heart. It is the everlasting discovery which every man makes, and with as much surprise as if no one had ever found it out before, that the will for which he is responsible is not only his own, but God's also. Yours, conditionally yours, but, behind and over yours, God's. That is the great revelation about life. When it comes everything about our self-culture is altered. It comes sometimes early, sometimes late in life. Sometimes it is the blush that flits youth with beauty, and sometimes it is the peace round old age which makes it happy. It is regeneration. It makes anything like a bewildering surprise impossible. "New plans supersede my plans, and any turn coming is acceptable to me, and I am not damaged by it. I feel a new conviction growing in my soul. I determined that as long as I lived I would believe something different from this which is taking possession of me. It seems as if my soul had turned back upon my teaching, and I say: 'My soul, why hast thou dealt thus with me?' and my soul answer: 'Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?'" That is the true meaning of the cases where men say: "I don't know however I believed this true; but the belief has come about and is precious to me in spite of myself." It was God claiming His own soul. Let a man but see this and he welcomes the conviction come to his soul more cordially than those he sought out with deliberate toil. He cannot be jealous of what God does for His own soul. He is like the servant taking care of a child, with the father behind making plans for the child with a wisdom which the servant rejoices to think is greater than his own. If our souls never disturbed the plans we have laid for them, if we never came to more truth than we are wise enough to see, how badly off we should be. What is the difference between the condition of a man who has accepted the revelation and one who has not? One is the condition of the man who believes in no government at all, and the other one who believes that God is governing his life. To each mystery is inevitable: to one the mystery of chance, to the other the rich, deep gracious mystery of loving care. To one the mystery of accident, to the other the mystery of the Prince of Life. When anything unexpected occurs one says, It is another accident, the other says, It is my Father. Between the two stand the man who has one self-made plan of living which he expects to see fulfilled. He is the man whose life is buffeted about with surprises. He is the man who sails on the ocean and refuses to believe in the tides. No wonder after a stormy voyage he drags a wrecked life on a beach where he never expected to be when he sailed. The wise man will have one great purpose in life; he will try to come into harmony with God, to come to a perfect understanding of Him, and his child with him. "Let me not try to make one thing of my soul while God is trying to make another. What does God want this soul of mine to be? Let me find out that so I can work with Him." It is only by finding Him out that you can find out what he wants you to be. Find Him out, and you will have from your own soul the expression of what He wants you to be. Love of God comes through faith in God, as shown to us through Jesus Christ. You let Christ bestow His blessings upon you, and through Christ you love God who manifested Himself, and by that means you understand Him in His infinite nature, and by that see what He wants you to become, and you thus become ready and willing to help Him out to do what He wants to do with your soul. The Son of Mary was a revelation to her mother nature in whose care He lived. So with man's soul; it is a perpetual revelation to the man who cares for that soul. If you can only know that your soul is God's child and that He is caring for you, it will become the source of mysterious communication. He will show His goodness not merely in heaven and earth, and the history behind you, but in the soul within; it is the lofty privilege of any man who is willing to know that the soul that lives within him, which he calls his soul, is the child of God. May He bring us all to that deep understanding of ourselves, so that we may understand Him, and through knowing Him who is our Father we may know what to do with these lives of ours.

OUR CONDITION AND OUR DUTIES.

BY THE BISHOP OF SPRINGFIELD.

We are comparatively few in number; we are weak in all the elements which constitute worldly power, and we are absolutely very poor, and, relatively, among the poorest, if not the very poorest, diocese in Christendom. These facts tell us in unmistakable language what are our paramount duties: as a little flock to be united, to be one mind and heart, as were the first Christians when they were very few. We cannot afford to risk our common safety by standing apart from our fellows, or breaking our ranks, or refusing to march on. We must hold together, we must trust our chief, and we must trust each other. The march, and the equipments, the plan of campaign, and the mode of battle may not be to our liking, but these matters are not our responsibility, and if in consequence, because we are not well pleased, we halt and refuse to go on and labor and fight, we are disloyal and heady and rebellious, and fall under the severe rebuke which our Lord addressed to St. Peter, when he sought to intrude into another man's affairs. Jesus said to him: "What is that to thee? Follow thou Me." This sharp, clear, ringing injunction of our Saviour is translated in the Catechism into the sentence which concludes the summary of our duty as prescribed by Almighty God to our neighbor. These are the words: I am commanded "to do my duty in that state of life into which it shall please God to call me." Let us never forget the pronouns; they are tremendously, I may say, in view of the common behavior of even professional Christians, terrifically, emphatic: "What is that to thee? Follow thou Me." "To do my duty," aye, mine, and nobody else's. To attempt to do anybody else's duty is to attempt the impossible; we can never accomplish it, and, alas! while we are thus interfering with other people's affairs we must be neglecting our own, and we need all our time, every moment of it, imperfectly, at the best, to perform our own tasks which our Heavenly Father has set us to do, since we are plainly told by Him, who will be our Judge in the day of dread account, that when we have done all that we can do we shall still prove unprofitable servants. What a world this would be if everybody in it were to mind his own business and devote all his energies of mind, soul, and body to the one supreme aim of doing his duty in that state of life to which it had pleased God to call him. Let others do as they may, it is our duty, our wisdom, and it ought to be our joy, to stand in our ranks, each in his place, and present a united front to the foe, and work with a right good will while we are permitted to work, remembering that for us the night will soon come when no man can work. This, then, is our first duty as a little flock: to sympathize, to act together, and to be so thoroughly one in our sovereign aim and purpose to build up the kingdom of God in our own hearts, and to promote its extension among others, that we lay aside and put out of sight all inferior and minor considerations, and labor as men animated by one great resolve which they mean to accomplish, cost what it may. So far as your leader is concerned, let me say that in this regard he does not hesitate to put himself upon record as ready and willing to allow the largest liberty as to details compatible with loyalty to our blessed Lord, and obedience, not to the mere letter of the canons of the digest and rubrics of the Prayer Book, since these are often confessedly inconsistent, but to the fundamental principles of the polity, doctrine, and discipline of the Church of God. Within these limits he can work with any man, and so long as he is satisfied that he is sincere and earnest and full of the Spirit of the Lord he can take him to his heart and give him his warmest sympathy and love.

We see our duty, then, as a little flock, to be united, to work together and help each other, and our responsibility is proportionately increased with our paucity of numbers. The units are magnified when the aggregate is small. An immense army can bear depletion and not feel the loss; but the Spartan band cannot spare a soldier from its muster roll. Each one must be a host in himself.

To our paucity of numbers we must add, as suggesting our line of duty, our weakness in all the elements which constitute in the eyes of the world solidity and strength. We have no material fabrics, no massive churches, no ancient colleges, no endowed schools, no domains of land, no institutions, no endowments, no great cities with their wealth and influence. Back of our beating hearts, and bosoms heaving with the breath of life, we have nothing to lean upon which this world can supply. Can anything be plainer? We must fall back upon God. We must look away from ourselves and earth's resources up to Him. "Man's extremity is God's opportunity" is the experience of all ages summed up in a single sentence. "God's opportunity" must be improved, else it passes and all is lost through apathy or cowardice. When this opportunity was vouchsafed a former and distant generation, most conspicuously God accompanied it with His command, and His behest was meant as a message direct and personal wherever and whenever men are placed in like circumstances, apparently helpless, with fierce and powerful foes behind them and, humanly speaking, insuperable difficulties and perplexities before them. God displays the facts and paints them upon the canvas of history for our instruction and admonition. In a moonlight night an unarmed multitude, made up of men, women, and children, heavily burdened with apparel and food necessary for those who are fleeing in haste, are gathered, crowded together on the shore of the sea. Behind them, and pressing down upon them as they stand there not knowing what to do, are their foes, their tyrants, and taskmasters, bristling with armor, and amply provided with chariots and all the material of war; before them is the waste of waters stretching as far as the eye can see. There is no resource; four hundred years of slavery have broken their spirit, and educated them to tremble and bend their backs to the burden and submit. What shall they do? Their leader urged the inquiry and God answered, and this answer seems to imply rebuke that in a case so plain, after all that He had done for them, they should hesitate and ask for direction. And God said, "Why criest thou unto Me? Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward." They obeyed, and the difficulties and perplexities before them parted right and left, and let them pass through safely, and their foes behind them disappeared forever, buried beneath the very waves which recently seemed so relentlessly to bar their escape from capture, slavery, and death. "Go forward" is the ringing word of command which comes from on high. It embodies the great fundamental principle of God's kingdom, growth, progress, advancement. "He that putteth his hand to the plough and looketh back is not fit for the kingdom of God," says our Lord. And again and again He says to one and another, whom He deigns to call, from St. Andrew in the beginning of His ministry, to St. Peter at its close, "Follow Me," "Follow thou Me." The military language of earth echoes in its notes of drill the divine command, "Eyes right, front face, forward, march." For God's militant host there are no further orders, no flank movements, no wheeling about, no throwing away arms and fleeing. For them, the Christian soldiers, the behest is ever the same—one unvarying note, provided the soldiers are worthy, obedient, brave. Had the children of Israel continued as they began, they would have gone onward conquering and to conquer. It was only when God was not well pleased with them that He ceased to lead them forward, and suffered them to turn aside and pursue a aimless, zigzag course until they were consumed in the wilderness. Bereft of earthly resources, but with hearty loyal and true and spirits strong in faith, the path of duty is plain: "Go forward." It matters not that Pharaoh and his horses and chariots are behind, and the sea is before, and we are hemmed in, forward is the path of duty, right down into the cold waves, right onward into the great depths. Do you suppose such an object lesson has been held up by the hand of God before the ages without a purpose? Do you suppose such a great principle, so thrillingly illustrated, was exhausted in its application to the Israelitish host? Do you suppose that God does not govern His kingdom by the same laws from generation to generation? Well, then, when we come to know—perhaps it is a surprise—still, when we come to know that we have no earthly supports to lean upon, no arms of flesh to hold us up, shall we sink down in despair? Rather shall we not count the exigency "God's opportunity," and, throwing ourselves upon Him for help, go right forward? Believe me, this is the path of duty, dear brethren. Your bishop did not seek the place he occupies; rather he shrank from it. You called him to it and bade him take it, and repeated your call. Nearly seven years of labor in the immense domain placed under our jurisdiction and care reveals the spiritual sterility of the soil, and discloses the difficulties and perplexities with which its cultivation is beset, and now I come to you, fresh from this accumulated experience, and, as we halt here for a space at our annual synod, I tell you that the result of my observation confirms me more and more every day that God has honored us with the great privilege, as a diocese, of coming into that condition of human extremity which He will make, is making, His opportunity, and He says to me, as He did aforetime to Moses: "Speak unto My people, that they go forward." Are you not ready and willing to obey? Be sure your leader will never go back. He will go forward and onward while health and strength permit, until he is satisfied beyond peradventure that another could, and probably would, occupy the ground a hundredfold better, and then he will relinquish the pastoral staff and take up the humbler shepherd's crook in the care of a few sheep in some mission or parish which will accept his services and bear with his infirmities. Meanwhile he holds aloft the pastoral staff of office over our sea of difficulties and perplexities, and bids you, as the call of duty and the command of God, "go forward."

But not only are we a little flock, and with no prestige of name and establishment and traditions of an historic past, but we are, in addition, poor, very poor. In the light of this fact, our duty, as prescribed by God and repeated again and again under the law and the prophets and the Gospel, is seen written in letters of fire: "Honor God with your first fruits," "Never appear before God empty," "Give the tithe of thy substance to God." Were we the members of a diocese splendidly endowed, and with material wealth abounding on every hand, God's command to give, to pay to Him our interest on His loan to us, and offer to Him our first fruits, might fade out and be lost to eye and ear, amid the superfluity of luxury and the waste of indulgence; but now stern want, sharp penury, and sometimes even severe distress, translate these precepts into language whose meaning is unmistakable, and whose application we cannot evade or escape. God's claim upon our first fruits and a certain proportion of our increase—we think a tenth—is universal, whether we be rich or poor, or live in a diocese endowed with wealth or in one that has nothing. The principle, namely, to pay our honest debts, binds us as upright men in all cases alike, only the path of duty may not seem so clearly defined nor the claim so peremptory when the recipients of our bounty are far removed—those whom we have never seen and shall probably never see. Such, dear brethren, is not our trial. The diocese appeals to you in every interest for your tithe, your first fruits, your offerings; our missions, our schools, our clergy, our orphanage, our funds for necessary purposes, for diocesan support, for theological education, for aggressive work, for the aged and infirm clergy, all cry aloud to you for sustentation and support.

Our work in this diocese ought to be largely aggressive. In more than one-half of our counties we have no mission, no services, no clergyman; in ten or a dozen others our presence is merely nominal; in all our labors are only begun. The demand for means, therefore, is imperative, and we cannot with a clear conscience set it aside and decline to respond. The desolate counties, the languishing missions, the sadly pinched clergy advertise you of your duty and make it perfectly clear and plain.—Synodal Address.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

SUSIE'S WATCHWORD.

BY MESSIE E. KENNEY.

It was a hot Sunday afternoon in July. The sun's rays poured down fiercely, and not a breath of air was stirring to relieve the oppressive heat.

The last bell was ringing for Sunday-school as a throng of poorly-clad children with their pinched faces streamed through the open doors of a mission chapel and gathered about their teachers.

Poor little waifs they were, whose faces had lost all the freshness and bloom of childhood, and were sharp-featured and prematurely old with their hard life of want and poverty. They hastened in through the open door, crowding and jostling against each other in their haste, lest the tap of the superintendent's bell should warn them that they were to be placed on the tardy list.

The hymns rose sweet and clear for a time and then there was a hum of many voices engaged in reciting the lessons for the day, until you might fancy that the school-room was a busy bee-hive swarming with its little workers.

When the lessons had all been recited the superintendent tapped the bell as a signal for silence and rose to make an announcement with such a look of pleasure on his kind face that the children felt instinctively he was about to tell them something that would make them happy, and visions of a possible excursion filled their minds, as they saw he held some little blue tickets in his hand.

"I have some good news for you," he began, smiling at the eager expectant faces turned toward him. "A gentleman has sent some tickets to be given out to the scholars in this school, not enough for every one I am sorry to say, but enough for at least one in every class to have one. These tickets entitle the holder to a week in the country at a farm-house, and I am sure it will be a week of great pleasure to you. I will distribute these tickets among the teachers and they can use their discretion in giving them out."

The children sat still, breathless with expectancy as the superintendent placed in the teacher's hands the little slips of blue card board that meant so much happiness to the child who would be fortunate enough to possess one.

It was hard work for the teachers to decide who should have the ticket when the pinched, wan faces of all the children made such a pitiful appeal for the pure fresh air of the country, and there must of necessity be many disappointed ones, since the tickets were so few in number.

Miss Harris glanced around her class several times before she asked,

"Well, children, who do you think needs this ticket most? There are eight of you, and only this one ticket, so I will let you decide yourselves, if you can, who shall have it."

There was silence for a moment. Each child wanted the ticket, but no one liked to be selfish enough to lay claim to it for themselves, and yet it was hard to speak of giving it to another.

A week in the country meant so much of happiness to these girls, many of whom had never seen anything else than narrow streets and long rows of swarming tenement-houses in all their short lives.

Presently one of the girls answered rather shyly:

"We all want it ourselves pretty bad, I guess, Miss Harris, but as long as we can't all have it, I guess you had better give it to Susie West. She needs it the most."

All the rest of the class agreed with the speaker as they looked at the hollow cheeks and dark ringed eyes of a little girl who had just recovered from a long illness that had left her weak and feeble.

"Yes let Susie have it," assented the children, and the little face grew radiant with delight as Miss Harris placed the ticket in Susie's hand.

"Oh, what a splendid time I will have," she exclaimed joyfully.

"Thank you ever so much girls. I wish you were all coming too."

"Perhaps some time there will be some more tickets and then the rest will have a chance to go," answered Miss Harris, smiling at the sight of her happiness.

Just the anticipation of so much pleasure brought a flush to her cheek, and she could scarcely wait until school closed, she was so impatient to hasten home and tell her mother of the good news.

"Was you ever in the country, Susie?" asked one of the girls as they went down the aisle together, Susie clasping her ticket as tightly as if she feared it might slip away from her if she were not careful, and deprive her of her anticipated pleasure after all.

"No, I never was you?" asked Susie.

"Yes, I went once on an excursion steamer and spent the day there, and it was just grand I tell you. Why, it was just like the Park everywhere, only ever so much prettier, and it was so nice and cool. I didn't never want to come back again. You was lucky to get that ticket, for you can stay a whole week—just think of that!"

"Won't it be nice!" returned Susie, her eyes bright at the thought. "I'm not to go till next Wednesday, and I don't see how I can ever wait so long. I wish it was to-morrow. I must run in here and tell Janey the good news.

Good-bye," and she ran lightly up the steep, rickety stairs and along the narrow, dark halls, until she reached the topmost floor of the tall tenement-house.

She tapped at a door, and scarcely waiting for the faint "Come in" which answered her knock, she burst into the room, her face flushed with excitement and pleasure.

In one corner of the room, on a low bed, lay a girl somewhat older than Susie, but even thinner and paler. She looked up with a smile of welcome as her visitor entered.

"I was hoping you would stop in on your way from Sunday-school and stay with me a little while," she said. "Aunt's been out ever since dinner-time, and I am so lonely."

"Won't I have a splendid time? It don't seem real, somehow. I feel as if I was asleep, and it was just a beautiful dream, and I would wake up pretty soon and find the ticket gone. Won't it be too lovely?"

"To wake up and find the ticket gone?" asked Janey, with a smile.

"Of course I don't mean that!" exclaimed Susie, clasping her ticket tighter.

"I mean, to go to the real country. I never was there, you know, but one of the girls in our class says it is awful nice."

"You'll have a good time, for certain," said Janey, looking wistfully at the little slip of card-board which opened up such a vista of pleasure.

"I wish I could go too."

"I wish you were going," said Susie, stroking caressingly the thin hand that lay on the counterpane. "Maybe it would make you well again if you could go and stay a little while. I would go and ask the teacher for a ticket for you, but I know she hasn't a single one more, for there was only one for all our class, and she gave it to me.

I think the girls were so good. She left it to them to choose who it should be given to, and they chose me."

"You must run about and get strong and well while you are away," said Janey; "and be sure and remember all the good times you have, so you can tell me about them when you get back."

"All right; I'll tell you all about everything," promised Susie. "I must run home now, for mother will be wait-

"CAN YOU DIRECT ME TO MRS. WEST'S ROOMS?"

"Guess what that is!" exclaimed Susie, sitting down on the edge of the bed and holding up the little blue ticket for inspection.

"I can't guess what it is," answered Janey. "I can see that it is a ticket for something, but I don't know what."

"It means that I'm to have a whole lovely week in the country—in the real country!" exclaimed Susie, rapturously.

ing for me. Good-bye, Janey, dear. I will come and say good bye before I go."

"Good-bye," answered Janey, returning Susie's smile, but as soon as the door was closed she buried her face in the pillow to hide the tears that would come. If she could only go, too? How inexpressibly grateful would be a breath of fresh, sweet, country air, after this suffocating heat! And she fancied that just a glimpse of green fields and waving trees would make her well again.

At the foot of the stairs Susie encountered Janey's aunt, who was just returning from a visit to a neighbor's.

"Have you been up to see Janey?" she asked.

Susie nodded, and then, too happy to keep her joy to herself, showed her ticket and told of the week in the country that she was to enjoy.

"Wish Janey could happen on such good luck as that," answered the aunt. "The doctor was saying yesterday she wouldn't never get well again as long as she was shut up in that hot room, with the steam from the tubs every day I wash. He told me to take her up to the Park two or three times a week; but I can't be bothered doing that, for I'd lose all my customers if I kept them waiting for their clean clothes while I was taking her up there.

"Poor Janey," thought Susie, as she hastened along homeward. "Her aunt don't seem to care a bit whether she gets well or not. She might take her up to the Park if the doctor said so. I do wish I could get her another ticket, so she could go to the country with me."

Just then a thought came into her mind, not a pleasant one either, and she tried hard to put it away from her without paying any attention to it.

But it kept returning to her again and again, notwithstanding her efforts to forget it, and she walked along very slowly, trying to put it out of her mind altogether.

"Why not give Janey this ticket, and let her go in your place? She needs the change more than you do, and you have a loving mother to take care of you when you are sick, and she has not."

This was the unwelcome thought that would not be banished.

"Oh, I couldn't! How could I possibly give Janey this ticket? I want to go so much, and perhaps this will be my only chance. She wouldn't let me give it up to her, I know, even if I was willing to."

The more she thought about it for some time, the more she felt quite sure that she could never, never give up this great pleasure, even for poor little Janey's sake. She loved her little sick friend very much, and pitied her with all her heart, but she could not bring herself to give up so much for her.

Yet the aunt had said that Janey would never get well again shut up in that hot little room. Perhaps just this one week would give her health and strength again, if Susie would only let her go to the country in her place. The little girl had a hard struggle between her inclination and her desire to do right. She was a little girl, only ten years old, though so small and thin that she might have passed for only six or seven, and this visit to the country seemed a well-nigh impossible thing for her to give up. She had passed all her life in this narrow, dirty street, lined with tall tenement-houses, between whose roofs there was only a narrow line of blue sky visible, and two or three visits to the Park had given her the only idea she had of grass or trees. Very few pleasures came into her life, and to voluntarily give up such a great one as this would have been hard to many a one older than Susie.

Only a few weeks before she had waited after Sunday-school to have a little quiet talk with her teacher, and from that day she had chosen as a watchword, "Even Christ pleased not Himself."

She was trying to follow in the steps of her blessed Saviour, and when she remembered His life of self-denial and unselfishness, it was easier for her to be gentle and loving with her companions, and self-sacrificing when it seemed right for her to prefer another's pleasure before her own.

Hitherto all the victories she had won over herself had been little ones, but they had given her strength to withstand greater temptations when the time of trial came.

But could she make this great sacrifice?

"Even so, Christ pleased not Himself," she repeated, softly, and she knew that if she gave up this pleasure she would be following His great example.

A swift little prayer went up from her heart:

"Oh, God, please help me to do right. Help me to give this ticket to poor Janey, for Jesus' sake. Amen."

And the answer came even while she was praying. She resolved to give her poor little friend the ticket which would bring back life and health, and though tears of bitter disappointment would fill her eyes, and threaten to overflow, yet her heart was light with the consciousness that she was doing right.

She turned back, determining to take Janey the ticket at once and make her happy. She had almost reached the house when it occurred to her that she ought to ask her teacher's permission first, that perhaps she had no right to give it away.

It seemed a long walk to her teacher's home, for she was still weak from her illness, and the walk she had already had and her excitement had exhausted all her strength.

"Well, dear, what is it?" asked Miss Harris kindly, as she saw Susie toiling up the steps, and opened the door to welcome her.

"Comin, and sit down. Why, how tired you look," she added, as she saw how pale and weary the child was.

"Miss Harris, can anybody else go to the country on this ticket?" asked Susie, sinking luxuriously into the soft depths of the easy-chair in which her teacher placed her.

"No, dear, it is only good for one child," answered Miss Harris, not understanding Susie's question.

"I mean can I give it to anybody else, and let them go in my place," explained the little girl.

"Oh, yes, you can do that if you want to," answered Miss Harris; "but, Susie, I thought you were so delighted at the idea of going. What has happened to change your mind? Don't you want to go?"

"I want to go just as much as ever," answered Susie, "but there is a little girl I know who is real sick, and the doctor says she won't get well if she don't get fresh air, and her aunt won't take her to the Park, 'cause she says she can't leave her washing, and I think she needs to go more than me, so if you will let me I will give her my ticket and let her go in my place."

"But isn't it very hard to give it up?" asked Miss Harris, and she read her answer in the tear-stained face.

"Yes'm, it's awful hard not to go, for you know I've never been to the country, and I did want to go so, but I think I ought to give up and let her go. You know my text is 'Even Christ pleased not Himself,' and so I mustn't always do what I want to."

"I am sure you will be far happier for giving up this pleasure," answered Miss Harris, kissing the quivering lips and pushing back the tangled curls with a gentle touch. "You will make your little sick friend very happy, and I know that will give you pleasure, and besides that, dear Susie, you have pleased the dear Saviour, by following in His footsteps, and making this sacrifice for His dear sake. Perhaps this will only be a pleasure deferred, not given up entirely, for it may be that more tickets will be sent to the school, and you may have another given you. Are you rested?" she asked, as Susie rose to go.

"I am some tired," answered Susie, but I must go home for mother will be worrying about me, she won't know what has kept me so long. Good bye."

Miss Harris stood in the window, looking after the little girl, as she went slowly down the street.

Presently her brother joined her, and she told him of the child's noble self-sacrifice.

"She is a brave little thing," he said approvingly, as Susie turned the corner of the street and was lost to sight. "It's a pity you can't get another ticket, so she can go too. She looked as if she needed it badly enough too."

"Yes, she is just getting over a long illness," answered Miss Harris, "and she needs a little country air and good food to build her up again. I must see if it can't be arranged in some way. Her mother is not a strong woman, and she has all she can do to earn enough for them barely to live upon. She is a good conscientious woman and has brought Susie up well, in spite of her miserable surroundings."

"I have an idea!" exclaimed Dr. Harris presently, "and I will leave it to you to decide whether it is a good one or not. You know I have been looking for a woman to keep my office in order and attend to the door when I am out. How do you think this child's mother would like to undertake it! She would earn enough to keep them comfortably, and in the suburbs of the city the air is as pure as that of the country itself. If you approve of the plan you might suggest it to them to-morrow."

"I can just fancy the poor woman's delight at the prospect," answered his sister. "I know she will be overjoyed at the idea."

In the meantime Susie on her homeward way stopped a moment to leave the ticket with Janey.

"I have a ticket for you to go to the country," she said, gently rousing her from the light dose into which she had fallen.

Janey opened her eyes to their widest extent, and stared incredulously at her little friend. It was her turn now to think that she was dreaming.

"Aren't you glad? Here it is," said Susie, putting it in her hand.

As soon as Janey really understood that she was not dreaming, but that she was really going to the country that she had so longed for, her delight knew no bounds. It was some minutes before she discovered that Susie had given her her own ticket. At first she refused positively to take it, but Susie insisted so earnestly upon it that she was forced to yield. Her joy and gratitude almost repaid Susie for her sacrifice.

Her mother was watching anxiously for her return, wondering not a little at her long absence. When she heard Susie's story she was tempted to wish that the child had kept the ticket instead of giving it away, for she thought that no one could need it more than herself, but she did not say this—only commended her for her generosity.

When Susie went to bed that night her dreams were brightened by a remembrance of poor Janey's pleasure, even though her pillow was wet with tears of disappointment.

The next day Susie went down stairs to visit an old woman who kept a little store in the cellar, and perched on the counter, her favorite seat, took out her book to study her Sunday-school lesson, while she "minded store" for the old woman, who had gone to a neighbor's on an errand.

Presently a firm step came down the stairs, and Susie looked up from her book as a stranger entered.

"Can you direct me to Mrs. West's rooms," he inquired.

"Yes, sir; she's my mother," answered Susie. "But, please sir, could you wait a minute. I promised to mind the store till Mrs. Carr came back, and I musn't leave it. I think she'll be back directly."

Even as she spoke Mrs. Carr came in, and Susie, free from her charge, led the way up stairs, and ushered the visitor into the room where her mother was steaming busily away upon the endless seams which Susie often thought would never be finished.

The gentleman seated himself, and stated the errand upon which he had come. You can, imagine, perhaps, how happy Susie was when she learned that she was to go to the country, or at least a place that was almost like the country, not for a week only, but to live there.

Her mother was no less happy, though her joy was more quietly expressed, and her eyes filled with tears of gratitude as she looked at her little girl, and thought how soon the fresh air would bring roundness and color to her cheeks.

As soon as she could pack up and get ready to leave the city they were to start for their new home. It did not take very long to do this, and so it happened that on the day that Janey started for her visit, Susie and her mother left the hot city, too.

"Mother, I'm so glad I gave Janey my ticket," said Susie, as the cars started, and she began to realize that she was really on her way to her new home. "I didn't know everything was going to happen this way, though, when I gave it to her."

In a very few months you would scarcely have known the active, rosy-cheeked child, who was a real little Susie today lassie, to be the same little Susie that got off the cars that bright morning.

At the foot of her little white bed hangs an illuminated text, upon which her eyes rest the last thing at night and the first in the morning. It is the text which is still her watchword: "Even Christ pleased not Himself."

ART.

In the rapid survey of the Music Teachers' Convention, much of the concluding matter was necessarily slurred over or left without mention. Mr. John H. Cornell's paper for Thursday afternoon on "What is Church Music?" for its text, proved certainly to the religious public the most interesting literary production of the series, and its significance demands a more deliberate consideration, possibly, than this column can provide. It is enough here to leave on record that the learned writer accepted his thesis in an interrogative form, and in its development reached no positive conclusions.

Mr. Carlyle Petersilea gave the Friday morning piano recital. The opening number was the Bach-Liszt Prelude and Fugue in A Minor, which Mr. Liebling of Chicago had presented on the previous morning. It must be conceded that the second interpretation, while not wanting in the positiveness and arithmetical precision of the fugue player, developed new grace and structural beauty under the eloquent touch of Mr. Petersilea, whose secret partly lies in the recognition of both piano and forte, while at the keyboard, securing thereby a restful and refreshing tonal chiroscuro which the literalist and unimaginative miss. Such fugue playing is at the same time instructive and enjoyable. The same union of vigor and refinement was noticeable, especially, in the Introduction Theme and Variations, Handel-Reinecke, in which the courtly Handelian motives were half smothered in the exuberant and brilliant gossamer-like arabesques of Reinecke. The succeeding Etude, C Major (staccato) of Rubinstein, which makes such prodigious demands upon the endurance and technique of the performer, gave sufficient illustration of Mr. Petersilea's rare breadth of culture and exceptional resources as an interpreter of widely contrasted schools of composition.

The bouquet of pretty trifles which made up his second number, was a very graceful tribute of professional courtesy to the five contemporary composers of Boston and elsewhere, showing more of the player's amiability than of originality and staying power in the graceful works presented.

Mr. J. A. Metcalf, baritone of Zion church choir, delivered with fine poetical expression three well-contrasted songs—"Two Grenadiers," Schumann; "Ah, 'tis a Dream," by Lassen—something, by the way, exceptionally touching and refined in treatment—and "My Love is like a red, red Rose," by F. Braehle. The audience seemed captured by a delightful surprise, and Mr. Metcalf's sympathetic voice and thorough method were enthusiastically recognized.

The playing of Miss Bloomfield, Friday evening, of Rubinstein's heroic "Concerto," left the impression that in all the requirements of this exacting school of composition she remains at present unrivalled. She grasps and retains the score securely and intelligently, never fails in rhythmic and tonal illustration, unites with unexampled swiftness perfect articulation, accuracy, marvellous delicacy, breadth, and sustained energy, keeping and enthusing her audience with steady magnetism and uninterrupted self-possession.

Our native compositions for the orchestra, chorus, and chamber music as yet develop little that is distinctive or characteristic. Mr. Bristow's "Columba" was written long ago, is conventional, stately, and without either inspiration or intelligent orchestration. Mr. Gleason's "Montezuma" overture was surely a misnomer, his work being nothing better than a wearisome echo of Wagner, with its tedious and interminable sequence of modulations, promising nothing and ending nowhere. Mr. Lavalle's "Offertory" orchestra and chorus, was delivered under much disadvantage, was striking, dramatic, and devout in places, without dulness or commonplace, but falls far below the range of the great motets, as of Mendelssohn, Gounod, and others.

The Churchman.

SATURDAY, JULY 25, 1885.

THE summer vacation is a luxury and often a necessity to pastor and people. They come back refreshed in body and mind, and resume work with increased energy and zeal, so that really nothing is lost. But while it is a vacation from labor, it is not a vacation of responsibility. It is sometimes said of men going South or West, that they leave their consciences behind them off Cape Hatteras or in the great lakes. They are among strangers, the restraints of home and society are relaxed. They forget what manner of men they were, and their standard of conduct varies with their clime. Is it not the same sometimes with Churchmen? While they enjoy themselves, as is right, by the sounding sea or in some rural retreat, do they not sometimes forget that rest from labor is not rest from worship? It is Lord's day in the country as in the town, and the rural sanctuary should never want for worshippers. Spiritual and moral obligations do not depend upon location or heat or cold. Churchmen must be Christians at all times and everywhere.

In nine cases out of ten, perhaps, the trouble with the Indians grows out of the encroachment upon their lands by white people. As a rule, the Indians are far more peaceful and law-abiding than white men would be in their circumstances. It is not they who stir up quarrels, but the lawlessness and greed of these white land-grabbers. The latest instance of this is seen in the Utes of Colorado, as shown by the letter of General McCook to Secretary Lamar. Rich and powerful companies are raising cattle upon the Utes' reservation, making a claim of ownership. Because the Indians resent this trespassing on their territory they are supposed to deserve summary shooting at the hands of the white, and in this case mostly foreign, invaders, who care everything for the land and cattle and nothing for the Indians. It is high time that this wretched business be put an end to. It has been repeated so often as to leave it not so much as a show of justice. If the Indians have more land than they require it should be sold to the government at a fair valuation. They would then get the benefit of a property which, as the case stands, goes neither to them nor to the government, but to parties who have little interest in either. The lesson from all this is that the Indian reservation business should be done away with altogether, as fast as practicable, thus leaving no further opportunity for reckless land-grabbers and speculators to appropriate millions of acres by wholesale, without either any return of money or expressions of gratitude.

MEN are sometimes disposed to complain of the frequent appeals that are made to them for contributions for religious and charitable uses, but they forget that it is the necessary consequence of their infraction of the divine law. "Upon the first day of the week," says the apostle, "let every one of you lay by him in store as God hath prospered him," and they are to do this in order that there might not be any gatherings when the apostle come. It was a universal law for rich and poor alike—"let every one of you." The time for obedience was set, "the first day of the week;" the measure, "as God hath prospered him," and the object, "the collection for the saints." Men are stewards. A portion of their treasure is for their own wise use, a portion belongs to God. These two portions they are on the first day of the week to separate and to bring God's part into God's house. When this law is observed, and men give by method and rule instead of by impulse, there will be no need of "gatherings." The treasury of the Church would be overflowing full if men would but give God of His own. Very pregnant words are those of the prophet: "Will a man rob God? Yet ye have robbed me. Wherein have ye robbed Thee? In tithes and offerings."

COMMON EDUCATION.

It is not so well comprehended as it should be that with all its boasted free schools, several of the countries of Europe are rapidly getting ahead of America in the matter of popular education. This is to be accounted for partly on the ground of compulsory attendance at school, and partly from the fact that the studies are more practical. In England, Germany, Belgium and Switzerland, education is coming to mean a way of getting a livelihood.

But this with the great body of the people means something vastly different from knowledge for its own sake. With them getting a living does not follow at all from knowing how to read, write and cipher. It is now putting 1,118,000 of their children in mills and factories, when they ought to be at school. But this, so far as these children are concerned, is the end of their education. They are in no condition to study after ten or twelve hours of exhaustive toil, as in a few years they will be in no condition to work.

Education must become far more than it has yet done in this country, an instrument of honest and intelligent and skillful living. It must be concerned in the use of tools, as well as in adding up of figures and parsing of sentences. It must be acquired at a certain age, and no immediate pecuniary needs be allowed to interfere with it. It must be looked upon as a child's working capital, to deprive him of which is sinful in the parent and perhaps ruinous to the child.

THE INTELLECT AND THE HEART.

A great if not the fatal defect of the popular educational system is the entire absence of the spiritual element. It cares for man's intellect and ignores the heart. If the nature is evil, born in sin, education adds to its power and capacity to do wrong, but does not give a corresponding power of wise restraint. There is no moral force in the intellect aside from the heart and conscience; the great spirit of evil is an embodiment of pure intelligence without grace. In the popular sense Americans are an educated people, perhaps in the elementary rudiments there are none more so, and yet what means the widespread corruption of public and private life—what the growing complaint that so many schools are no longer safe places for children; that with the alphabet of learning they draw in corruption and death. Society reaps what it sows, and the religion that is expelled from the schools is parting from the family as well. In the prisons one beholds shrewdness, cunning, invention, many of the highest qualities of the mind in company with the worst vices of the heart. The godless penman forges a draft. The skilled accountant embezzles funds, and covers up all traces of his crime for months, perhaps for years. The sun by its light and heat to some things brings corruption; to some it gives beauty and life. It depends upon the nature of what it shines upon. So the light of education let in upon the human soul, if it be not at the same time purified, may only render its darkness more visible, or may give life only to the evil germs that are planted within it.

No age of the world excelled that of Pericles in all the arts that give softness and refinement to life. Painting, sculpture, the genius of Phidias and Praxiteles, the pencil of Zeuxis, the temple of the virgin goddess, with its elegant proportions and its carved facade, even in its ruins one of the wonders of the world, poetry, oratory—all illustrated and adorned it. The splendor of its court has passed into a proverb. Aspasia presided over it, wonderful for her wit, beauty, and grace—yea, for her wisdom and learning—the confidant and coun-seller of statesmen and kings. Her intellect, as her person, had been cultivated to its utmost limit; in that respect she was the paragon of her sex. But what age was more corrupt than that of Pericles? Aspasia herself, the education of her moral nature neglected, was a wreck; as the poet says, "One of those shameless women who are the worst of men." She was a splendid monument of what the unsanctified intellect can be. No regard had been paid to her complex being; her nature was distorted, and, in the absence of virtue and religion, she was not an unmeet prototype of many of the disrowned women of our own age.

What else could be looked for? It was the natural sequence of a divorce of the head from the heart. God has joined them together, and when man sunder them the necessary outcome must be misery and shame: if he sows the wind he will reap the whirlwind. When men increase the capacity of the intellect and dwarf the moral nature, the result is not symmetry and grace, but spiritual deformity; the dragon's teeth spring up into armed men. It is to sharpen the claws and teeth of some savage animal without taming and subduing its spirit. There is in all true education a law of proportion; the body, mind, and heart must all be cultured if we would have a truly cultured man. In "The Art of Poetry" Horace tells us that the union of incongruous things—as of a woman's beautiful bust to the extremities of a fish, would produce a monster in the natural world. So the separation of congruous things, the intellect divorced from the heart, creates a no less wondrous prodigy.

If the State is derelict, the Church must supplement its deficiencies, must replace the schools which recognize no Christianity and no God, or, if that cannot be, the priest at the chancel rail must the more diligently instruct the lambs of the flock in those elementary principles which underlie the doctrine of Christ. If, as we are told in the Revised Version, Timothy from a babe had known the Sacred Writings, which were able to make him wise unto salvation, it was from no teaching of the State, but because of the unfeigned faith which dwelt first in his grandmother Lois and his mother Eunice, who in this regard may be looked upon as types of the Church which is the spiritual mother of us all.

The English Church Times in speaking of the secession to Rome of the Rev. Thomas Wimberly Mossman, says that though intrinsically unimportant, it "is of some passing interest as finally pricking a bladder which has never attained much inflation—the so-called Order of Corporate Reunion." Mr. Mossman was self-styled Bishop of Selby.

THE REV. ASHBEL BALDWIN, M. A.

In a farm-house on the hills of Litchfield, Connecticut, was born March 7th, 1757, the subject of this sketch. His father, Isaac Baldwin, was a graduate of Yale College in the class of 1735, and an older brother, who bore the paternal name, was graduated in 1774. Ashbel was later, graduating in 1776, the year of the Declaration of American Independence. Isaac Baldwin, the senior, on leaving college, began the study of theology, and was licensed as a Congregational minister, and preached for a time in what is now the town of Washington, Conn. But he soon relinquished the study, and turned his attention to agricultural pursuits, settling upon a farm in Litchfield, and becoming an eminently useful official in the public affairs of the town and county.

His son Ashbel contracted a lameness in boyhood by going into the water and imprudently exposing himself to a cold, which stiffened and shortened one of his limbs, and made his gait ever afterward unequal and limping. He had not relinquished his attachment to the Congregational order when he left college, and subsequently took a temporary tutorship in a Church family on Long Island. Stanch Churchmen in those days, when for any cause the parish church was closed on Sunday, turned their parlors into chapels, and had in private the full morning service. Mr. Baldwin, being the educated member of the household, was required to act as lay-reader, and not knowing how to use the Prayer Book, and yet ashamed to confess his ignorance to the head of the family, he sought the assistance and friendship of the gardener, who gave him the necessary instructions, and very soon love and admiration of the Liturgy and conversion to the Church followed. How long he continued in his private tutorship is unknown.

For two or three years during the Revolutionary War he held the appointment of a quarter-master in the Continental army, and was stationed for a time at Litchfield, where there was a large depository of military stores, "principally taken at the surrender of General Burgoyne," and guarded by a considerable detachment of soldiers. For his services in this capacity he received a pension from the government, which became his principal means of support in the last years of his life.

Upon the cessation of hostilities and the acknowledgment of independence, he applied himself to theological studies, and was an interested spectator at the meeting of the clergy in Woodbury on the Feast of the Annunciation, 1783, when choice was made of the first Bishop of Connecticut. He was then a candidate for Holy Orders, and with Philo Shelton and Henry Van Dyck was waiting for the opportunity to receive episcopal ordination in this country, which it was expected would ere long be given.

More than two years had elapsed since Seabury left the shores of America to seek in Great Britain consecration to the apostolic office. On Monday, June 29th, 1783, he arrived at Newport, R. I., after a voyage from London of three months, including his stay in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and reaching his future home in Connecticut a week later, preparations were immediately begun to meet his clergy and hold his first ordination. The meeting was in Middletown, and the ordination was there on August 2d, when Colin Ferguson of Maryland, Henry Van Dyck, Ashbel Baldwin, and Philo Shelton were admitted deacons. The three last-named belonged to Connecticut, and were recommended by its clergy, of whom in convention assembled the Rev. Jeremiah Leaming was president. Mr. Baldwin was sent at once to his native place, and continued in charge of St. Michael's church, Litchfield, till 1793, when he resigned and accepted the rectorship of the venerable parish at Stratford. He was instrumental in awakening the zeal of the Episcopalians of Litchfield county, and leading them to re-open their churches after the desolations of the war, as well as to project new ones.

His recognized position in the diocese was early one of influence and responsibility, and his energy and facility in the dispatch of business made him especially useful in the deliberative and legislative assemblies of the Church. He was chosen Secretary of the Convention of the Diocese of Connecticut in 1796, and continued to discharge the duties of that office for a period of nearly thirty years. He was a deputy to the General Convention for an equally long period, and held the office of Secretary in the House of Deputies, from which he retired in 1828, with the thanks of that body "for his long and faithful services."

Mr. Baldwin was a man of keen discernment and quick apprehensions, and was rarely known to fall below the demands of any occasion that might arise. An incident is related of him which will illustrate his readiness and ability to cope with those who venture to indulge in pleasantries and witticisms at the expense of the clerical character. In June, 1799, the General Convention of our Church met in Philadelphia. It was the first time that he had been sent as a delegate to represent the Diocese of Connecticut, and in company with a legal gentleman of some shrewdness and considerable humor, who was his colleague. The journey was entered upon in a private conveyance, for steamboats and railroads were unknown in those days. As they approached at nightfall the place where they expected to find lodgings, the thought, more wicked than pious or respectful, suggested itself to the lawyer of passing off Mr. Baldwin as his servant. They had alighted at the public house, and rested a few moments in the sitting-room, when the lay-delegate stepped out and said to the landlord that he was travelling with his servant to Philadelphia, that supper might be provided for both, and they would take it together, but they must have separate apartments for the night, and he hoped his servant, as he was a clever fellow, would be given the best quarters allowed to such persons. Long before the evening had passed away, Mr. Baldwin felt a disposition to retire, and was shown to an apartment where, to his surprise, he found other occupants, and those not of the most agreeable kind. Indignant that one of his cloth should be thus treated, he limped down quickly to the landlord, and asked the meaning of this strange treatment. "Have you no better accommodations in your house?"

"No better!" was answered, "What! do you, a servant, expect the best apartment in the house? It is good enough. The gentleman gave me directions, and said you were nothing more than his servant." "Servant! servant! I am the servant of the Lord—nothing more."

The landlord now saw that he had been made the dupe of premeditated sport, and without waiting to apologize, he conducted the clergyman into a genteel apartment, and then sought the lawyer, disposed at first to be angry with him for the imposition; but he was quieted on being assured that it was an innocent artifice, from which no harm would come. The travellers were detained for nearly two days, but when at length a bright June morning dawned their carriage was driven to the door, the baggage adjusted, and Mr. Baldwin had already taken his seat as postilion, before the landlord politely suggested that he had forgotten to pay his bill. "Ah," said he, quickly, "my master will attend to that. Call upon him."

The lawyer was fairly outwitted, settled the bill, and resolved that he might pass for the rest of the journey as the servant of the Lord.

As the General Convention of 1799 was the first which Mr. Baldwin attended in the capacity of a deputy from the Diocese of Connecticut, so that of 1833 was the last. He was conspicuous in that body for remarkable self-possession and promptness and facility in giving expression to his opinions. The type of his theology led him to take the "old paths," and reverence for the memory of the bishop who admitted him to Holy Orders, held him up to a high standard of legislation for the Church. He would have her doctrines and discipline well defined and guarded, and his first action in the House of Deputies was to move a resolution to take into consideration the propriety of framing articles of religion. He lived at a period when Puritanism was rife in New England, especially in Connecticut, and while it was his policy to avoid being drawn into controversy, his devotion to the interests of the Episcopal Church never faltered or became doubtful under any pressure of circumstances. He was a parson without the smallest trace of bigotry, and attracted and retained the affections of all who were privileged to know him well in his private and official capacity. He was a good reader of the Liturgy, an instructive, if not a learned, preacher, and had a clear, sonorous voice and a persuasive manner which rendered his discourses acceptable to all classes of people. His best and happiest days were passed in Stratford, where for over thirty years he held the rectorship of the parish which had been faithfully served by those two eminent divines, Johnson and Leaning.

For a portion of the time he had this parish in connection with the neighboring one at Tashua, ministering to the latter every third Sunday, and holding frequent services in school-houses and private dwellings. His mode of travelling from place to place was in a chaise, and on one occasion he drove up rather hurriedly to meet an appointment at a house where the people had already assembled, and stepping down from his seat he was thus accosted by the host, who was not a Churchman: "I suppose, Mr. Baldwin, as it is the season of Lent, you will not have any refreshments before beginning the service." "No; nothing for me," was the reply. "But my horse is a Presbyterian; he must be fed."

In social intercourse he had wonderful powers of adapting himself to circumstances, and was alike an acceptable visitor in the homes of the wealthy and refined, the humble and the uneducated, and a welcome guest at their tables. It was his practice, as it was the practice of many of the clergy in that day, to administer baptism in private houses—using the occasion of a lecture to make the office a public one. Very often whole households were baptized in this way, and sometimes their connection with the Church was afterwards unfortunately lost through neglect to exercise over them a proper degree of vigilance and care.

Mr. Baldwin married Miss Clarissa Johnson, of Guilford, a grand-niece of his predecessor in Stratford, the Rev. Dr. Samuel Johnson. She died childless many years before him, and he never married again. He was in the full possession of his mental powers, and blessed with a fair degree of health when he resigned in 1824 the rectorship of Christ church. For a time he lingered in the neighborhood of Stratford, but could not be idle, and was soon in charge of the parish in Meriden, and afterwards officiated in several places—as Tashua, Wallingford, North Haven, Oxford and Quaker's Farms. Ten years were thus passed, doing what he could for the Church which he had served so faithfully and loved so much, but in 1834 failure of eyesight and other infirmities obliged him to cease from all public service and go into retirement. It was natural for him to dwell for the rest of his days among or near his old parishioners, and from 1834 to 1843 he resided at New Haven, Bridgeport and Stratford. He was at the latter place in 1837, when he addressed a letter to Bishop Brownell, taking an affectionate leave of the Diocesan Convention then sitting in New Haven, and resigning the only office of trust in its gift, which he had continued to hold. The letter is so descriptive of the man, so chaste, so exquisitely beautiful in its style, and so pathetic in its allusions, that it is worth producing almost wholly to close this paper.

"I was much pleased to learn that the convention would be held in New Haven this summer, as my present stay would be so near that I might possibly be able once more to meet with my brethren. I had made arrangements to do so; but in that I am much disappointed, as the weather is such that I dare not venture abroad. The least cold affects my eyes immediately, and produces much pain. In addition to an earnest desire once more to meet my clerical and lay brethren, I wished to be present at this annual meeting for the purpose of resigning my office of trustee of the Episcopal Academy. I was made one of the trustees of that institution at its first organization, and for many years I never failed to attend its meetings; but for several years past my health has been so bad that it has not been in my power to attend to any of its concerns. Will you have the goodness, sir, to present me very affectionately to the members of the convention, and request them to accept my resignation?"

"My dear sir, when I first entered the Church its condition was not very flattering. Surrounded by enemies on every side and opposed with much virulence, her safety and even her very existence were at times somewhat questionable; but by the united and zealous exertions of the clergy, attended by the blessings of her great Founder, she has been preserved in safety through every storm, and now presents herself, with astonishment to every beholder, not as a grain of mustard-seed, but as a beautiful tree, spreading its salubrious branches over our whole country. The Church, by a strict adherence to its ancient landmarks, its priesthood, its Liturgy, and its government, has been preserved from those schisms which seem to threaten the peace of a very respectable body of Christians in our country. May the same unanimity and zeal which animated our fathers still be preserved in the Church. My days of pilgrimage, I know, are almost closed, and I can do no more than to be in readiness, by the grace of God, to leave the Church militant in peace. May I be permitted, sir, to ask the prayers of my bishop and his clergy that my last days may be happy?"

Mr. Baldwin went to Rochester, N. Y., in 1843, and became an inmate in the family of one who had removed thither from Connecticut, and who was under special obligations to him for kindness and care bestowed in previous years. He died in that city on Sunday, February 8th, 1846, lacking twenty-seven days to complete his eighty-ninth year.

DISCOVERY AT ST. MARTIN'S, CANTERBURY.—At St. Martin's, Canterbury, the rector, Canon Routledge, has discovered a "hagio-scope" in the northwest wall of the nave, at its junction with the tower. It is a Norman insertion in a wall of Roman construction, a wall which is now seen to be similar to those which form at least the lower portions of the nave and chancel. There are regular courses of Roman brick, and the surface of the original wall has been covered with the characteristic salmon-colored mortar. A coating of plaster two or three inches thick has covered up and concealed the ancient walls, which have for the most part stood intact since first erected by Roman or British Christians in the third or fourth century. The Romano-British sanctuary was afterward profaned to heathen use, or allowed to fall into decay, until it was, as Bede records, repaired and reconstructed to Christian worship for Queen Bertha. The original fabric has undergone, in the long course of time, many changes; it was already of venerable age when the Norman builders pierced the walls to insert door or window, squint or piscina, which still further lapse of ages once more concealed. Yet the ancient walls are there, and St. Martin's remains a memorial of Christian worship in Britain earlier by several centuries than the coming of Augustine.—Guardian.

COMMEMORATION OF BISHOP KEN.—On Monday, June 29th, of the anniversary of the trial of the seven bishops in the reign of James II., large numbers of clergy and laity from all parts of the Diocese of Bath and Wells assembled at the cathedral in Wells to take part in commemorating the bi-centenary of Bishop Ken, who was Bishop of Bath and Wells from 1685 to 1691, when he was deprived by William III. There was an early celebration of the Holy Communion, at which Bishop Ken's morning hymn, "Awake my soul and with the sun," was sung. At 11:30 a.m. there was a special service in the nave of the cathedral, at which the mayor and corporation of Wells attended in their official robes. A commemorative sermon was preached by the Bishop of Derry and Raphoe (Dr. Alexander).

AN OFFER TOWARD METHODIST RECONCILIATION.—The Rev. G. W. Danks, vicar of Mortonhy, Gainsborough, proposed to the representatives of both the Wesleyan and the Primitive Methodists in his parish that they should retain their preachers, their chapels, their class-meetings, their prayer-meetings, their Sunday-schools, and everything else that was characteristic of their system. He further proposed that the children of the schools should be included in the annual feast of the Church schools; and he offered, as his was the richest congregation, to help the two bodies pecuniarily to the best of his power. All that he asked in return was that they should declare themselves in unity with the Church of England, and communicate at the parish church. In other words, he offered them everything that John Wesley contemplated or ever gave his personal followers. Unhappily, the Methodist authorities outside the parish interposed and stopped the movement, so that when the final conference met only three Wesleyans attended. We hope, however, that the attempt has not been in vain; but that the proposal having once been made, it will gradually bear fruit; that first one or two and then many Wesleyans will feel that they are bound by the very same they bear to clear themselves from the stain of a schism that would have been most odious to their founder.—The Church Times.

THE PUSEY HOUSE AT OXFORD.—On Thursday, June 25th, a thanksgiving service for the first year's work of the Pusey House, was held in the University church, Oxford. It was preceded by early celebrations at the cathedral, at Keble College, and in the chapel of Pusey House. Canon Liddon was to have preached at the noon service, but the state of his health did not permit him to keep the engagement, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Francis Paget, who succeeds Bishop King as Professor of Pastoral Theology at Oxford. The nave of St. Mary's was crowded, one hundred and fifty robes being present. After the sermon the Ambrosian Te Deum was sung, and a liberal collection was made for the endowment fund.

A collation was served at Keble College, when speeches were made by the Bishop of Oxford, the Earl of Glasgow, the Principal Librarian and others.

SCOTLAND.

COADJUTOR BISHOP FOR THE DIOCESE OF MORAY, ROSS AND CAITHNESS.—Following is the mandate of the Primus, the Bishop of Moray, Ross and Caithness, for the election of a coadjutor:

"Whereas, the College of Bishops has sanctioned the appointment and the election of a Coadjutor-Bishop for the United Diocese of Moray, Ross and Caithness. We, the Primus, in our own name, and with the sanction of our colleagues, the Bishops of the Episcopal Church in Scotland, do hereby authorize and command you, the clergy and laity of the said diocese who may be entitled to vote in terms of Canon III. and IV. of the said Church, to repair, within two months from the date of the receipt of this mandate by the Dean of the said diocese of Moray, Ross and Caithness, to such place within the diocese as the said Dean shall appoint, and then and there to elect for Coadjutor-Bishop, cum jure successione, a man of blameless conduct, orthodox in the faith, apt to teach, fit to govern, and having a good report as well of those who are without as of those within the pale of the Church.

"In the meantime, we exhort you, individually and collectively, to consider well the sacred nature of the trust which we now commit to you, and the importance of the election which you are to make; and having the fear of God, and the peace of the Church perpetually in your view, to divest yourselves of all partiality and prejudice arising from any personal feeling, remembering that your choice will necessarily affect the interests, not of the United Diocese of Moray, Ross and Caithness only, but also of the whole Church in Scotland. Episcopatus unus est, cuius a singulis in solidum pars tenetur, is a proposition venerable, not merely for its antiquity and its author, but because on its truth rests the possibility of exercising any discipline in the Church Catholic.

"You are to have in view, therefore, not only the peace and good government of the United Diocese of Moray, Ross and Caithness, with which you are most intimately connected, but likewise the peace and harmony and good government of the whole Church. It is for securing the former of these two objects that, when a diocese becomes vacant, the presbyters of the said diocese, and laity therein, entitled to vote as aforesaid, have the privilege of electing their bishop, and of presenting the person elected to the bishops for consecration; and it is for securing the latter, which is at least of equal importance, that the bishops possess the right of either confirming or setting aside the election made by the said presbyters and laity.

"We earnestly pray that God may direct you by His Holy Spirit in all things, and especially in the discharge of this most important duty.

"Given under our hand, at Eden Court, Inverness, this eleventh day of June, being the Feast of St. Barnabas the Apostle, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty-five.

(Signed)

"ROBERT, Bishop of Moray, &c., Primus." He also authorized the following prayer to be said in all the churches of his diocese until the election was held:

"O Lord Jesu Christ, thou great Shepherd of the Sheep, who knowest the hearts of all men, and Who, after Thine Ascension, didst inspire Thy faithful Apostles to choose Matthias into the number of the Twelve, mercifully ordain that a faithful and true pastor may be chosen to be Coadjutor-Bishop of this diocese, who may discharge the duties of his sacred office to the glory of Thy great Name and the benefit of Thy holy Church, for Thine own merit's sake, Who livest and reignest with the Father, in the unity of the Holy Ghost, one God, world without end. Amen."

The meeting for the election was held in the Cathedral on Thursday, July 16th. There was an early celebration of the Holy Communion in the bishop's private chapel at 8 A. M., and a second celebration in the cathedral at 11:30 A. M.

The result of the election has not yet been received.

GERMANY.

OLD CATHOLICISM IN ODENWALD.—The Deutscher Merkur announces from Odenwald: "On the 8th inst. the inhabitants met and resolved to 'renounce the so-called Infalible Popish Church, and to return to the Old Catholic Church, as she believed and taught until 1870.' The great majority in the place have signed this resolution. The pastoration is for the present to be supplied from Heidelberg. Moreover, several Romanist clergy have recently applied for mission to our bishop."

JEWISH CONVERSIONS.—The London Zukunft (Judeo-German) says: "At Vienna, last year, no less than two hundred and sixty-three Jews became Christians—among whom were thirteen barristers, nine physicians, four journalists, three professors, three judges, seventeen merchants and manufacturers."

FRANCE.

RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION IN THE UNIVERSITIES.—At the sitting of the French Chamber on Monday, June 29th, when the estimates for public instruction were presented, Mgr. Froppe moved to diminish the credits for superior instruction on the ground that they were to be employed for establishing at the universities chairs for the teaching of religious science, from which the Catholic religion was to be attacked. M. Goblet, Minister of Public Worship, replied that the various religions would, notwithstanding the suppression of the theological faculties, retain for some time to come a considerable place in the world, if only from a historical point of view. The chairs of religion and science would not be for polemic purposes, but for historical and literary research, and in the view of the government provision ought to be made for confiding these high studies to savans like M. Havet and M. Renan (!) (Disapprobation from the Right and applause from the Left.) Mgr. Froppe having declared that the government only instituted an anti religious system of theological education, the Chamber rejected his amendment by 339 to 97.

HOLLAND.

DEATH OF A PROMINENT OLD CATHOLIC.—We announce with regret the decease, in his forty-second year, of Theodor Rol, of Utrecht, one of the Dutch Old Catholic clergy best known to Anglicans, and a most intelligent worker in the cause of Continental Catholic Reform. When Dr. May carried to the late Archbishop Loos letters from some of the English episcopate, urging that prelate to take forward steps on behalf of Dr. Dollinger and his anti infallibilist associates in Germany, he found no stronger advocate of the policy happily in consequence adopted than Mr. Rol. He was one of the founders of the Oud-Katholiek, the Dutch Church paper, which will especially miss his pen.—Church Bells.

ITALY.

THE NEW APPOINTMENTS.—With regard to the appointments announced for the approaching consistory, the Daily Chronicle's Roman correspondent observes that the elevation of three of the four Italian cardinals excites much comment both at the Vatican and the Quirinal. He says: "There is undoubtedly a party in the Sacred College disposed to accept conciliatory advances from Italy. The chief of this is Cardinal Laurenti, formerly at Perugia with Leo. XII. The 'Perugian' section at the Vatican is now to be strengthened by the nomination of Mgr. Baccelli, brother of the former minister of Public Instruction, Mgr. Schiaffino, a strong Italian, Archbishop Battaglini, of Bologna, who succeeded the militant Cardinal Parocchi, and Mgr. Capecestrato, Archbishop of Capua, whose brother is acting postmaster general of the kingdom of Italy, and who was formerly the confessor of Queen Margherita."

MASSACHUSETTS.

LYNN.—St. Stephen's Church.—The Lynn Transcript of Friday, July 10th, says:

"One of the largest congregations that was ever convened at St. Stephen's Memorial church, met on Sunday last at the closing service of the rectorship of the Rev. Louis DeCormis. It comprised a large number of the many friends of the late rector, whose friendship has been developed and strengthened by the pleasant associations of nearly ten years, during which time he has met them as a faithful pastor, friend, and adviser, in scenes of joy and sadness, and in administering the holy rites of the Church at all times when called upon.

"A large number of the members of the mission attended this closing service; but the entire assemblage could but feebly represent the kindly feelings and universal respect in which he is held throughout the city.

"Mr. DeCarmis was assisted by the Rev. Mr. Eglert, who is now in charge of the mission which was commenced several weeks since, and is now in successful operation, with a prospect of erecting a chapel on the beautiful lot corner of Broad and Estes streets at an early day.

"The service was very fine, and the music, under the direction of Mr. Weston, was excellent. The whole seemed a just tribute of respect and love to a faithful servant of Christ who has labored earnestly and effectually for the cause of his church in this city."

NEW YORK.

NEW YORK—The Italian Mission.—This mission, (the Rev. C. Stander, minister in charge,) which has the privilege of Grace chapel in which to worship on Sunday afternoons, discontinued its services on Sunday, July 12th, and will resume them on the first Sunday in September. The Sunday-school, however, will be re-organized a week or two earlier. This is the first time Mr. Stander has had a vacation for nearly twelve years.

The Italian Mission is working under great disadvantages from not having a church of its own. If it could get possession of St. Phillips's church in Mulberry street, which is for sale, it would seem very much to be desired. This church is much more convenient to the homes of a majority of the Italians than Grace chapel, and would in every way answer the purposes of the mission. The matter has, in an unofficial way, been brought to the attention of the committee of the Italian Mission, and it is possible that in the fall something may be done to see if the property in Mulberry street can be secured. The price asked for it is $60,000. There are now from 50,000 to 60,000 Italians in this city, and it is believed that if the congregation could get possession of St. Phillips's, they could make their work self-supporting.

NEW YORK—Holy Trinity Church.—About the middle of June, this church (the Rev. Wilber F. Watkins, rector), established a summer home in the beautiful village of South Norwalk. In former years the poor children of the congregation were sent into the country by means of the Fresh Air Fund, but the requirements of some other children can be taken in this way led to the renting a commodious house for the summer. The house is charmingly located on a hill from which extensive views are obtained of Long Island Sound and of the surrounding country. The acre of ground connected with it is well shaded, and provided, especially, with apple trees.

The home is rented at a cost of $50 a month, this amount being paid by one of the ladies of the congregation. It has ten rooms, including kitchen, dining-room, etc., and is neatly furnished for the purposes intended. Everything is done in order and good taste, the object being to have the children and mothers learn something in the matter of housekeeping. The selection of crockery, even, and the setting of the table are designed as a sort of object-lesson.

About fourteen children and mothers are taken to the home each Saturday, the others returning. Of the twenty or thirty mothers connected with the Mothers' Meeting, nearly all will have a week at the home, their requirements being often full as great as those of the children. The household is supplied with abundant and excellent food, the groceries having been purchased at wholesale at one of the best establishments in this city. The very best of milk is also supplied by a farmer morning and night.

The entire cost of carrying on this work for the season, including rent, is expected to be about $1,800. The home is only rented for the summer, as the church is in some sort experimenting. The home and all the arrangements, however, seem to give excellent satisfaction to the rector and congregation, and the work is considered to be of very great importance.

It should be added that Miss Clifford, visitor in Holy Trinity parish, and also Bible teacher, has made herself very useful and efficient in connection with this excellent work. Through her efforts $600 were raised at the outset, and it is understood that the entire sum required is largely provided for. Miss Clifford selects the parties, herself taking them to the home on Saturdays, and conducting religious services on Sundays. Prayers are also said each morning and evening. It is expected that the home will not close till the middle of October, and that by that time upwards of two hundred persons will have shared in its benefits.

NEW YORK—The Holy Cross Mission.—The clergy in charge of this mission, having their headquarters at 711 East Twelfth street, between Avenues C and D, have opened a cottage known as St. Andrew's Cottage, at Farmingdale, L. I. The cottage was little more than a barn when first occupied in 1883. Last year, however, it underwent some alterations, and is now a frame building, 50x33, the boys, for the most part, sleeping in the lofts. Connected with this building is land amounting to forty acres, it being the aim of the order to establish a farm, as also a trade-school. The boys mostly come from "Little Germany," or that crowded German population living in the vicinity of Avenue C. About eighteen or twenty boys are taken to the cottage each week, and during their stay of a week or so all are required to work. Each day a schedule is handed them specifying what they are required to do. This being occupied is conceived to be both enjoyable and useful. In the course of time it is hoped to establish a colony in the West, by which means the boys may be drafted off and become farmers.

NEW YORK—St. George's Church.—This church has opened a sea-side home at Rockaway Beach, to which large numbers are sent from the Sunday-school, the Girls' Friendly Society, etc. From the latter, and including also mothers, about eighteen are sent each week, to make a week's sojourn. From the former are sent about four hundred children a day. The children who stay a day only are required to take their lunch with them, the church, however, providing tea and coffee. The children have no further expense except ferriage.

NEW YORK—The Church of the Ascension.—This church (the Rev. E. Winchester Donald, rector,) at the corner of Fifth Avenue and Tenth street, was closed late in June for renovation and changes which, it is believed, will make it one of the most beautiful churches in the city. The side galleries have been removed because they darkened the church, and, in fact, were never intended by the architect, Mr. Upjohn, to be there. His wishes, however, were overruled by the Rev. Dr. (afterwards Bishop) Eastburn, at that time rector. In addition to this restoration of the church to its original idea, the five tall windows on either side are being shortened up four or five feet, while the church is to be re-carpeted, re-upholstered, painted, etc., and have a new furnace. These repairs will cost about $12,000.

In addition to the above, the chancel will be made new. The main features of this work will be a new stone floor, a reredos of Sienna marble, and a painting of the Ascension, by John Lafarge. This work will, in all respects, be severely simple, and the character of the church be rigidly adhered to. The cost of making these changes will be $20,000. This sum has been contributed by two parishioners, who wish to do something to anchor the church on its present site for all time, so that if hereafter the better or richer classes remove from this locality—of which, however, there are at present no indications—the church will be a fixture. The architecture of the church needed only these changes, it is believed, to bring out its strength and beauty. The aim in making them is not one of prettiness, but of a dignity and solidity in keeping with the church.

Under the present rectorship, which embraces three years, the debt of $30,000 has been paid, the church has received a new organ and pulpit, and gained a congregation. The parish supports two chapels, the Memorial Chapel of the Ascension, in charge of the Rev. J. F. Steen, and the Chapel of the Comforter, in charge of the Rev. E. H. Van Winkle. Both church and chapels are in a highly flourishing condition. Best of all, there has been a deepening of the religious life, the aim of the rector having been to use everything for the spiritual betterment of the people under his charge.

It may be added that the old pulpit and reredos have been removed, and are to be set up in the Church of the Ascension, Ipswich, Mass., as a memorial to the late Dr. John Cotton Smith.

NEW YORK—House of the Holy Comforter.—This free Church home for incurables, at 18 East Eleventh street, finds its treasury especially low during the summer. It has no endowment, and as it no longer receives help from the Excise Fund, it is compelled to fall back on the voluntary offerings of the benevolent. Its household now numbers twenty-nine unfortunates, while five or six are being cared for in the country. The sum needed for the year's current expenses is $5,000. Any contributions which the charitable are moved to bestow may be sent to the treasurer, Mr. John C. O'Connor, Jr., 14 East Thirty-third street, or directly to the home. At the latter place donations of food, clothing, books, etc., would be most welcome.

NEW YORK—The Trinity Seaside Home.—This home, carried on by the Trinity Church Association and the Ladies' Auxiliary, and situated at Great River, near Islip, Long Island, has completed a new addition which is to answer the purpose of dining-room, play-room, etc. The Home was opened the latter part of June, receiving a number of children, and by means of this enlargement it may be able to accommodate fifty children at any one time. The whole number of women and children received last year from June 10th to September 31st was 225, each of the children remaining one month. Those beneficiaries who belonged to the parish came from Trinity church, and the chapels of St. Paul, St. John, St. Chrysostom and St. Augustine.

The Trinity Seaside Home grew out of a small house at first situated in a village on the Hudson River, which two years afterwards was abandoned on account of malignant malarial fever. Subsequently, Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt, who had promised to give $1,000 towards the endowment of a home, in case one could be established by the seaside, purchased and deeded the present Trinity Seaside Home to the rector, wardens and vestrymen of Trinity church. These trustees leased the Home to the Trinity Church Association in order that it might be efficiently managed, and the Executive Committee of the latter organization placed the Home under the care of the Sisters of St. Mary and of an advisory committee of the association.

The Home consists of a large and well-arranged house, and made still larger and more convenient by the present addition. The property includes eight acres of land, as also outbuildings, the original cost having been $8,500. There was also received during the year in which the Home was purchased $5,774.14, making a total of $13,774.14. The Home possesses good and perfectly safe salt water bathing, while the climate throughout the region in which it is situated is free from malaria, and known to be of the best for the purposes of a sanitarium. Through the generosity of Mrs. Vanderbilt the grounds in front of the Home were last year graded and improved, and a wire fence built along the highway. With the present addition and improvements, its usefulness will be greatly increased.

The children for whom the Home is designed are taken from the crowded, ill-ventilated tenements, and are all sick and feeble, and some of them almost helpless. They include convalescents from diseases incident to childhood, the crippled or maimed from disease or accident, or the delicate, poorly fed children of parents living for the most part in the lower districts of the city. For all of these the changed living and bracing air of the seaside are found to be of very great benefit.

The Home, which is under the oversight of the Sisters of St. Mary, is in part carried on by the Ladies' Auxiliary Board, of which Mrs. John D. Prince is President, Miss F. A. Binger Secretary, and Mrs. Richard Irvin, Jr., Treasurer. The main object of the Board is to secure ample income for the Home, to provide for its contingent necessities and to ultimately furnish it with a suitable endowment. Persons who may be glad to assist in the maintenance of the Home may become life patrons by the payment of $100 or more, and patrons for the current year by the payment of from $25 to $100.

LONG ISLAND.

BROOKLYN—Church Charity Foundation.—The services on St. John Baptist's Day at the Foundation were of more than usual interest. The day being the anniversary of the laying of the corner-stone of St. John's Hospital, special collects for the Hospital were said in connection with the celebration of the Holy Communion at 8:30 o'clock. An added interest was given to this celebration by the fact that a new chalice, recently presented to the chapel by Mrs. R. Chaucey Hamilton, was then used for the first time. The chalice is a beautiful piece of work made by the Gorham Manufacturing Company. It is of solid silver, the bowl being heavily lined with gold. The base is hexagonal, and on one of the sides are engraved the words: "To the Glory of God, and in Loving Memory of my Parents, Harry Messenger, who Died June 12, 1882, and Rosa Messenger, who Died Dec. 12, 1882. N. M. H." The chalice is about seven inches high, and the centre of the stem is richly engraved and hexagonally embossed. Upon the boss immediately above the side bearing the memorial inscription, a Latin cross is engraved, while the remaining bosses bear severally the letters "J. E. S. U. S.", the spaces between the letters being engraved with grape-vine leaves.

Later flower and refreshment tables were set in the Home for the Aged, the arrangements being under the charge of Mrs. Francis Peck, president of the Associates' Auxiliary Committee of St. John's Hospital, who was ably assisted by representatives from many parishes of the city. The attendance of visitors was large. In the evening the grounds were lighted with Japanese lanterns, and the entertainment, varied with music, was much enjoyed both by the beneficiaries and their numerous friends.

BROOKLYN—St. Ann's Church.—It is expected that Archdeacon Kirkby will supply St. Ann's church during the months of August and September. His many friends will give him a cordial welcome.

CENTRAL ISLIP—Church of the Messiah.—The deeds of the property of this church have been delivered to the Standing Committee. The foundation was laid in 1879, and the church was erected at a cost of $2,700. The lot was given by Mr. Henry Holmes. Messrs. Bradish Johnson, L. C. Lawrence, G. W. Willmording, and James Slater were liberal contributors, while the organ and the communion vessels were given by St. Mark's church, Islip. It is expected that the church will soon be consecrated, and a missionary appointed to the charge.

FORT HAMILTON—St. John's Church.—There has been lately placed in the chancel of this church (the Rev. R. B. Snowden, rector), a new altar, larger and higher than the small and unsuitable one that preceded it. It is constructed of walnut, highly polished, having in the centre, facing the congregation, the monogram of the Saviour in white. It has a retablo of fitting proportion, on which stands the cross, of polished brass, the Easter gift of the Sunday-school. A complete set of Trinity-tide hangings were presented, together with the altar, by St. John's Guild.

The third annual report of the guild, of which Mrs. John Hamilton is president, and Miss May Hamilton secretary and treasurer, was read on Sunday, June 12th, and set forth a very important work done in supplying clothing, food, delicacies, coal, etc., to the poor and the needy sick, eleven families having been regularly visited and relieved. The guild has also materially improved the furnishings of the church, and contributed to the prosperity of the parish in many ways. Its benefits to the poor are distributed to all alike, without regard to sect or denomination. Of the many cases of distress found and relieved, amidst the unusual rigor of last winter, one was cited in the report as follows: "That of a sick man with a bad cough, found sitting by the body of his infant child, for which he was unable to buy a coffin, in the bitterest weather, without a fire, in his shirt sleeves, having pawned his very coat to buy bread. His wife, though not sick, was more destitute in the matter of clothing than himself, and they had sold all but the most indispensable articles of furniture long before." The guild distributed 269 articles of clothing of all kinds, and expended $156.36. Ministrations like these to the suffering and deserving poor gain for the Church the respect and love of all classes, and prove her spirit to be that of the Divine Master.

GREENPOINT—Church of the Ascension.—This church (the Rev. Arthur Whitaker, rector), is putting up a building on lots in the rear of the church edifice, which is to answer the purposes of the Sunday-school, the infant school, and St. John's Section, a branch temperance society in which the rector and congregation are more or less interested. The building stands on lots given to the parish ten or twelve years ago when the church was built by James Valentine and Thomas Roland, at that time wardens or vestrymen. It will be a substantial brick structure, 85 feet long and about 40 feet in width, and having large, commodious rooms, it is understood, on the ground floor and on the story above. The cost, aside from furnishing, is expected to be from $8,000 to $10,000, nearly all of which has been raised. When this building is completed the little chapel to the east of the church on Kent street, in which the Sunday-school has held its sessions, will be removed.

In the five years in which Mr. Whitaker has been rector of this church he has been highly successful. The church, which was much run down, has gained a congregation; a debt of $13,000 has been paid off, while this further work of putting up the building spoken of is evidence of a working and harmonious parish. Mr. Whitaker is a business man, withal, and has been careful to see that the property of the church was put in such shape that no mortgage could be put upon it, in case money might be required to complete the present building.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

NIAGARA FALLS—Opening of the Niagara Falls Park.—The Niagara Falls reservation, recently acquired by the State of New York, was opened as a park, with formal ceremonies, on Wednesday, July 15th. The Bishop of Western New York was chaplain for the day, and the following was the office of praise and prayer which he drew up and used on the occasion:

- I.
1. We praise Thee, O God, we acknowledge Thee to be the Lord.
2. Heaven and earth are full of the majesty of Thy glory.
3. O all ye works of the Lord; O ye seas and floods; O all ye green things upon the earth and all ye children of men, bless ye the Lord—praise Him and magnify Him forever.

II.

Almighty God, who madest the earth to be inhabited and gavest waste places to our fathers, setting the bounds of their habitations, and, by their labor, making the wilderness to blossom as the rose; we bless Thee for the goodly heritage they have left to us, their children. More especially, this day, we praise Thee for making beautiful these limits of our land, and for speaking to all nations and kindreds and tongues, in this place, with the voice of many waters. Blessed be Thy name that Thou hast opened our eyes to see and our ears to hear, and that Thou hast put it into the hearts of this people to acknowledge Thy glorious works, and to make them a legacy and a testimony unto their children's children. Therefore these pleasant places of Niagara we do set apart, this day, from common and sordid uses, making these coasts and isles which Thou hast marvellously adorned, to be a school for the hearts and minds of men, and of discipline to their senses; to inspire our countrymen forever with a love of nature and of Thee, its Author and Creator; and to make us know and feel that man cannot live by bread only, but by the better things Thou givest in Thy works and in Thy Word. Accept these our thanksgivings, and command a blessing on all who share in the duties of this celebration, that they may perform the same as a service to their country and to their fellow-men. Grant, also, that all those who shall hereafter enjoy the benefits of this place may make a right use of the same for their own welfare and with grateful hearts to Thee, their God, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

III.

Bless, O Lord, the President of the United States, the Governor of this state of New York, and all others in authority. Bless all the people of our country, and grant that, one and all, in our several vocations and estates, we may live in cheerful obedience to Thee as supreme; in dutiful submission to the laws of the land, and in kindly charities and good neighborhood, one with another; that so our lad may bring forth her increase; that our children may grow up in good learning and nurture; and that peace and happiness, truth and justice, religion and piety may be established among us for all generations. Grant this for the sake of Thy Son, our blessed Lord and Saviour. Amen.

IV.

O God, who hast set thy bow in the cloud, which compasseth the heavens about with a glorious circle, because the hands of the Most High have benuded it; we praise Thee that Thou hast made it to give light in the bright cloud as a memorial of Thine everlasting Covenant with all mankind. Moreover, we praise Thee that Thou hast set it as a seal upon these thy glorious works, and hast made it to shine perpetually in these floods, as well under the moon as under the sun, as well by night as by day. Grant that it may ever remind us of Thy loving kindness and tender mercy toward all men and be a symbol of peace and good-will to those, out of every nation, who shall come hither to behold the operations of Thy hands. Grant also that it may be a token of brotherhood to the kindred peoples to whom this river is a boundary, making it, also, a bond; so that the mighty power Thou hast given them in all the world may evermore be used not to hurt but to help and to make thy way known upon earth and Thy saving health among all nations. All which we beg in His blessed Name and Merits, in whose perfect words we saw our prayers, saying:

Our Father, etc.

NEW JERSEY.

ASBURY PARK—The House of the Good Shepherd.—This summer home, under the charge of the Sisterhood of the Good Shepherd, whose city home and centre of work is St. Barnabas's House, 304 Mulberry street, New York, was some weeks since opened for the season. Thither come the sisters in turn, as they can be spared from the city or as needed here. It is here in the refreshing air from the sea and in the open country that they find as much of rest as the partial charge of a numerous household will admit of.

This household consists, first, of their own children, as they call fifteen or twenty girls, who from ten to seventeen years of age live constantly with the sisters. These girls, who else had been in most instances the neglected and ruined inmates of pauper and vicious homes, are trained to be thorough house servants. These girls stay at the Park during the season, their usual routine of work being varied with shortened school-hours and frequent rambles after flowers, and an occasional dip in the sea.

In the next place, there are the little family parties made up, perhaps, of a mother or aunt, with one, two, or three children—a sickly babe, a crippled boy, or the little daughter whose cheeks were always colorless. These families, selected by the ladies of St. Barnabas's from among their most deserving and needy beneficiaries, are sent down for two weeks, or, possibly, they have been sent down by one and another of the city churches from among their worthy and poor parishioners, for whom a more gracious and helpful charity could not be devised.

Lastly, there are the ladies of the sisterhood and their fellow-laborers, whether in the city missions or in remoter fields. These may consist of a Bible reader from the far West, the wife and daughter of a country clergyman, teachers in Indian schools in the far-away land of the Dakotas. Possibly a country clergyman himself may be found among the company, though the sterner sex are at best in a discouraging minority.

Besides these guests of the house who pass a fortnight in rest and relaxation, one party quickly succeeding another, there are a few boarders, ladies of like mind with the workers whose congenial society and helpful pursues make them valuable additions to the house family.

It can well be imagined that the house at Asbury Park has very much to make it attractive. Half way around the house runs a broad portico upon which stand bright flowers in boxes, while vines are trailed up the pillars and beneath the cornice. By dint of much coaxing a tolerably green sward has taken the place of the white sand. There are, also, the remaining trees of the old pine forest to cast a light and pleasant shade. To the right as one enters is the simple chapel-room, for family worship night and morning, Evening Prayer being had at 5 o'clock. To the left is the parlor, with books, magazines, and a few pictures on the wall. Behind is the ladies' dining-room, and to the rear of this the dining-room of the children and the women. On this story is also a well-arranged and well-ordered kitchen and laundry. Up an easy flight of stairs is another broad hall hung with pictures of the English cathedrals. Here the children have their school-room and play-room, and the full benefit of the ever-stirring sea breeze. On the story above, these happy exiles from the crowded tenement houses have their spacious and comfortable rooms to sleep in.

PENNSYLVANIA.

The bishop in his address confines himself to diocesan affairs, but has some judicious remarks on the subject of divorce, and upon the centennials occurring during the present year.

PHILADELPHIA—Church of the Beloved Disciple.—The improvements on this church (the Rev. H. T. Widdemer, rector), are progressing towards completion, the chapel on the east end having been finished, and the addition to the main building roofed in. The chapel is 45x18 feet, and will be used for Sunday-school purposes, and for practising purposes by the choir of thirty boys. The addition to the church is seventy feet in length and fifteen feet in height, and will increase the total seating capacity to about five hundred. It is expected that the improvements will be entirely completed in time for the opening service, which will be held in the middle of August.

CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA.

MAUCH CHURCH—St. Mark's Church.—The Rev. B. F. Thompson, who has served a part of his diaconate as assistant at this church (the Rev. M. A. Tolman, rector), was advanced to the priesthood by the assistant-bishop of the diocese on Wednesday, July 1st. The sermon was preached by the Rev. H. E. Thompson, the candidate's brother. There were present and uniting in the laying on of hands the rector of the parish, the Rev. C. Kinloch Nelson, and the Rev. H. E. Thompson.

The music was very well rendered by the newly-trained choir of men and boys. It is to the credit of them and their trainers that the long and somewhat involved service, entirely new to them in their present position, proceeded without any awkwardness or hesitation.

SAYRE—The Robert A. Packer Hospital.—On Monday, July 13th, the new Robert A. Packer Hospital, at Sayre, Penn., was formally opened. It is the gift of the late Robert A. Packer, and consists of his spacious and beautiful residence, which has been refitted and made suitable for hospital purposes. It has been thoroughly renovated and put in a state of complete repair. The former dining-room, which was in a wing by itself, and built after designs furnished by one of the most artistic architects in the country, has been fitted up, with all its former adornments, into what the resident physician calls "the handsomest hospital ward in the world." The female ward is on the second floor, as are also a dozen chambers, all beautifully finished, which are intended for such patients as are able to pay for treatment. The dispensary is in the room which was once Mr. Packer's library. None of the adornments that made the house so attractive in his time have been removed, and the hospital has been made one of the most beautiful buildings, as well as one of the best suited for its purposes, of any in the country. The dispensary was furnished by an auxiliary branch in Owego, N. Y., the staff dining-room, on the ground floor, was provided with furniture and dishes by the people of Towanda, Penn., the warden's office and trustees' room was cared for by the people of Waverly, N. Y., the linen was provided by the people of Sayre, the kitchen and laundry were equipped by the people of Athens, and the resident physician's department was furnished by Mr. William Stevenson, the president of the Lehigh Valley Railroad.

The president is Mr. William Stevenson, the warden the Rev. W. B. Morrow, the secretary Mr. R. M. Hovey, the treasurer Mr. J. W. Bishop. The trustees are among the best known citizens of New York and Pennsylvania. The attending physicians are Drs. W. E. Johnson, Anderson, and Kline. The chief consulting physician is Dr. W. L. Estes of St. Luke's Hospital, Bethlehem, Penn., and the house surgeon is Dr. Franklin M. Stephens.

The gift consists of the house and grounds alone, and the hospital must be supported by private and public subscription. For this purpose auxiliary branches have been organized in Sayre and the neighboring places in New York and Pennsylvania. Three hundred dollars a year will endow a bed, and some beds are already endowed.

The ceremonies at the opening of the institution were brief, but impressive, and took place in the grand dining-room, now the male ward. A short address was made by the Hon. William Smythe, and the Rev. W. B. Morrow, the warden, said a prayer of consecration, and declared the hospital formally opened.

The hospital will accommodate about twenty or thirty patients, and the first was expected in a few days from Owego, N. Y.

MARYLAND.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—St. John's Church.—Since the last enlargement of this church (the Rev. Dr. W. A. Leonard, rector), it is capable of seating 1,200. The rector has charge of 370 families, of some 1,500 members, and has baptized since May of 1884 no less than 205 persons, 196 of them being infants. He and his assistants have delivered since the same time over 600 sermons. The parish now embraces about 800 communicants; pupils in the Sunday-schools 600. Including salaries of the corps of three clergy the parish will report $32,500, $2,000 of which is Communion alms. Five parochial schools of thirty teachers and 360 pupils are taught. The colored work has the special oversight of an assistant. The orphanage has received $1,500 from Government.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Grace Church, South Washington.—Since the Rev. John W. Phillips assumed charge of this parish, which was early in January last, the moneys raised were nearly $600. The Sunday-school has increased to some 160, and the list of communicants to some 100.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Trinity Parish.—The Rev. Dr. Addison is the rector of this parish, which now enrolls some 360 communicants, and raised for parochial and diocesan work this year $4,600 and over. He is more generally called on to marry than any of our rectors, and has, the year just ended, married no less than forty-eight couples. His Sunday-school numbers 500.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Washington Parish.—The sum of $2,000 nearly has been paid by this parish (the Rev. C. D. Andrews, rector,) in settlement of a debt of that amount on the parish buildings, and other improvements are to be made on the chapel. In all, $3,697 were raised during the year past, all save some $240 being expended for parochial purposes. Twenty communicants have been added to the parish list, making the present number 313. Two hundred families constitute this the venerable mother parish of the district, embracing some six or seven hundred individuals. The rector has preached 290 sermons in the past twelve months, administering the Holy Communion on fifty-three occasions.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—St. Luke's Church.—The colored work in this parish (the Rev. Dr. Alex. Crummell, rector,) now owns $22,000 in a church and other church property. Two hundred and forty-three communicants, and 150 Sunday-school pupils. Five hundred and fifty is the number which the individuals within the cure of the Rev. Dr. Crummell is supposed to aggregate.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Church of the Epiphany.—The rector of the Epiphany (the Rev. Dr. S. Giesy,) has received the sum of $150 towards aiding the widow of one of our clergy lately passed to his rest. The sewing school now numbers 234, with an average attendance for the last reported period of 190, 347 garments having been made and distributed.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—St. Paul's Church.—The outside work on the addition to this church (the Rev. W. M. Barker, rector,) is nearly finished. New choir stalls are asked for by the rector as memorials. The offerings for the month of June amounted to $157.65; total offerings of this parish for the year, $5,583. The church, when enlarged according to the plan now in execution, will seat 500. It has 225 communicants, a parish school numbering 35 pupils, and in Sunday-school 150.

WEST WASHINGTON, D. C.—Christ Church.—The old church building of this parish (the Rev. A. R. Stuart, rector,) is in process of demolition to give place for a new and more imposing edifice. On Sunday, July 12th, the last service in the old church was held. The new structure will cost about $40,000, and will be built of dark red brick, with buff-colored Ohio stone trimmings, and will seat six hundred people. There will be a double-arched chancel, and the interior will be handsomely fitted up, and a new organ will be purchased. A chapel will be connected with the church.

WEST WASHINGTON, D. C.—St. John's Church.—This parish (the Rev. J. S. Lindsay, rector,) has raised since last annual report $4,250; in the five and a half years of the present rec-torship $38,000. The present roll of communicants numbers 330. Nearly 200 communicants have been added by the present incumbent. Ten committees are in the nature of assistant ministers in the parish, while the parish owns $42,000 worth of property in the shape of church, chapel and parsonage. The late Rev. John H. Chew assisted frequently in the public services of this venerable parish, and his presence and voice were ever welcome both by rector and people.

BALTIMORE—Grace Church.—The Rev. Dr. Henry A. Coit, rector of St. Paul's School, Concord, N. H., who was elected rector of Grace Church, Baltimore, in succession to the late Rev. Dr. Leeds, has declined the election.

VIRGINIA.

FAIRFAX COUNTY—Mission Work.—There is much that may be called real missionary work going on among the poor in various parts of Virginia which escapes notice. This is partly owing to the present enthusiasm over the good work which is being accomplished for the colored people, partly because this mission work, much of it, is in the hands of Churchmen and women at a distance from towns and large or wealthy parishes. One of these is in Fairfax county, near Burke's Station. Six or more years ago a Sunday-school was opened in a school house at a distance of several miles from any church, almost in the woods, two or three ladies and gentlemen being the only Church people in the neighborhood; all others were mostly Baptists, a few were Methodists. With some opposition, the school soon became a success. It is in what has been known for a hundred years as "Truro parish," of which old Christ church in Alexandria and Pohick were at that period the principal churches. This mission is nearer Emmanuel, at Fairfax Court-house, than any other of the Truro churches. The superintendent rides from there every Sunday. The rector (the Rev. Frank Page) gives services when he can. Over forty children and adults have been baptized, two confirmed, since the opening of the school. For over two years the Rev. Mr. Wallis, from Pohick, has held a monthly service in the school-house, which is well filled, and much interest is shown. The moral improvement in the whole community is the subject of comment, even by those who at first opposed the movement. A church building is an absolute necessity to the continuance of this mission. For five or six years these two or three have struggled to raise money for that purpose. A year ago a good foundation was built, but there was not enough money to do more. Then Mrs. Harrison of New York, a native of Virginia and of Fairfax county, gave $300. This was a great lift. The contract has been made for enclosing the building, the framing is up, soon the roof and weather-boarding will be on, but there is neither flooring, nor windows, nor doors. Are there not some kind friends who are able and glad to help their co-laborers in the field who will aid in making it possible to hold services in this Church of the Good Shepherd! Any such, who will send to either Mrs. Upton H. Herbert, Burke's, Fairfax county, Va., the Rev. Frank Page, Fairfax Court-house, Va., or the Rev. S. A. Wallis, Pohick, Accotink P. O., Fairfax county, Va., will receive grateful acknowledgment.

PALATKA—Convocation.—The Eastern Convocation of the diocese met on Tuesday, June 23d, in St. Mark's church, Palatka, (the Rev. S. A. Williams, rector.) Evening Prayer was said at 8 P.M., and the sermon was preached by the Rev. C. B. Wilmer. At a business meeting the Rev. A. W. Knight was elected secretary.

There was a celebration of the Holy Eucharist at 9 A.M., on Wednesday, immediately after which the convocation met in the school building. Communications from other convocations were read, and a committee was appointed to select topics for the next meeting. The Rev. J. R. Bicknell read an earnest and able paper on the subject, "How to Deepen the Spiritual Life of our People." The Rev. F. B. Dunham opened the discussion on the subject, "How to Train Sunday-school Teachers."

In the afternoon the Woman's Auxiliary was addressed by the rector of the parish, and in the evening addresses were made by the rector, the Rev. Dr. R. H. Weller, and the Rev. Messrs. S. B. Carpenter, W. Wilson, and E. L. Drown, and Col. Daniels.

The topics selected for the next meeting, which will be at Ocala in October, were, "The Duty of the Convocation to the Colored People" and "The Means of Deepening the Spiritual Life among the Clergy."

MISSISSIPPI.

VICKSBURG—St. Mary's Church.—The new church of St. Mary's, the church of the colored people, which was begun and nearly finished within sixty days, was opened for worship on the Fifth Sunday after Trinity (July 25th). The church stands on one of the many hills of Vicksburg, and within a stone's throw of the Court House, which, from its central position, overlooks the whole city. The lot is about sixty-five by seventy feet in size, and the church occupies all the available space. It is cruciform, and otherwise Churchly. Its numerous windows are beautifully finished in cathedral glass by Cox & Sons. In the sanctuary there is an altar of suitable size and design, the gift of a church in Baltimore. As yet there is no altar-piece; the cross is of gilded wood; the vases are only common flower-pots; the candlesticks only small china ones, with broken-off rims; credence and amboles are yet to be supplied. The only furniture yet in the choir are the lecturn and a read organ, the latter the gift of St. Andrew's church, Jackson. Deal chairs do duty for stalls. It has leaked out that at an early day the episcopal throne of the diocese will stand here. The nave is furnished with some three or four hundred chairs, leaving space for as many more. The interior is altogether unfinished, requiring to be ceiled, painted or oiled.

But the building and its appointments are, after all, the least interesting features of this remarkable work. The large congregations which greeted the assistant-bishop both morning and evening, their quiet, orderly and devout behaviour, and their manifest anxiety to go forward, give token of new things, new purpose and new life on the part of the colored people, while the making of it possible betokens not less a new purpose and a new life in the Church herself.

The large choir of about thirty boys—little colored fellows—and men, in cassock andotta, followed by half a dozen clergy and the assistant-bishop, and led by a handsome little crucifer, bearing a red-painted cross, proceeded down the aisle and up to their places. The singing was well done, not by the choir alone but also by the whole congregation. The service was, in the morning a choral celebration of the Holy Eucharist, the assistant-bishop celebrating and preaching; in the evening choral Evensong, the assistant-bishop again preaching. When it is remembered that two months ago not one of the congregation had ever heard a choral service, the labor of the careful and painstaking priest in charge of this mission (the Rev. Nelson Ayres) can be appreciated.

After the sermon in the evening the candidates for confirmation were summoned by name, and twenty-two responded (all adults) and received the "laying-on of hands."

Altogether St. Mary's is a wonderful success. The money used, about $3,000, has come mainly from outside the diocese. Five or six hundred more will be required before the church can be completed and furnished. Bishop Thompson's post-office address is Oxford, Miss.—a money-order office, by the way.

INDIANA.

EPISCOPAL ACTS.—On the Second Sunday after Trinity the bishop of the diocese used the beautiful Office of Institution in St. Paul's church, Richmond, instituting the Rev. Frank Hallam as successor to the Rev. Dr. J. B. Wakefield, who for thirty years had been rector. The bishop preached on the mutual relation of pastor and people and the reflex influence each has, or should have, on the other.

On the Fourth Sunday after Trinity the same office was used by the bishop, in the venerable parish of St. James, Vincennes, where the Rev. Dr. Austin was rector many years, and where he died about a year ago. The Rev. Peter Macfarlane was instituted into the rectorship. Mr. Macfarlane has been in charge since January 1st, and in that time has presented a class of twenty-two for confirmation, and made many improvements in the church and services. Seldom have we worshipped with a congregation where the worship is more orderly and hearty.

A valuable mission property, chapel and two lots, have been secured by Mr. Macfarlane through the generosity of a parishioner in coming forward to advance the necessary means, and a Sunday-school, an industrial school, and weekly service maintained.

The mission is situated among the homes of the working-class, and already sixty of their children are enrolled in the school. Mr. Macfarlane also maintains a monthly service in the neighboring towns of Washington and Petersburg, with occasional services at Sullivan and Shoals. The bishop preached at the institution service, the rector celebrating Holy Communion, as required by the office. Already Bishop Knickerbocker has instituted six rectors into their parishes with prospect of permanent pastoral relations.

On the Fifth Sunday after Trinity, in Trinity church, Fort Wayne, the bishop preached twice to large congregations, confirmed seven persons presented by the rector, the Rev. W. N. Webbo. In this church a vested choir of men and boys was introduced on Whitsunday, trained by the rector. They render the service beautifully. This makes five vested choirs in the diocese, with another in training; a gain of four since the advent of the present bishop.

On St. John Baptist Day the bishop, assisted by the Masonic order and a large congregation, laid the corner-stone of St. John's church in the mission at Rockville. This mission is in charge of the Rev. Dr. Delafield, rector of St. Stephen's church, Terre Haute, who gives them one week-day service every week, and has interested a number of people in its welfare. The vested choir of St. Stephen's, Terre Haute, was present, and rendered the music delightfully. Two services were held in the Methodist church, at which the choir rendered the music much to the edification of a large congregation of strangers to the Church. The bishop preached and addressed the congregation at each service, and also gave an address at the laying of the corner stone. At one of the services the warden of the mission presented a deed of a lot which he had purchased at a cost of $250. It is hoped the church will be completed in the autumn.

Tuesday, July 7th, the bishop consecrated St. Philip's church, North Liberty, a beautiful Gothic church in a rural town, seven miles from a railway. The sermon was preached by Dean Deane, formerly a lay reader and teacher in the mission. The instrument of donation was read by the Rev. Mr. Orpen, and the letter of consecration by the Rev. R. S. Eastman, missionary in charge. The church, though built some years ago, has recently been renovated and improved, and the mission is in a flourishing condition.

SUMMARY OF STATISTICS.—We find statistics as follows in the journal of the forty-eighth convention: Clergy, including the bishop, 39; ordinations, 6; candidates for orders, 1; lay-readers, 30; churches consecrated, 2; corner-stones laid, 2; parishes and missions, 49; churches and chapels, 50; baptisms, 481; confirmations, 329; communicants, 4,422; Sunday-school scholars, 2,912; value of property $474,450; offerings, $87,950.33. Bishop Knickerbocker confines himself in his address to diocesan matters.

WISCONSIN.

BISHOP'S VISITATIONS.—The bishop of the diocese is engaged in a visitation of the North-western Convocation District. He visited Christ church, Chippewa Falls, (the Rev. S. J. Yndt, rector,) on Sunday, July 5th, and confirmed twelve persons. St. Luke's Hospital, in care of Mr. Yndt, continues its good work. During the week the bishop visited the missions at Rice Lake, Hayward, Superior, Shell Lake, Cumberland, New Richmond, and Star Prairie.

The atmosphere in this great pine region is healthful and invigorating even in mid-summer, and the growth of the little towns in this portion of the diocese is very marked. The Church is striving to keep pace with this growth. There are church-buildings at Rice Lake, Shell Lake, and Cumberland. Three hundred dollars would complete the chapel at Cumberland, and a like sum would encourage the few at Hayward to begin work.

FOND DU LAC.

RIPON.—Ordination.—Trinity Sunday, May 31st, witnessed very solemn and impressive services at St. Peter's church, on the occasion of the ordination of Mr. Lucius D. Hopkins, as deacon. The Holy Communion was celebrated, chorally, by the bishop, assisted by the Rev. O. S. Prescott, rector, the Rev. Fayette Durlin of Madison, the Rev. W. R. Gardner, and the Rev. H. B. St. George. The Rev. Mr. Durlin presented the candidate, and preached. The service was of peculiar interest, as Mr. Hopkins had been born in the parish, and educated under the care of the Rev. Mr. Durlin, for many years rector of St. Peter's. In the evening, the Rev. Mr. Gardner and St. George said the prayers, and the bishop preached. The Third Sunday after Trinity, the bishop visited the parish and confirmed four candidates, giving an address at the morning service, and preaching in the evening. During the summer the Rev. Allen Prescott, lately ordained deacon, at Milwaukee, is to assist his uncle, the present rector of the parish.—Diocesan Paper.

SUMMARY OF STATISTICS.—In the journal of the thirty-seventh annual convention, we find statistics as follows: Clergy, including the bishop, 52; candidates for Orders, 3; ordinations, 7; lay-readers, 30; corner-stones laid, 3; churches or chapels consecrated, 8; parishes, 58; missions, 45; baptisms, 626; confirmations, 435; communicants, 4,646; members of Sunday-school, 4,545; contributions, $11,770.38; value of church property, $1,043,072.00. The address of the bishop is confined to diocesan matters.

COLORADO.

LEADVILLE.—St. George's Church.—On account of failing health, the Rev. John Grey, the rector of this parish, has been obliged to tender his resignation. The resignation was very reluctantly accepted by the vestry a few weeks since. The resignation was learned with deep regret by the citizens of Leadville, who recognized the value of Mr. Grey's faithful services, not only in building up and adding to his congregation, but also in his influence for good in the community. Mr. Grey and his family have gone to Poncha Springs, where he is resting from his long and arduous duties, which were particularly trying at the high altitude of this Rocky Mountain city.

ARKANSAS.

SUMMARY OF STATISTICS.—We find statistics as follows in the journal of the thirteenth annual convention: Clergy, including the bishop, 16; parishes, 19; baptisms, 152; confirmations, 103; communicants, 1,366; Sunday-school scholars and teachers, 1,066; offerings, $11,449.90. The bishop, in his address, confines himself to diocesan affairs.

OREGON.

PORTLAND.—Good Samaritan Hospital.—The Good Samaritan Hospital has just received a contribution of $3,000 from Philadelphia, for the endowment of a free bed, to be known as the "George C. Morris Memorial Bed." Bishop Morris stated to the convocation that there were now six such endowed beds in the hospital, which bear the following names: "S. Morris Wain," "Mary and Lewis Flinders," "Grace Charlotte Stark," "Henry Rodney Morris Memorial," "British Vice-Consulate," and "George C. Morris Memorial." Each of these endowments will provide constant care and attention of a free patient. Other endowments are begun, one in the name of St. MARK'S SCHOOL, SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH.—This school commenced its eighteenth year June 1st. The number of pupils enrolled during the past year was 697. There were 1250 connected with this school since its origin in 1873. Of these 3,100 were of Mormon antecedents.

The Commencement took place on July 15th. Five scholars graduated from the High School Department, four of whom were of Mormon parentage. The exercises were read at the evening chapel at the school, and in the evening, at St. Mark's Cathedral, after a formal service rendered by the pupils and addressed by Bishop Chapin, who presided at the ceremony. Twenty-eight young ladies have been prepared for teachers by the school, and one clerkship in the school was a graduate of St. Mark's, and five young men who have graduated are now at the East studying for their degrees. Two boys from the school are at Columbia College, and two go on this fall to St. Paul's, Concord.

HOWLAND HALL, SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH.—This boarding school for girls has finished its fourth year, and is beginning to take a secure position in giving to girls a thorough Church and Christian training. There has been an attendance of eighty members of the boarders. The Commencement was held Wednesday morning, June 17th, at St. Mark's Cathedral. The girls, dressed in white, were singing in the procession. The service was a beautiful scene, that touched many hearts. The only graduate was Carrie T. Davis, daughter of Geo. and Della B. Davis, of Idaho. Her part of Morning Prayer, rendered chorally by the pupils, and an address by the Rev. G. D. H. Miller, together with a few words of exhortation and fatherly counsel, delivered the diploma to the candidate. The efficient administration of the principal during the last year renders the outlook for the school hopeful and encouraging.

MRS. JOSEPHINE DAVIS OSBORN.

Entered into rest June 30th, 1885, at Laing, Texas. JOSEPHINE, beloved wife of David Gregg, Esq., in her 82d year.

Mrs. JOSEPHINE DAVIS GARGO was born September 2d, 1802, in Wilmington, N. C., where her life was spent until her first marriage, when she married David Gregg, Esq., third son of the Bishop of Texas, and moved to Laing, Texas, just founded.

Her husband's death has been anticipated from one so closely connected with those whose lives were devoted to the extension of the kingdom of God.

Baptized in infancy, at fourteen she received confirmation at the hands of her diocesan bishop, William North Carolina, and during her life in Wilmington was the zealous promoter, according to her opportunities, of all good works.

Her death was coming to Texas, she transferred to the Mission of the Annunciation at Laing the energy that had at home marked her life.

Her death next year her health perceptibly failed, and when in May, a serious operation seemed necessary, she with Christian fortitude served herself to meet it, despite fever followed, and upon the 29th of June, the end being near, she received with joy and perfect resignation the Blessed Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ.

Throughout the celebration of the Office she sustained the responsive portions, and the benediction was pronounced over her, and she lifted in thanksgiving to the Holy Trinity the conforts of His holy religion. Consoled by a perfect trust in the mercy of the precious Blood of Christ, she calmly awaited the great change. At 10 o'clock, on the morning of June 8th, with the words "I am going into the arms of my Father,"

That afternoon at sunset, the Church of the Annunciation, Laing, was filled with sorrowing neighbors, who had been invited to the funeral service of the Office of the Church. As her body lay before the costly shroud, her praise was found in the appropriate words of the declaration, "and upon every day for in all she had taken her part while she had time. So has departed one who as daughter, wife and mother, has left a precious mission to her country, and comes from the good confession of Jesus Christ our Lord.

For all thy saints who from their labor rest—who Thee by faith before the world confessed—Thy name O Jesus be forever blessed." B. W. B. E.

APPEALS.

Spending two or three days at this mission station, I have had the joy of learning from the Indian agent at Neah Bay, (Washington Territory) that the Rev. J. H. Forrest-Bell, formerly the faithful teacher there, has been invited to return and act as teacher and missionary to the Makah tribe on the coast.

Mr. Bell, whose heart is in this self-denying, truly Christian work, accepts the position, but desires, before he starts, that mission funds be expended a few hundred or a thousand dollars, to be expended in securing and improving a building for services.

I heartily commend him and his undertaking to Christian people desirous of doing something for the temporal welfare and the eternal salvation of the aborigines of our land, who have so frequently been wronged and injured by their white brethren. That either of us should be expected with the approval and under the supervision of the Missionary Bishop, J. J. A. FADDUCK, Missionary Bishop, Washington Territory, Port Townsend, Wash. Ter., June 16th, 1885.

THE Rev. Sherman Coolidge is a full-blooded Arapahoe Indian. He was educated by Bishop Whipple in the diocese of Oregon and is in priest's orders. No appropriation has been made by the Board of Missions for his salary, and we have no means to erect the small house he has for, which seems to be indispensable to his work among his people. Last year special offerings sufficient to pay him a salary of $300 were now exhausted. The Board, in response to an appeal from Bishop Whipple, will not the friends of the Indian mission work stop, again, some to our relief? It is necessary that I should receive in special offerings at least $600 for his salary for next year, from September 1, and also the means to erect for him a small house which shall also serve for a chapel.

J. F. SPALDING, Provisional Bishop of Colorado, Denver, Colorado, July 10, 1885.

NASHOTAH MISSION.

It has not pleased the Lord to endow Nashotah. The great and good work entrusted to her requires, as in times past, the offerings of His people.

Offerings are solicited. 1st. Because Nashotah is the oldest theological seminary north and west of the State of Ohio. 2d. Because the instruction is second to none in the land. 3d. Because it is the most healthfully situated seminary.

4th. Because it is the best located for study. 5th. Because everything given is applied directly to the work of preparing candidates for ordination. Address, Nashotah, Washburn county, Wisconsin.

St. Paul's church, Bantoni, Ill., is a poor struggling parish, in the poorest diocese (St. Louis) in the United States. For the last two years, having no rector, the services have been held by a lay reader as often as possible. Gladly through the efforts of a few noble women, a small rectory has been almost erected. The funds, unfortunately, are now exhausted, and a debt of more than $200 hangs over this faithful number. It may seem small, but to us it is very great, for we cannot get it by any means. We will not some kind Christians help us? Their gifts will be very welcome, and they may rest assured we have added a good word. Address R. MACKELLAR, Jr., Bantoni, Ill. Minister-in-charge.

THE EVANGELICAL EDUCATION SOCIETY aide young men who are preparing for the work of the Protestant Episcopal Church. It needs a large amount of money for the present year. "Give and it shall be given unto you." Rev. ROBERT C. MATLACK, 125 Chestnut Mt., Philadelphia.

THE CATHEDRAL OF NEW YORK.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Let me say by way of preface that although the rule which you have adopted of late years requiring communications to be signed by the writers no doubt has some advantages, yet it is not unfrequently a hindrance to the writing of things which ought to be valued. There are many cases in which one feels that a certain thing should be said, and yet he is not so egotistical as to wish to thrust his own individuality into the matter. The world is critical, and a reasonably modest man does not like to subject himself to the suggestion that he is anxious for notoriety, or has an itching to see his name in print. In almost all cases where the subject is of general interest, it is so easy to say of the writer of a communication, "Why does this man put himself forward in this matter? How is it his business more than that of a hundred others? Why does not he wait until those better qualified have spoken?" etc., and so, to avoid this kind of criticism, what might have been a word fitly spoken is left unsaid. In nearly all cases it is the substance of what is written that is important, and not the name of the writer; and I have in my collection of bishop's autographs a good illustration of what I have just suggested, in a communication addressed to a leading Church paper by the late Presiding Bishop, to which is appended a note saying that so averse was he to taking any personal part in a controversy, that he would prefer to have his article rejected entirely than to have it appear with either initials or nomme de plume that could be recognized as his.

It seemed to me at the time of the inspiring ceremonies of the consecration of the Cathedral of Long Island, that one of the thoughts that must force itself on every mind, was as to the long and strange delay in the erection of a cathedral in the great City of New York. On such a subject those who are not connected are, of course the most proper ones to speak, and so I have waited from week to week thinking that some words would come from them, called forth by the late event at Garden City. But, after all, New York is the metropolis of the nation, and belongs to us all; and with hundreds of thousands of us who are not counted in the population of the city, it is the home of the busy working hours of the day, if not of the night.

And so, with all diffidence, I suggest to the Churchmen of New York whether it is not time that the American Church should have some visible, central temple in the greatest American city. The Cathedral of New York was incorporated long before the incorporation of those of Albany and Long Island, and while in the latter exceptional circumstances have attended the erection of its cathedral, yet in Albany all that has been so admirably done toward the realization of the cathedral system in church and home, which has not been accomplished by the unaided efforts of the people of a diocese far from rich, Nebraska and Colorado, though weak in numbers and poor in purse, have built their cathedrals at Omaha and Denver long since the Cathedral of St. John the Divine was incorporated for the great and rich Diocese of New York, and the foreign Church, alien in ideas and government, has erected its magnificent cathedral at the highest point in the most beautiful avenue of the city, while the American Church itself has not even laid the foundation of its great central temple.

I remember thinking, when a boy, that the most glorious celebrity which any one could attain in this generation would be as the giver of the first dollar toward the building of the Cathedral of New York, and the passage of many years has not changed that idea. One of the most conspicuous of our public edifices traces its history back to the single dollar given by a man with faith to see what the future would require, and who was so sure that there must be a beginning. Of course, in the case of a great diocese, wiser plans can be adopted. But it certainly is not out of place to draw attention to the danger of delay, at least in procuring the site for the future cathedral. Apart from the rapid rise in values, the remaining vacant blocks that are suitable are already very few. Even now the expense of the land alone will be an amount almost large enough to have erected the building years ago, and if delay takes place until every available site is occupied, the enormous expense entailed by the purchase of the existing structures is added. The building of the cathedral of a metropolis, larger by far than was any city of the Old World at the time almost large enough to have erected the building, may well be the work of many years; but may we not hope that the Churchmen of New York will see to it, as prudent men as well as large-hearted Christians, that the land for its site is secured before the coming of 1886.

A WORTHY OBJECT.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Will you, for the Master's sake and the sake of these poor Arrapahoes, print this extract from my last address to the Council of Minnesota?

"The history of Mr. Coolidge is a marked evidence of the providence of God. Born a heathen child, he was picked up after a battle with the Indians and taken to the Seminary. Baptized and nurtured in a Christian family he grew up a thoughtful Christian boy. I received him in Shattuck School. He developed into a manly youth. One day he said to me: 'My people have never heard of the Saviour. If possible, I would like to become a missionary, and go back to tell my kinsmen of the love of our Christ.' He became a candidate for Holy Orders, and completed honorably his course in Seabury Divinity School. Last fall he went to the Arrapahoe Indians, a missionary. He was welcomed as one from the dead by his mother and kindred. We hope under God he will be the instrument to lead his people to the light of Christ's cross."

I received this week the following letter, which has touched me deeply:

"I write you on behalf of the Rev. Sherman Coolidge. It has become necessary that some sort of a dwelling place, a small building of two or more rooms, shall be erected for his home. As he has been living in the Government School House and teaching small children, on Sundays holding services at the fort and town of Lander. He can never accomplish anything as a missionary to his people in this way. If he has a roof to cover him and means given for his support, Bishop Spalding thinks he can do great work for his people. They love and reverence him, and are proud of their 'Arrapahoe white man.' I fully agree with all this gentleman says. Will not those who pity this poor people, who have suffered great things at our hands, send good Bishop Spalding, at Denver, the means for this work? It would be a great sorrow to have Sherman leave his people for lack of support."

H. B. WHIFFLE,

Bishop of Minnesota.

NEITHER THERewith NOR THEREIN.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

I send you herewith an extract from a carefully prepared review of "The Administration of Holy Baptism to Infants" as presented by "The Book Annexed," which I wrote about six weeks ago and is not yet published, which in my judgment fully meets the difficulty proposed by my brother, the Rev. Isaac Martin, M.D., in your issue of the 11th inst.

EXTRACT.

"In the ninth line of the Consecration Prayer, on page 273 of 'The Book Annexed,' omit the word 'therein,' because it is superfluous, and also, if allowed to remain, it demands baptism by immersion, a mode not often used now. If the administration is by pouring, 'therein' is surely out of place," (as for sprinkling, mentioned by your correspondent, it is a mode which is not recognized by the Catholic Church). "If holy baptism be administered by trine affusion (pouring), then evidently the word should be 'therewith.' On examination, however, it will be found that the word 'therein' is not required."

A CAUTION.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Permit me to warn the people of New York and its vicinity, especially the clergy, against a young man of pleasing address, good manners, and well dressed, who is trying an old swindling game with the clergy and others. He gives a name, generally a good one, and says he is on the way from Shrewsbury to some place on the Hudson River, to attend a wedding, sometimes of a friend, and sometimes of a relative, and finally offers himself without a pocket-book, and with only a few cents in his pocket. He may be recognized by his teeth, which are noticeable, one or two being missing from the left side of his mouth.

He has given in New York, to my knowledge, the names of Livingstone and Finlay, and in Elizabeth he has called himself Van Rensselaer.

As I hear of his using my name pretty freely in his attempts, I beg to warn my brethren against him as a fraud, and hope, if he is caught, that he may be handed over to the police.

MISSIONERS FOR THE ADVENT MISSION.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

The publication of the list of "possible missioners" in some of the Church papers is unauthorized. It was sent to certain rectors who desired it as a private memorandum furnished by the Mission Committee of such clergymen at home, and in England and Canada, as in their judgment might be available as missioners. It was understood that the committee had no authority to say that the Clergymen would engage in the New York Mission, but only that it was hoped they might, in sufficient numbers, to supply the need.

In justice to the gentlemen whose names appear on the list, as well as to the committee, please give this explanation to your readers.

NEW BOOKS.

HISTORY OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH. By Philip Schaff. Vol. IV. Medieval Christianity. From August 1st to August 31st, A. D. 1024. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1883.) pp. 726.

Of the indefatigable industry of Dr. Schaff, of his general fairness and impartiality, at least, in intention, of his great erudition, and of the value to the student of his magnus opus, the "History of the Christian Church," in the three volumes, devoted to its origin and earlier years, we have already spoken in our notices of the volumes as they appeared. Those volumes were a laborious revision, with many additions and changes, and they gave the author a high rank as a historian, though they were not free from blemishes and defects. They deserved to be read, but to be read with care, for every now and then the evidences of theological bias cropped out, and if the author gave facts of history they were facts that had been arranged by Dr. Schaff and distilled in an alembic of his own choosing. It is said of Bishop Burnet's notable chapter on the XVII. of our Articles of Religion, that he gave with such fairness and moderation the various interpretations of it, as held by our theologians, and so arrayed the arguments for each and the objections, that no one could infer to which of the interpretations he himself held, or if he held to either. Dr. Schaff does not and can not write history upon that plan, and with all his ability and learning he is not able to make us forget that he is a Presbyterian divine; he does not forget it himself. The same remark will apply to this volume of Medieval Christianity, which is a new work, and a continuation of his "History of the Christian Church," and which, like the former portion, we judge, will extend to three portly volumes. This first volume, we think, will be the most important of the three, and the most interesting; it deals with facts and events second in interest only to the foundation of Christianity itself. It has for its themes the conversion of the barbarous nations of Europe, beginning with that of England, the rise and rapid spread of Mohammedanism and its relation to Christianity, the growth of the papacy and its corruption, and the great schism between the East and the West, themes worthy of the study of the noblest minds, and which may well kindle the enthusiasm of the historian and the interest of the philosopher. In connection with these themes the historian discusses the morals and religion of the time, the influence of the convents in the middle ages, which we see in England are coming to be spoken of by the euphemism of "clerical households," Church discipline, Church and State, worship and ceremonies, doctrinal controversies, heretical sects, and the state of learning. These topics are treated with great fulness and learning, and it is one of the merits of Dr. Schaff that he is not afraid to give his authorities and thus enable the student to correct his mistakes of doctrine or of fact. Thus while he admits that it was not impossible that the Church in Great Britain was of apostolic origin, and that at any rate it was in existence at least as early as 209, he is easily disposed to reject as legendary much of its history in the times before the mission of St. Augustine. He allows that there are monumental remains of it while the Romans still possessed the isle, and they departed in 410, nearly two hundred years before Augustin. Dr. Schaff admits all that is necessary in regard to the early existence of the English Church, and he gives authorities which sustain, in our judgment, much that he denies. It is truth of history, and not legends and myths. So in the history of the eucharistic controversies, while he rightly rejects as having no historical foundation the substantialiation of Rome, he is not able to see that the jejune theory of Calvin has no one historical fact to rest upon, but was entirely new and therefore new. It is upon such points that even in history Dr. Schaff cannot be entirely relied upon, but we must read between the lines and recur to his own authorities to get at the true facts. The author may be unconscious of it, but his Presbyterianism makes him see through a glass darkly just as they say a jaundiced man sees all things yellow. With this caution we cordially commend the volume as able and learned, and as a valuable contribution to ecclesiastical history. The final chapter contains biographical sketches of the Greek and Latin ecclesiastical writers of the period, and, with the exception of a small portion of it, was written by the Rev. Samuel Jackson, under Dr. Schaff's direction. There is an index and a colored map, and the typography, paper and general make-up of the volume is creditable to a work so important and to the publishers.

HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, FROM THE DISCOVERY OF THE CONTINENT. By GEORGE BANCRIFT. The Author's Last Revision. Volume VI. (New York: D. Appleton & Co., 1885.) pp. 572.

The first volume of Bancroft's "History of the United States" was published in 1834, and the last in 1873. It took rank at once as a standard, and the author has now, after more than fifty years, given us a new and revised edition, the one by which he himself desires to stand or fall. At more than fourscore years of age it may be safely said that the author's work upon this history is completed. He has expended upon it the conscientious toil of a half century, and his work is, and long will be an authority in all the world. This sixth volume is, in some respects, and especially to statesmen, the most interesting of all. It gives the history of the formation of the American Constitution, tracing its progress from the loose articles of the confederation to the establishment of the stable government of 1789, and a study of this volume will afford a clear view of the difficulty and magnitude of the task that devolved upon the thirteen exhausted colonies, and of their remarkable success, which the lapse of time has proved. The patient student in the abstract of the debates in the conventions and in the narrative of the successive steps that were taken in its making, will obtain new views of the meaning of the Constitution itself, and in this way the history may be regarded as an exposition of the fundamental law. The venerable historian has outlived the political heats of the generation in which he himself was a prominent actor, and in his narrative and discussion has looked upon his subject with a judicial mind. If there are any disposed to differ with him in regard to fact or law, they will find in foot notes the historian's authorities, and by their aid can investigate the subject anew. The prolonged life of Mr. Bancroft has been of great service to his history, how great those only can say who compare the present with the first edition, for he has not feared to admit an error of opinion or of fact, and to correct it. This history is one of the most important of the contributions to the literature of this country, and deserves a place in every library. It is admirably printed, and this final volume has a good likeness of the historian, and a full index to the whole work by Dr. J. A. Spencer has been added.

HISTORY OF CHRISTIAN NAMES. By Charlotte M. Yonge. New Edition Revised. (London, Paris and New York: Macmillan & Co., 1885.) pp. cxiiv. 45s.

The first edition of this valuable work was published in 1863, and was a monument to the patient research and untiring industry of the author. It was begun for amusement, but soon became a subject of absorbing interest, and before it was put to press it had the benefit of twenty years of toil, and it had led Miss Yonge into many strange by-paths of literature. To do the subject full justice, and she does not claim to have done this, required an acquaintance with language, philology, ethnology, hagiology, history, and antiquities. When the author began her work she was entering upon an almost untrodden field, especially in English and Saxon nomenclature, but she was to be daunted by no difficulties, and in spite of them gave to the world a nearly exhaustive history of Christian names as derived from Hebrew, Persian, Greek, Latin, Celtic, Teutonic, and Slavonic sources. The volume opens with a glossary in which the names are referred to their language and to their root, and their signification is given. This is followed by a history of Christian names which occupies the greater part of the volume, and is divided into seven parts, according to the origin of the names treated in them. It is full of curious information, legends, and myths, and though but a history of names, is of greater interest than many histories of deeds. Of many of the names tabular forms are given in the various languages. Thus we have the name George in twenty-four languages, with the feminine forms of it in five languages. It is often an anxious question with parents: "What shall we name the baby?" By the help of Miss Yonge's volume they cannot only select easily but wisely, and give names that shall have appropriateness, significance, and beauty, and the clergy, who are often called to advise in the matter, will find it very useful. In this revised edition many errors have been removed and corrections made. Miss Yonge has written much, her works enjoy a large popularity; but in sterling worth and importance we think her "History of Christian Names" leads all the rest and will outlast them all.

LITERARY LANDMARKS OF LONDON. By Laurence Hutton. (Boston: James R. Osgood & Co., 1885.) pp. 361.

This volume is the fruit of much labor and research. All cities are constantly undergoing change, old landmarks are destroyed, streets are renumbered and renamed, and a few years creates a city as new in appearance as in population. Even in a lifetime the street in which one was born may become strange. When, then, Mr. Hutton undertook to give some account of the haunts of the various authors and scholars who had given fame to London by their residence in it or visits to it, he entered upon a task of no small magnitude. The whole realm of literature, almost, was to be traversed, old maps, surveys, and directories were to be examined, tradition was to be sifted, and many a man might have looked back without putting his hand to the plough. It was not so with Mr. Hutton, and his industry and patience have had their reward. He has given us a volume of great value, and one which all lovers of letters will welcome. In alphabetical order he has arranged the denizens of literary London, telling us where they lived or lodged, the places to which they resorted, and giving here and there anecdotes and notices connecting them with the city. Few of the great stars in the English firmament of letters for three hundred years are missing, though Churchmen will wonder that the great Master of the Temple, the "judicious Hooker," should be omitted, when "honest Isaac" Walton, his quaint biographer, is named. But an omission here and there hardly detracts from the sterling value of the work which enabled one to visit so many of the haunts of genius. The volume has an index of persons and of places, and may be consulted, will be prized as a book of reference. It is a curious fact that the London journals have exhibited a genuine mortification over this book, because Mr. Hutton is an American, and they regret that it was not an Englishman who thus thoroughly and con amore searched out and described the "Landmarks of London."

THE STATESMAN'S YEAR BOOK. Statistical and Historical Annual of the States of the Civilized World for the Year 1885. Edited by J. Scott Keltie. (London and New York: Macmillan & Co., 1885.) pp. 908.

"The Statesman's Year Book," one of our very best reference books, grows fuller and better year by year. Its statistical tables and facts with reference to all the countries of the civilized world are drawn from official sources, and have been added to and changed as necessity and truth required. The editor, Mr. J. S. Keltie, spares no pains to make the work as perfect as possible, and the publishers give us the stores of information in convenient form and good type. The space to the several countries is well apportioned, the statistics and facts are orderly digested, and the volume admirably serves the purpose for which it was compiled—it is a statistical and historical hand-book for the civilized world.

MY SUMMER IN A GARDEN. By Charles Dudley Warner. (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co., 1885.) pp. 194.

When the essay on "Irish Bulls" first appeared agricultural societies vied with each other in ordering early copies for their libraries; we have no doubt horticultural societies will hasten to place "My Summer in a Garden" on their book-shelves. If they will read it they will be amply repaid, if not in their increased knowledge of Adam's calling, in their quiet enjoyment of its easy humor, satire and wit, to say nothing of its bits of morality and good advice. We are reminded, page after page, of genial Charles Lamb. Nineteen weeks are spent in the garden, and the author carries the reader with him by an irresistible charm, and gives him a living interest in his chases, plagues and pets. One may read it through and through without being able to distinguish green peas from string beans, but not without a good deal of love for Folly and a high respect for Calvin. Was there ever anything better than the final chapter, "Calvin, a Study of Character." Calvin was the author's cat, a quasi legacy from Harriet Beecher Stowe. These papers, originally written for the Courant, are published as one of the Riverside Series, and richly deserve the honor.

THE FIRST SIX BOOKS OF THE AENEID. With Explanatory Notes by Edward Seear. The Bucolics and Georgics. With Explanatory Notes, together with a Complete Vocabulary and an Appendix containing Dr. S. H. T. Parker's Questions on Virgil, and a Metrical Index. Illustrated with numerous engravings, and a Fac-Simile Page of one of the Oldest Existing Manuscripts of the Latin Text. [New York: A. S. Barnes & Co.] 1885. pp. xxii., 642.

The long title of this volume is sufficiently descriptive of its contents, and there is but little to add except that it is handsomely printed and upon good paper, and that one of its objects is to lessen the cost of appliances to young Latin students. They here find between the same covers text, dictionary and notes, and at moderate cost. The Aeneid, with the notes, were published by Mr. Seear substantially nearly twenty years ago, but Mr. Johnson, who is a professor in Lehigh University, now for the first time gives us his Bucolics and Georgics. With the notes, maps and engravings, the study of Virgil is made a delight, and the poorest boy may have a better text book than did of old the Dauphin of France, for whom the Delphin edition, with its ordo was prepared. Such an edition of the great Latin poet might tempt not only boys but men to renew their joys.

ARISTOPHANES'S CLOUDS. Edited by Professor M. W. Humphreys, of the University of Texas. [Boston: Ginn, Heath & Co.] 1885. pp. 252.

No publishing house is doing more service to the cause of education and high scholarship than the house whose imprint is on this volume. The text books which they publish are admirable for their importance and correctness. The "Clouds" is one of a series of Greek works which they are issuing, and is in clear, legible type and convenient form. It is based on Theodore Koch's third Berlin edition, following its text closely, its changes being chiefly in punctuation and orthography. The notes are almost entirely critical, explaining the text and the various readings, and the want of commentary is largely supplied by an excellent introduction translated almost entirely from Koch, and which gives an analysis of the comedy. The division into verses of the lyric portions follows the schemes of J. H. R. Schmidt, and there is a very full appendix on metres. The volume is in a high degree creditable to the scholarship of Professor Humphreys, and the students in our colleges will welcome a comedy which will show them how Socrates could be represented on the Athenian stage, and how the Clouds proved to be a brutum fulmen, and philosophy survived the satire and the wit.

LA CHANSON DE ROLAND. Translated by Leonore Rabillon. [New York: Henry Holt & Co. 1885.] pp. 31.

"La Chanson de Roland" is founded on the slaughter of a portion of the army of Charlemagne at Roncevaux, in the Pyrenees, in 778. It was a rear guard commanded by Roland, and surrounded by thousands of Gascons, owing to treachery, not a man survived to tell the tale. It soon became the subject of legend and of song. The poem, of which we here have an admirable translation by M. Rabillon, lecturer in Johns Hopkins University, dates from before the first crusade, in 1096, and was written in Norman French, but by whom is not certainly known, though the last line of the poem reads, "Thus endeth here the Geste, Turlokus sang." It at once grew into fame, and became the epic of France, as the "Iliad" was of Greece, or the "Nibelungen Lied" of Germany. There are parts of it full of spirit and life, as much so, perhaps, as the "Marselaise," and it is singular that we have never before had a good English version. The translator has followed Leon Gautier's seventh edition, making use of the old orthography and prosodic accent, but furnishing a glossary. M. Rabillon was well fitted for his task, and has infused the spirit of the original into his version.

PERSONAL TRAITS OF BRITISH ACTRESS. Edited by Edward T. Mason. With Portraits. [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. 1885.] pp. 384.

Hood, Macaulay, Sydney Smith, Jerrold, Dickens, Charlotte Bronte, and Thackeray are the subjects of this fourth and final volume of the series of the "Personal Traits of British Authors." The name of nearly every one of them is a "household word," and probably no better selection could have been made, though doubtless some will regret to note the absence of the names of Carlyle and George Eliot. These sketches are not biographies, nor memoirs, nor lives, but a collection of the personal traits of these authors, and of anecdotes which illustrate their character. They are fairly done, setting down nothing in malice and extenuating nothing, giving their foibles as well as virtues, and enabling us to see those notable men as they lived, and not only as they wrote. The picture does not misbehave them, and we do not admire their genius less for knowing that Homer sometimes nods and that genius can scar with ruffled feathers. They were not only great authors, but they were men "not too good for human nature's daily food." The series is admirable in make-up and contents, and publishers and editor are entitled to thanks.

AFGHANISTAN AND THE ANGOLO-RUSSIAN DISPUTE AND ACCOUNT OF RUSSIA'S ADVANCE TOWARD INDIA. based upon the Reports and Experiences of Russian, German and British Officers and Travellers. With a Description of Afghanistan and of the Military Resources of the Powers Concerned. By Theodore Rodhouse, Major-Brigadier General, F. R. S. With Three Maps and other Illustrations. [New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons.]

In these excited times, when everyone is anxious to decide for themselves, if possible, the question of where Russia will stop and England in India is to begin in future, this book cannot fail to prove of interest. The author thoroughly understands what he is talking about, and the illustrations give one a capital idea of the debatable land.

ITALIAN RANBLERS. Studies of Life and Manners in New and Old Italy. By James Jackson Jarvis, Author of "Art Ideas," etc. [New York and London: G. P. Putnam's Sons.]

Among the artists—use the word in the realistic sense, remembering that pen pictures can be made quite as graphic in their way as when brushes are used—who ramble about in pleasant places, making what they see as vivid to the senses of the "stay-at-homes" as if they shared their journeys with them, Mr. Jarvis proves himself a most able painter. Nothing escapes his keen sense of the beautiful or picturesque in art or nature, and we have the results in clear, vigorous, vivid English.

THE STORY OF A SHORT LIFE. By Juliana Horatia Ewing, author of "Jackanapes." London Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. [New York: E. & J. B. Young & Co.]

A pleasing, pathetic story of a little child soldier, who strove to fight the Christian fight of patience and unselfishness against much suffering and natural ill temper as bravely as his friends, several soldiers in the Queen of England's army, fought and endured pain and hardships in their battles against their country's foes. Good teaching for children, and profusely illustrated.

LITERATURE.

The Fortnightly Review for July (Leonard Scott Publication Co.) has a paper by H. D. Traill on J. R. Lowell, late minister to England.

"WATSIDE FLOWERS," an illustrated Birth-day Scripture Text Book, and "An Illustrated Floral Text Book," are announced by Mr. Whittaker.

"IN MEMORIAM" is a tribute to the late Rev. John Brown, D.D., of Newburgh in this State, and contains the eulogies which were pronounced upon him in his masonic relations.

GINN & Co. publish a "Handbook of Poetics," by Francis B. Gummere, treating historically and theoretically subject-matter, style and metre. It will fill a vacant niche in courses of instruction in literature.

The July Musical Herald, Boston, gives Nannini's Stabat Mater, with English verses by Laura M. Underwood, "Father of Mercy," arranged from Beethoven, and "The Brook," an instrumental piece by Frits Spindler.

The eighteen articles of the Angust Eclectic are taken from fifteen English reviews and periodicals, and with the book notices, foreign literary notes and miscellany, will be found a most desirable companion in the long days.

"SOWING and REAPING" is the title of the historical sermon by the Rev. Marcus A. Tolman, the rector, on the semi-centennial of St. Mark's parish, Mauch Chunk, Pa., and it is a valuable contribution to the local ecclesiastical history.

"TEACHERS' INSTITUTES" is the subject of Circular No. 2 of the Bureau of Education for the present year, and makes a pamphlet of 206 pages. By means of these circulars the government distributes a large amount of information.

The Rev. F. S. Hatch's address on the "Relation of Congregational Churches to their Theological Seminaries," is printed in pamphlet. Now that Andover seems to have broken from its moorings, it is an important subject among them.

The Baptist Quarterly Review for July is very handsomely printed and on good paper, and comes into our hands. It contains five articles besides those in the editorial department, and a large part of the number is devoted to current literature.

"CONVICTIONS of Duty and Belief" is the subject of some weighed thoughts by C. H. Fitch of Massillon, Ohio, inscribed to his father. It is published by J. B. Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia. The thoughts are by a thinker, and are full of suggestiveness.

"The Policy of the Early Colonists of Massachusetts toward Quakers and Others whom they regarded as Intruders," is the subject of one of the Old South Prize Essays, by Henry L. Southwick, and it is printed in pamphlet form at the Old South Meeting House, Boston.

The North American Review opens its August number with a symposium on the questions, "Can Cholera be Averted?" Five physicians take part in it. One of the papers in the number is on "Temperance Reform Statistics," a subject that needs sharp handling, for there has been much carelessness in the collection of them, when exactness was most required.

A LARGE portion of the August Lippincott is devoted to fiction, light and airy and suited to these torrid days. From the Crafters of Scotland we are taken to the Pioneers of the South west, and are sometimes dealing with French provincial life and sometimes with the mountain region of West Virginia. There is something to suit all tastes, and the number will be sought at our winter resorts.

With its May number Latine (D. Appleton & Co.) commences a new volume and gives a careful index of the first three volumes. An examination of this index will show the great value of the publication to students and scholars. Many of the separate articles are worth more than the price of the subscription, and a magazine whose aim is to improve our scholarship ought to receive a liberal support.

Mrs. FREMONT has become a frequent contributor to the "Wide Awake" magazine. Her reminiscences of a varied and eventful childhood, spent in the South and West, are always interesting. The story she tells us in the July number is about an adventure with the "Big English Bull." Also a chapter of her "Recollections of My Time." The many illustrations are excellent, and the stories bright and readable.

THE Portfolio for July, by way of illustrations, has "Magnolia Grandiflora," etched by J. M. Head; Cox's "Bolton Abbey," etched by S. Myers, and the "Interior of St. George's Chapel, Windsor," by H. Railton. These are full page, and there are some sixteen other illustrations. The series of papers on Windsor, by W. J. Loftie, is continued, and there is an interesting article on "S. Maria del Popolo and its Works of Art," by J. H. Middleton.

CASELL'S Family Magazine for August might well be called the illustrated, for nearly every article is accompanied with engravings, both poetry and prose. The frontispiece is "A Summer Tryst," and the stories and papers are suited to the season, with the exception perhaps of "London by Night," whose illustrations are full of sorrow and may well remind the reader of some recent developments in that city. We have on several occasions had to speak in high praise of the Gatherer, and the August number of it is equally deserving.

ART.

THE Philadelphia Academy of Fine Arts wants an endowment of $50,000, and are endeavoring to raise it by subscriptions from lovers of art.

At James Pott & Co's. may be seen two original oil paintings, "The Goddess of Music," by N. Poussin, and "The Vestal Virgin," by Eschmann the younger, and it offers a favorable opportunity for buyers.

NATHAN APPLETON, who placed a bust of his brother Thomas G. Appleton in the Boston Museum of Fine Arts, has given to the museum sixty miniatures, one of them being a Napoleon painted on wood by Meissonier.

THE pictures taking the Prize Fund prizes of $2,500 each have been distributed by lot among the four chief subscribing cities, as follows: R. Swain Gifford's "Near the Coast" goes to the Metropolitan Museum in this city; Frank M. Boggs' "Rough Day—Entrance to the Harbor of Honfleur," to the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston; Henry Mosler's "The Last Sacraments," to the Polytechnic Institute, Louisville, and Alexander Harrison's "Le Crepuscule," to the Museum of Fine Arts, St. Louis. The latter city is regarded as the most fortunate of the four. Next year ten prizes of $2,000 each will be awarded.

A NEW FREAK OF AGNOSTICISM.—At the recent annual meeting of the National Association of Music Teachers in New York City the subject most deeply interesting to the religious world was discussed in a paper by Mr. John H. Cornell, under the caption, "What is Church Music?" To say the least, this interrogative form of the thesis is quite as tantalizing to the Church as it is creditable to the very respectable association which introduced it.

Perplexity deepens when it is borne in mind that the essayist is one of the most learned and accomplished musicians of our day; that he was born and educated in the Church, and from his early youth enthusiastically devoted to the study of Church music in its purest and strictest schools; that it formed his one ideal and pursuit; that he sat reverently at the feet of Dr. Edward Hodges, our greatest master in religious music, for many years; that he was so impregnated with the idiom and inspiration of Tallis, Farrant, Purcell, Boyce, Gibbons, and the rest of the early English school, that his own fine individuality seemed at times hopelessly sacrificed to his enthusiasm; that in his young manhood he became a Romanist, buried himself in the order of the Redemptorist as a brother-priest for fifteen years or more, and threw his genius into a splendid elucidation of the "Gregorian Tones and Modes"—a work which stands unrivalled as an authority—and that in this period and after, when he became a layman, he produced many religious works for choir and organ of exceptional importance; and yet, with all this, we have Mr. Cornell's word for it that he finds himself to-day on the sunset slope of his distinguished career, unable to answer the question submitted to him for consideration. Mr. Cornell professes that he can not tell what Church music is!

But, with fine frankness, he admits in the outset that if any one had confronted him with such a question some years ago he would have "laughed in his face"! For then, Mr. Cornell knew, or believed that he knew, what Church music is; and since we, Churchmen, stand where Mr. Cornell did during his former years, that is, within Christianity and within the Church, we, believing as he then believed, may, without rudeness or presumption, "laugh in the face" of any such question or questioner. And here we drop back to a fundamental axiom of religion—spiritual things are spiritually discerned. Therefore, to know concerning the faith one must be in the faith, and to know religious art one must be rooted and grounded in religion. He who steps outside ceases to know, because his change of standpoint involves the loss of vision.

This great question, then, belongs to the man of and within the Church. And to such religious art is a verity precisely as is religious experience and consciousness. "One thing I know, that whereas I was blind I now see." The Churchman knows that the Church has her own voice of adoration and worship, and of total inspiration; that her music is not martial, nor festive or bacchanalian, nor reverie, nor rhapsody, nor mere idealism; and the Churchman knows that the organ variations on "O Sanctissima" are all aglow with religious delights and aspirations, even if their gifted composer has lost the "heavenly vision" of his earlier years. This question demands positive treatment. The association owes it to itself as well as the religious public, who are the chief constituency of musicians, that on an early occasion the Church shall have a voice and a hearing in the presentation of her own convictions concerning her own worshipful art.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

IN view of the recent appearance of the revised version of the Old Testament, we feel that a special interest will arise with reference to the history of the Bible. We have therefore secured Messrs. A. D. F. Randolph & Co.'s edition of Dr. Mombert's "Hand-Book of the English Versions of the Bible," published at $2.50, and offer it, with THE CHURCHMAN, at $5.00, or to subscribers now fully in advance at $1.50.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

"The book can be recommended to readers and students alike."—Literary World.

"A clearer and more comprehensive collection of the copious materials on the history of the English Bible does not exist."—Good Literature.

"A characteristic of this work is its mingling the internal with the external history of the descent of our English versions—theses which Westcott, for example, keeps separate. The book, therefore, already crowded with the condensed facts of narration, is further crowded with examples illustrating the ancestry and relations of the several versions. . . . All this gives variety, and makes the whole more readable and more interesting as a continuity than if the two portions were separated—to have a dead body and a departed spirit. Crowded as the volume is, it is readable throughout, and, in some of its sections, intensely interesting."—Sunday-school Times.

CHASTENING.*

BY LOUISE S. MIXSELL.

Unto my life there came a call,
When busy hands could scarcely spare
A moment's pause, when anxious care
Was deepest, and the present hour
Held me with an unwonted power,
Then came the call.

No "day" for answer to that call,
But swift obedience! Quickly faded
The world that so engrossed and shamed
Of twilight from an unknown sky
Fall thickly o'er me where I lie,
Led by that call.

Familiar faces e'en grow strange!
The world—how far away! How vain
'Alike its pleasure and its pain!
While the unseen, which seemed to be
In those past hours so shadowy,
Alone is rest.

Waiting upon the border land—
Passive and weak—too weak for choice,
(Yet leaning unto rest) the voice
Comes once again, "Not yet for thee
The long-desired rest shall be,
But higher work.

"Learn thou how frail a thing thy life!
And as the moments swiftly speed
Upon thy nobler self take heed;
And though thy hands must labor still,
Give me thy thoughts, thy work, thy will,
Till thee I call."

ROBERT ORD'S ATONEMENT.

BY ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY.

Rotha could not understand what had become of her friend. She had not seen him for three whole days, and she was as restless and uneasy as a woman could be. He had gone down to the shore with her and the boys on the afternoon in question, and she had brought in Reuben and Guy to tea, not extending the invitation to Guy's uncle, as Mrs. Carruthers would be out. She had noticed, or fancied she noticed, a shade of disappointment on Garton's face at the omission, and he had lingered more than a moment at the gate, as though unwilling to break up the little party. Was he hurt? Did he think her stiff and inhospitable. There had been a look of reproach in his eyes as he had turned away, as though she had been guilty of some breach of friendship. This had been on the Monday evening, and the next day she had a cold and did not care to stir from the fireside. As it happened, none of the Vicarage party made their appearance, not even Guy or Laurie, her most frequent visitors. Garton, too, kept himself completely aloof; Meg saw him at church in the evening, but, being short-sighted, could give Rotha no information of his looks; and he had only bowed to Meg from a distance instead of coming forward as usual to shake hands.

Rotha thought this very queer, but she did not say so. The evening was a dull one, and she went to bed early and dreamed all night that she and Garton had a quarrel. The next day it was no better. Rotha's cold was still troublesome, and the weather was unusually inclement. Rotha, who was an unwilling prisoner, grew slightly ruffled in spirits towards evening. To add to her discomfort Mary came in on her way to church, and was very sympathizing on the subject of Rotha's cold, and slightly mysterious on every other subject. Rotha, with unusual querulousness, wanted to know what they were all doing with themselves.

"I feel as though I have been dead and buried these two days," said the girl, with a little fretfulness. She wanted Mary to give up church and stay and talk to her.

"Doing good is better than saying your prayers, don't you think so?" said Rotha, with a droll inflection of voice. She liked to shock Mrs. Ord sometimes. Mary was always so good and serious.

"Oh, my dear, no," said the earnest woman. "We must do one without leaving the other undone. And then when one is so worried—"

"Are you worried?" cried Rotha affectionately. "Is that the reason why you have all left me to myself so long? I did not think you would have treated me so badly unless something were the matter."

"But, my dear—"
"Of course something is the matter. Don't you tell me all your worries? When persons have something on their minds they had better always talk it out," said Rotha, with a little decision. "Saying one's prayers is all very well, of course, but a friend's help and sympathy are not to be slighted."

"I never slight yours. Oh, my dear, what a dreadful notion! One may be worried on other people's account," finished Mary, with a sigh. She had sighed several times very distinctly. "And, after all, talking will not do any good in this case."

"I have no wish to interfere in other people's business," said Rotha stiffly. "You have always treated me so as one of the family, that I have grown to consider myself as one of you—that is all." Rotha was more than ruffled, she was positively aggrieved now; the tears stood in her eyes. She was certain now that something was the matter—something, probably, in which Robert or Garton was concerned, and which she (the little sister) was not to know. She drew herself back from Mrs. Ord's caressing arm with a little dignity.

"The bell is stopping now. Don't you think you had better go?" she said presently. She had her face averted when Mary stooped and kissed her. She took all her friend's affectionate exhortations as to her cold with perfect coolness. "You are feverish—a bad cold always makes one feverish," said Mary, with a placid sigh. "You must take care of yourself, and we shall see you about in a few days." Rotha shed a few tears when she was left alone. A positive sense of injury took possession of her. She had only been a prisoner two days, and already something had taken place at the Vicarage which she was not to know, and then it was so strange of Garton. She determined nothing should keep her indoors on the morrow, but when she awoke the next morning she was forced to reconsider her resolution. A damp drizzle of mist and rain threw a metaphorical wet blanket over everything, her cold was still obstinate, and it would be little short of madness to stir from the fireside.

Rotha thought it the longest morning she had ever spent in her life. Mrs. Carruthers was induced to agree with her too. Rotha was a trifle contrary; she would not open her lips or be interested in anything. Meg was quite relieved when it was time to go down to the schools. When she had gone, Rotha drew her chair to the fire and was miserable to her heart's content. The whole world was against her, and the weather too. What was this thing they were keeping from her? Rotha had not long to ask herself that question, for just then, to her surprise, the doorbell rang and Reuben Armstrong came in.

It was not a half-holiday, but he had come up to Bryn with a message. As he gave it—standing cap in hand, as though in haste to be gone—she noticed the boy's eyes were red and swollen, and his face was flushed with crying.

"Why, Rube," she said reproachfully, "you have not got into any trouble with Mr. Dentry, surely?"

Reuben shook his head and looked rather indignant at the supposition.

"Your father has not been near you?" but again the boy shook his head.

"What is the matter, then?" she continued impatiently. "Rule you must tell me; you look as though you have made yourself ill with crying."

Reuben's eyes brimmed over.

"Don't you know? Haven't they told you?" he began eagerly.

"No one has told me anything," returned Rotha, with a touch of the old seriousness; "there is some mystery—I am quite aware of that; but no one has thought it worth while to tell me anything?"

"And you don't know that they are sending him away?"

"Sending whom—do you mean Mr. Garton? Something sharp seemed to shoot through Rotha's heart then. She caught her breath once or twice. "Why don't you speak out plainly, Reuben? I think you are under some mistake. If it were true, don't you think they would have told me themselves?" said the girl, with a little natural impatience.

"Perhaps Mr. Garton told them not. Oh, Miss Maturin, he is so unhappy; he could hardly speak to me last night when he told me about it. I think, I do think, they will break his heart between them."

"Reuben, you are very wrong," said Rotha, rebukingly; her face was very pale, and she spoke hurriedly. "My dear boy, I don't think you know what you are saying. Why should they send him away?"

"Of course, it is his own doing; it is too noble to eat another man's bread—don't I know that?—but, all the same, they have driven him to it. He is never to be a clergyman—never; and he is going away to the very end of the world."

"Oh, Rube, God forbid!" and a hot flush of pain came to Rotha's cheek. "We must not let him go, Rube. You are right; it will break his heart. Why did you not come to me last night and tell me this?"

"I thought you knew," returned Reuben, mournfully. "It is no use; they will not let you do anything, Miss Maturin—it is all as good as settled. One of Mr. Robert's friends is to give him a free passage to New Zealand, and he is going to Thornborough to-morrow to get his outfit."

"Without telling me?" exclaimed Rotha. She was indignant, even in the midst of her trouble, but Reuben was too miserable to heed her.

"It is all Mr. Robert's doing—every bit; he will try to prevent my going out to him, I suppose, but I will go if I work my way for it; in a few years I shall be a man." He cheered up for a moment at the thought, and then in an instant broke down again. "He saved my life," said the boy. "I can't bear to see him go away. Oh, what shall I do? what shall I do?" And Reuben laid his head down on the table in a perfect agony of crying.

Rotha could not have cried for words; her eyes were hot and dry, and her throat ached; her pain almost bewildered her. He was going away—her friend and companion, clumsy, honest Gar. No more pleasant morning visits; no loitering on the shore; no more happy excursions to Burnley and Lestham Woods; no lingerings under the lighthouse to look at the stars; no tall form striding up and down the dim aisles; the dark face missing from the choir-stall. Rotha thinks stonily of these things; through it all she hears Reuben sobbing with a sort of impatience, "What shall I do? what shall I do?"

Rotha goes up to him and gives the lad a little shake.

"Reuben, leave off crying. Can you give a message from me to Mr. Garton?" The boy nods his head. Rotha's hand is very cold, and it lies like lead on his shoulder. A dim hope creeps in his heart; perhaps, after all, she may do something.

Rotha clears her voice; it is scarcely so sweet as usual, but it is wonderfully steady.

"I shall be at church this evening, Rube. When the service is over, tell Mr. Garton that I shall be waiting in the porch to speak to him. Whether it be wet or fine, remember, I shall be there."

"Is that all?"

"Yes, that is all. The little sister may have lost her power, but she will try what she can do, for all that. You are a good boy, Reuben—a faithful friend; you deserve his love. There, go. I shall rely on you, Rube, mind you don't fail me." And then, somewhat to Reuben's surprise, she leans down and touches the boy's forehead with her lips.

CHAPTER XXVII.

"Don't go, Garton; I want you."

"Silence!" he exclaimed.

"A woman's pity sometimes makes her mad—
A man's distraction must not cheat his soul
To take advantage of it. Yet 'tis hard, Farewell. . . . But I love you."
—Aurora Leigh.

Rotha had quite made up her mind what to do.

As soon as Reuben had gone she went to the window and took a calm survey of the weather outside. The prospect was not very promising. The damp drizzle had ceased, but a gray sea-fog was creeping over the sands. A raw mistiness pervaded everything; it was scarcely an evening for it invalid to stir abroad. Nevertheless Rotha felt no doubt of the prudence of her undertaking.

She communicated her intention to Mrs. Carruthers with admirable sangfroid. She only shrugged her shoulders with pretty petulance at that excellent woman's dismay. Meg's remonstrances fell on deaf ears.

"When one has a duty to perform, one must fulfil it at all risks," she repeated with a little dignity. She nodded at Meg with wide-open anxious eyes. Two bright spots of color were in her cheeks. There was repressed impatience in her every movement. She scarcely listened when Meg pleaded a sick headache as an excuse for not accompanying her.

"You had better go to bed early," Rotha said to her. "You ought to speak to some doctor about these headaches." She was not indifferent to her friend's sufferings; she was simply self-absorbed. She sat in a fever of excitement while Meg sipped her tea; an intolerable mixture of pain and pity filled her heart to overflowing. "What is the good of making friends if one must lose them?" she thought.

Meg, on her part, was sorely bewildered by the girl's impatience and wilfulness. A dim suspicion of the cause kept her in sympathizing silence. She sat with throbbing head while Rotha roamed hither and thither in her gray dress. "It must come to her, as it must come to all of us," she thought, and a pitiful feeling came over her as she remembered her own miserable past, a longing to take the girl in her arms and shelter her from all possible trouble and disappointment. She was a little indignant at the way things had gone. "She has seen no one else, and she does not know her own heart," thought Meg sadly. The young man's peculiarities repelled and annoyed her. In common with many other people she was inclined to undervalue Garton Ord.

Meg, in her wise experience, thought that she saw how Rotha's possible future was shaping itself, and was rather inclined to be angry at the sorry result. She thought Rotha, with her sweetness and cleverness, might marry any one. The young people's pretence at friendship did not blind her in the least. "They will go on talking and laughing till they find they are necessary to each other, and then one or other of them will wake up." She did not know that the waking had already come to poor Garton, and that he was finding it very bitter. She was thinking rather of Rotha's restlessness these three days, of her unusual pettishness and caprice. Rotha's wide-open eyes, shining with impatience, her glowing cheeks and hot hands were so many signs to the watchful woman of the reality and truth of her surmises.

Rotha, on her side, knew nothing of her friend's suspicions. She was a little chagrined at her scant sympathy, that was all. She went up and kissed her, almost penitently, before she left the house.

"You must go to bed before I return," she said, with some remorse. "I would rather have the headache than the headache," she thought as she struggled through the damp fog.

She went to her usual seat behind the pillar and knelt down for a long time. It could hardly be said that she prayed, for her prayer was in some such fashion as follows, for she said over and over again, only in different words:

"If Garton Ord refuse to take my advice, what shall I do? and if he refuse to accept my help, what shall I do? And then he is my friend, my very own friend, and I cannot let him go away;" and once, "God forbid!" very energetically. I do not know whether Rotha added an "Amen" to these clauses, but it certainly struck her with some degree of shame that there had not been much reverence in her petitions. She sat and looked towards the chancel very humbly at this point of her reflections.

"I ought not to have been here to-night," she said, with a sigh at her own shortcomings; "I am as bad as those who bought merchandise or sold doves." And as these salutary thoughts prevailed, she chose the longest hymn she could find in her book and read it three times over without taking in a word of its sense. And why? Merely because a tall, dark figure had brushed past her as it went down the aisle to the vestry; and she had looked up and seen Garton Ord's face, looking sad, and pale, and worn, as she had never seen it before.

And after that it was all no use. Rotha stood up in her place or knelt; she listened attentively; she sang with her usual heartiness, but the strain on her mind was terrible. She could not keep her attention from wandering; chill doubts haunted her; she was afraid of herself and him. Was she right in seeking a confidence which had been withheld from her? And then the remembrance of the poor boy's worn face drove all hesitation from her mind, and after that she had a strange fancy.

They were singing that beautiful hymn, "Thy will be done." Rotha was singing it too with tears in her eyes. She was looking at the altar and the lilies; the dim, white globes seemed blossoming from the freecoats; the tall, painted windows were full of blurred outline and shadow. Reuben was crying quietly behind his book.

"If Thou shalt call me to resign What most I prize—tho' 'twere my mine,"

Was it fancy, or did Garton suddenly look towards the dark corner where Rotha was singing? But when she turned her head again he was standing with his face to the lilies, and his lips pressed tightly together as though in pain.

Rotha heard a sigh behind her, which she knew came from Mary. She was quite aware that Mrs. Ord had come in late and was sitting a little to her left; but, when service was over, she did not once turn her head. She sat in her place steadily, while Mary stood up and fidgeted with her wraps. By and by she had an instinct that her friend was waiting for her in the porch, but she took no heed. Mrs. Ord was not quite easy in her mind as she went down the churchyard again. She remembered Rotha's petulance and soreness of the previous evening, and was a little exercised in her mind in consequence.

Rotha sat still and waited, not very patiently it must be owned. She saw Garton go into the chancel with the wrappers for the altar, and a moment afterwards Reuben followed him. He was giving him her message. She could see him start and turn quickly to the boy. He seemed hesitating, but it was full three minutes before Reuben was dismissed with an assenting word. Reuben came down and stood beside Rotha for a little while in her dark corner.

"Wasn't it a beautiful hymn?" he whispered. "He was angry with me because I couldn't sing it. He sang every bit, down to the last verse, and then he broke down himself."

"We ought not to think of our own worries in church," said Rotha, dogmatically. She was a little pale and cold sitting in that dark corner. Her conscience misgave her as she thought of the strange merchandise she had brought in that evening. The sellers of doves were nothing to her. She was every bit as bad as Reuben. Reuben answered her very prettily.

"If we don't bring our burdens, how are we to lay them down? That is what the vicar says. How can I help being sorry for him, loving him so dearly as I do, and seeing him so unhappy? Oh, Miss Maturin, he looks so bad, almost as though he were going to be ill."

"There, that will do," said Rotha. She pushed the boy from her with hot, feverish hands, though she was so cold.

Something shining fell on Reuben's sleeve at that moment.

"You must hurry home. Mrs. Summerson does not like you to be late," she said, as she rose hastily. Her gown blew about her feet as she went out into the porch. The sea-fog had cleared off, and one or two stars trembled above the blackness. The wind was blowing the sand up among the graves. The white crosses and tombstones gleamed in the dim haze. Rotha coughed and drew her cloak round her as she drew back into the church, nearly stumbling over some one as she did so.

"I beg your pardon," said Garton, with a nervous laugh; "I thought you heard me, but I suppose the wind was too boisterous."

Rotha scarcely answered as he put open the door for her. The little surprise had agitated her. She went on, leaving Garton to follow. She scarcely took any notice when the young man came up with her, panting and breathless; in reality a new sort of shyness kept her lips closed.

"I had to lock up the church," he said. "Had you forgotten that when you walked so fast? I hardly thought I should have overtaken you before you reached Bryn."

"I forgot about the keys," returned Rotha apologetically; "one cannot help hurrying in such a wind."

"It was not fit for you to have come to church," he replied decidedly. "Mary has told us what a cold you have. You were coughing dreadfully through the service."

"It was nothing," returned Rotha, indifferently. The mention of her cold reminded her of the old soreness. He knew of her indisposition then, and had never cared to inquire after her. When it pleased him he could come three or four times in the course of one day, but now this sad trouble of his was turning even his against her. She held herself aloof as this thought crossed her; her voice went out to him rather tremulously in the darkness.

"I thought you had forgotten me. You have all been too busy these three days to think much of any one but yourselves," exclaimed the girl in a hurt voice. "Mrs. Ordl came to me and was dreadfully mysterious. I suppose I was foolish to mind it. Of course I have no right to be considered."

"You have every right, you mean, Miss Maturin. Why should you say such a thing?" Garton spoke vehemently, but his tone was hardly as steady as usual.

"I suppose Mrs. Ordl was told not to confide in me," continued Rotha plaintively.

"When Reuben came in this afternoon he burst out crying and told me everything. I liked Reuben's red eyes better than Mrs. Ordl's misery."

"I told Mary to say nothing about it," continued Gar. "I wished—that is, I thought it better—"

But Rotha broke in upon his stammering. "You thought it better that I should not know. Why did you not give Reuben your orders too? Mary and the vicar tell the little sister everything. Perhaps you would rather not come in to-night, Mr. Garton? Meg is not very well. I suppose you meant to have come and wished me good-bye before you sailed?"

Rotha quickened her steps, with secret exasperation and impatience. Her voice trembled as she delivered herself of this cutting speech. Tears sprang to her eyes in the darkness.

"May I not come in? Why are you so angry with me to night?" asked Garton humbly. The poor fellow knew nothing about women; he could not understand the girl's soreness and hurt feelings. He followed her up the gravel-path with his head drooping; he was utterly dejected and miserable. Rotha gave a little stamp with her foot as she choked back her tears. Her cheeks were burning again.

"He does not care for me; nobody cares for me," she thought.

She went straight into the parlor and laid aside her hat. She refused Garton's help rather impatiently when he wanted to relieve her of her damp cloak. She hated herself for her pettishness all the time, but she could not help it.

As for Garton he had betaken himself to the fireside after his repulse. He held on to the mantelpiece tightly as he looked down into the red gleaming coals, and his head resting on his arm. He did not alter his attitude nor move when Rotha swept past him rather impetuously in her gray dress, though he started slightly on hearing himself addressed.

"Will you not sit down?" she said, still more impatiently, as though goaded on by his dejection. "Three days ago I don't think you needed to be invited to take a seat."

He lifted his head from the mantelpiece at this.

"Why do you say such things to me?" he said, almost fiercely; then, dropping his voice, very sadly, "You must not; I cannot bear it."

Rotha was electrified by the sudden change of manner. Her color rose, and she said more gently:

"I am afraid I was cross. I did not mean to be, but one cannot help being vexed by such seeming unkindness."

"What unkindness? I don't understand you. Do you mean that any of us have treated you badly?" he demanded, so vehemently that Rotha was frightened. "Pshaw! what a fool I am, as though Robert's persecution were not enough to turn you against us."

"I did not mean that," returned Rotha, quite shocked. "Hush! what nonsense. Haven't I forgiven him? Do I not forgive him every day of my life? Mr. Garton, you ought to know me better than that."

"Well, what then?" replied Garton gloomily. "Do we know anyone? Are we sure even of ourselves? If you mean that I have acted unkindly in keeping all this miserable business a few hours from you, and in making Mary hold her tongue about it, you have a very poor idea of my motive in doing so."

"I confess I was hurt. I thought we were such friends," returned Rotha in a voice that was perilously sweet. Had she any idea how she was torturing him? He had drawn his chair to the fire, and was bending over it with his hands propped heavily against his knees; his forehead was puckered up with pain. As he spoke he scarcely raised his eyes above the gray hem of her dress. Was there a glamour before his sight? As she sat there in the radius of the fire-light an ineffable majesty seemed to surround the young girl. Her youth and sweetness abashed him. He had always seen beauties in her which no one else had seen, and now a sickness and impotence of longing seized upon him when he remembered that all this beauty and grace was not for him.

As he sat there with his moody glance bent on the fire he knew every trick of her countenance, every fold of her dress and wave of her hair. In the long dreary years that were to follow, how he would remember this evening, when he listened to her innocent reproaches with the wind sighing among the garden trees, and the dull lapping of the distant waves on shore!

"I thought we were such friends," repeated Rotha softly. "Why did you not come and tell me this yourself? Did you not know how sorry I should be for you?"

"Yes, I knew," returned the poor fellow, with a groan. He could have put out his hands and prayed her to refrain from torturing him so. What good was it to him for her to recall their innocent friendship, who had loved her, and would dare to love her to his latest breath? He looked upon her with sad deprecating eyes.

"Yes, we have been friends; but we shall be so no longer. What happy days Rube and I have had here; and then that time in the Burnley woods! Well, it's all over now—over and gone as the children say. I shall leave Reuben as my legacy to you. I wonder if you will thank me."

"Don't," cried Rotha, stung into sudden pain. "Mr. Garton, I hardly know you tonight, you are so unlike yourself, so sad and stern. I am almost afraid of you."

"Afraid of me?" Garton gave her one of his sudden brilliant smiles for answer, but it soon died away. Another of those frank innocent glances would unman him, he felt. He must guard himself; he must be very careful. In another half-hour it would be time for him to take his leave. He breathed more freely when he remembered this.

"Reuben will fret sadly after me," he continued, with a sigh. "The lad is terribly constant. I believe the foolish fellow will break his heart over it."

"He will be right," returned Rotha. "I mean—coloring up—" you have been such a good friend to him. Mr. Garton, will you tell me once for all why you are going?"

"Why?" repeated Garton, somewhat embarrassed. He had roused from his apathy now, and was looking at her in some confusion. "I suppose because Robert cannot afford to send me to college, or to maintain me any longer in idleness."

"Yes, I know; but is that your only reason?" added Rotha impatiently.

She was watching the young man with keen wide-open eyes. The evidence of his confusion was clear enough to her. Poor Gar, he was clumsy enough to betray himself at any moment; and then the girl was the cooler of the two. He was more embarrassed than ever as he answered her.

"It was the reason why the New Zealand scheme was first started," he stammered. "I have told you all that over and over again. I knew that it was right that I should go, but I could never make up my mind; and lately Robert has been pressing me."

"Mr. Garton, do you remember that text about the plough and looking back?"

"Yes, I do," he returned, with an emphasis that startled her, "and, God helping, I mean to act upon it."

That was not what Rotha meant.

"I don't know in what way you are contriving to twist my meaning," she said, rather bewildered. "I meant, of course, is it right for you to renounce the desire and fixed purpose of your life to be ordained?"

What made Garton suddenly pass his hand before his eyes?

"I would rather be a door-keeper in the house of my God." How often he had chanted those words in the daily services, and what fulness of meaning had they not borne to him? Had he not desired with pure hands to serve in the sanctuary? Very slowly and reverently he answered her, "Yes, it is right."

"But why?" persisted Rotha.

"Because it has been plainly shown me that my work and place are elsewhere. I have hoped against hope. I have waited till I am heart-sick. Miss Maturin, do not let us talk any more about this."

"But I must talk about it. How am I to help you and keep silence? Mr. Garton, if this be your only reason you need never go to New Zealand. I will make it all right with the vicar."

"You, Miss Maturin?"

"Yes, I. Do you think that I am not to be allowed to earn my title of friend. You forget I am 'the little sister.' Mary—Mrs. Ord, I mean—calls me her Aladdin's lamp, and her Fortunatus' cap, and all sorts of pleasant titles. We were talking about wishing-wells in Burnley woods the other day, Mr. Garton. I will not promise to conjure up the little cottage with the bow-window, and the telescope, and big dog; but I think I can manage about the college?"

"You! what do you mean?" demanded Garton huskily. A dark flush rose to his face; his hands worked nervously. Was she going to help him? was she—Ah! but it was hard, terribly hard.

"It does not matter what I mean," returned Rotha, with a low musical laugh; but she colored too as she spoke. "The vicar and I will settle it all between us. Do you remember how we managed about Rube? Mr. Robert need not know."

"Do you mean that you propose to pay my college expenses, and that you are going up to the vicarage to tell Austin so?"

"There is no reason to put it in such plain words," faltered Rotha; "and, after all, you are to know nothing about it—the vicar and I will settle it. You are not too proud to take such a little thing from me?" she continued, winningly, as she stretched out her hand to him—the little soft thin hand whose touch he knew so well. The poor boy trembled all over as he took it.

"You will not refuse such a little thing to your friend?" she continued, pleadingly. Then he shook his head.

"I could refuse you nothing, Miss Maturin. Do you think I could be proud with you? It is not that. No; don't stop me, you know I must go away."

"But why?" she persisted, pitiless in her sweetness, and her eyes looked so softly at him.

Garton burst into something like a groan, and then he threw her hand away from him with a violence that hurt her.

"You ask me that—you—you—you—you—you must know how people are talking! Do you think I can stay here," he continued passionately, "and be accused of such things, when perhaps it may end in your believing them?"

"What things? Who is talking?—about you and me, do you mean?" A dim perception of his meaning began to dawn on her. "Look how you have hurt me," she said, piteously, in the childish way that was so irresistible to him; "are you angry with me because people choose to say foolish things of us?"

"But if you come to believe them," he repeated, hoarsely. "Forgive me, Rotha; I am half mad to-night. I would rather die than harm a hair of your head. If I am a beggar," cried poor Gar, "I am a gentleman, and noblesse oblige."

"Sit down and tell me what you mean, and why you call me Rotha to-night, Mr. Garton?" She laid her hand on his sleeve with a soft persistence that compelled him to yield to her. Rotha was very pale now, but she was the calmer of the two. To tell the truth, she forgot herself at the sight of his excessive agitation, which puzzled and frightened her at the same time. "What are people saying about us, and why do you so assure me that you are a gentleman?"

"I beg your pardon," said Garton, vehemently; "if I have offended you, it is for the first time. No man can bid good-bye to the woman he loves and measure his words; if I say 'good-bye, and God bless you, Rotha,' you need not be angry with me, you will only be Rotha in my prayers."

The woman he loved—he—Garton—her Garton. Rotha was deadly white now, and then she turned crimson to her finger-ends; but he could not see her face, it was so averted from him; at his next words it drooped lower and lower. Had she dreamed this? Could it indeed be true? What was the meaning of that strange new happiness that set her heart beating so wildly? Not for worlds—not for worlds could she have spoken then.

"Forgive me," said Gar—he had risen again to his feet, and was regarding her mournfully—"you know now why I stayed away. I ought not to have come here to-night, and you have tried me so, beyond my strength even. They thought I was a fortune-hunter, and that I dared to aspire to an heiress. They little knew me. If we never meet again after to-night—and we never shall with my consent—look up in my face and tell me, Rotha, that you never suspected me of such meanness."

She looked up quickly to the honest face above her, and then drooped her head lower than ever.

"Never—never!" she faltered; "how dare they say so?"

"What does it matter?" he continued, cheered by her manifest sympathy; "what does anything matter so that you think well of me? I can go more happily now."

"Why should you go?" faltered Rotha. How pale her face was!

"Hush, you must not tempt me; how can you, knowing what you know now? Of course I must go away; and how can I bear to live on here, and see you every day, and know," and his voice trembled, "and know you are not for me?" He paused, and then went on, "You must not be sorry now I have told you this. I could not help it. I could not indeed. God bless you, dear, for your noble thought, as I shall bid God bless you in my prayers when I am far away."

The little hand trembled out to him again from the folds of the gray dress; there were tears in the bright, kind eyes; the sweet face was covered with blushes.

"Don't go, Garton; I want you." And then, in a voice of intense feeling, "I was a poor girl, without a friend but Meg in the world, till all these good things came to me; but what are they worth—what is anything worth—unless I may share them with those I love?"

Could he mistake those brave, tender words! The strong man trembled like a child when he heard them.

"Rotha, do you mean me?" he whispered; and Rotha, looking up with a smile and a blush said, "Yes."

THE QUIET CORNER.

BY THE BISHOP OF EASTON.

XX.

I have been urging that whatever good thing there is in this bad world comes from God.

But one may say all this is well spoken, and from these very principles I have drawn the inferences which you Churchmen so much deplore. The experience of life confirms that statement in the Acts of the Apostles, that the Holy Ghost has been received by unbaptized men. Is not baptism, then, a superfluity? The Holy Dove is abroad in all the world: can I not hear His voice in the sounds of nature, and see the silver of His wings in material types and emblems, rather than seek Him between the leaves of a book or in a narrow house with its doors and walls? Which way went the Spirit of the Lord from me unto thee, that with God's free spirit all pervading I must accept the restraints of the Ark and the discipline of service and of sacrament? Is not this what so many are saying now-a-days, that the Church hath no monopoly of goodness, and that each heart may erect its own shrine and have the Comforter for its teacher?

Ah, the dove searched and wandered, but came back to her home. The dove found no rest for the sole of her foot, and she returned unto him into the ark. The raven might rest contentedly upon the carcasses of a lost humanity, or croak forth its requiem from some lifeless bough; but the dove returning from its forlorn errands of mercy, could be content with no other home than the Ark of God.

Why should a man speculate and reason and utter his poor "I think," if God hath spoken clearly and wiped away with the breath of a divine utterance all the foundations of our individual theory?

We may say that all places are alike to God; but David shall reply "He refused the tabernacle of Joseph and chose not the tribe of Ephraim, but chose the tribe of Judah, the Mount Zion which He loved, and He built His sanctuary like high places, like the earth which He hath established forever." "Yea, "the Lord loveth the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob." "There the Lord hath promised His blessing, and life for evermore."

None has hymned so grandly as David the omnipresence of God's mighty spirit—about his bed and about his path; beside him whether he soared to heaven or made his bed in hell. And yet what homesickness of the heart was his when he wandered far away from the ark of a covenant presence. His soul is athirst for God; heart and flesh cry out for the living God. In his thought the brooding place of the dove was above the mercy-seat of the ark. Surely this very unrest of the narrative before us was in his thought. "Arise, O, Lord, into thy rest, Thou and the ark of Thy strength;" and in response the Lord chooses Zion, and desires it for His habitation. Himself inscribes the promise above its portal. "This is My rest forever; here will I dwell, for I have a delight therein." Surely the psalms sustain our statement that the Church alone is the resting place of God.

And if the Ark of God be the one only resting-place of the Holy Dove, so also should the Church be recognized as the one home of the soul. Alas! there are many wanderers seeking in vain for something good; Churchless people, and because Churchless without God, and without hope in the world. "For as a bird that wandereth from her nest, so is a man that wandereth from his place." For how shall they believe in Him of whom they have not heard; and how shall they enter into rest, when none points them to an open door?

And how many there are who have found the ark, and yet do fail rightly to appreciate it! They seek, in some sort, its benefits, but they have not there their rest. They frequent it as an occasional resort, but it is not to them a home.

For home is the place of rest to which the feet turn by instinct in each interval of toil. Home is the treasury where our most precious things are garnered. Home is the place where we guard the heir-looms of our sires and the cradles of our little ones. Other abodes we are pleased to visit in the way of excursion, but home, after all, is the place to live, and home is the place to die.

We have glimpses of all this at times. In the clash and jangle of unregulated passions, and the strife that thus arises, in the bitterness of grief that comes from a child's misconduct, or in some dire misfortune, the thoughts turn homeward, and we must, like Hezekiah, go up to the house of the Lord and spread the sad tidings before His mercy-seat. Or else, in some moment of imminent danger, in some hour when to one dearly beloved time is fading rapidly into eternity, we bethink us that the Dove, the one only Messenger of Peace, still abideth in His chosen rest, and so we hasten to lay our sorrow down at the altar of God, and stretch out imploring hands for the ministrations of His love.

But oftentimes we are too unmindful of that glorious Presence which fills the Church of the living God, and imparts a virtue to its ordinances not inherent in them. We revere, but we do not love, the habitation of God's house, and the place where His honor dwelleth. The angels listen in vain for the sigh of satisfaction with which men often, anxious and burdened, exclaim: "All the day long have I been in the world as a sparrow upon the house-top; but now the sparrow hath found her a house and the swallow a nest, where she may lay her young, even Thine altars, O Lord of hosts, my King and my God.

Christ loved the Church; and we know the measure of that love: He gave Himself for it. Shall we not love it too, with the love of a genuine enthusiasm, and at the least give ourselves to it. Be it ours to prefer Jerusalem above our chief joy. Be it ours to cry, "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning!"

Keble says: "The Holy Ghost is like a Dove, because the Dove goes on in such wistful, plaintive tones, sometimes far into the night, very often in the early morning. Those who lie awake, or are about betimes, know the sound very well; and one can hardly listen to it without feeling as if it told us what a restless thing this world is, and how we have need to set our hearts on an infinitely better treasure. And it goes on, like a person earnest in prayer, still repeating the same note, as if it could never be tired nor stop, until it has found the rest which its soul loveth.

"Such is the voice of the Holy Ghost in prayer, inwardly uttered in a Christian's heart; and because it is like the unwearied, melancholy tones of the Dove may be one reason why the Blessed Comforter came down on our Lord in bodily shape like a Dove."—Keble, Whitunday Sermon.

A PRAYER BY THE SEA.

BY SARAH DOUDNEY.

I saw the ships on a windy sea
In the light of the morning's gold;
And the shout of the sailors came to me
Like songs from the days of old.

Wild waves leaped up on the crags and beat
On the edge of the rock-bound shore;
And the thought of a coming time was sweet,
When the sea should be no more.

No more, no more shall mothers and wives
Dream of loves that the blue wastes hide;
No more shall the vigorous hearts and lives
Be flung to the wind and tide!

Oh, Father, follow the gallant ships
Through the light of the morning pale!
Thou hearest the prayer of the loving lips,
Thy mercy never can fail.

And guide us all to some haven blest
Where never a tempest is known;
For life is sad, and the secret of rest
Is hidden with Thee alone.

ISRAEL IN EGYPT.

The Exodus.

Exod. xii. 31—xiii. 17-19.

Verse 31. "He," Pharaoh. "Rise up and get you forth." This was a fulfilment of the Lord's promise to Moses and Aaron—verse 1, chapter xi., also in verse 1, chapter vi. "By night." This shows that it was after midnight at which time the visitation of the Passover took place, and before dawn of the coming day. "From among my people." This implies that Pharaoh recognized it as a final departure. And it is evident from previous passages that He had sought to keep the children as hostages for their return, and then their cattle. Now he is anxious to thrust them out altogether. This verse is not in contradiction to the statement in chapter x. verse 29, that Moses should see the face of Pharaoh no more. The command to Moses and Aaron was doubtless given by messengers of the king. There would be no need of a personal interview.

Verse 32. The permission to take their cattle shows that Pharaoh had abandoned the thought of their return. "Bless me also." This is complete submission to Moses and Aaron. It treats them as their fare-well to leave behind a blessing, at least a revocation of the curses inflicted on Egypt. This proves that Pharaoh yielded to God's power, and recognized Moses and Aaron as God's instruments.

Verse 33. "The Egyptians were urgent upon the people." This fact answers the objection often made that so great a multitude could not have been got in marching order at such short notice. It was a simultaneous movement on the part of the Egyptians, because of their fear. They evidently regarded the death of the first-born as a menace to the lives of all the rest. The people also were prepared to go forth.

Verse 34. "Their dough before it was leavened." This is the origin of the usage of the paschal bread is thus shown. It was a constant memorial of that hasty flight. This was the dough which they had begun to prepare for bread in their three day's journey. They were sent out in such haste that they found no time to leaven or to bake it. "Clothes," rather cloths—the large square cloth, used as an upper garment very much like that still worn by the Arabs. Also it served for a bed or bed covering at night. It was thus easily used to pack up the kneading trough with the bread still in it. This could be baked at night by the bivouac fires. See Kinglake's "Eothen" for a description of the process.

Verse 35. "Borrowed of the Egyptians." The Revised Version properly translates this as "asked or begged." To borrow is in modern usage to obtain under a pledge of return. This was not the case here. The Hebrews did not expect to return, the Egyptians did not wish them to return. Doubtless the fear of the Egyptians had something to do with their willingness to give, but there was no fraud in the case. It may be indeed that this was in consideration of past services, and also the Hebrews must have left behind them possessions, as houses and the like, which could not be removed, for which these gifts were the equivalent.

Verse 36. The word lent is here to be taken as "gave," which, indeed, it means in other places. "Favour in the sight of the Egyptians." It is an oriental characteristic to feel affection toward one who has done a great and violent wrong. The Egyptians regarded the Hebrews as the authors of the plagues sent upon them, and these were in the nature of propitiatory gifts. "Spoiled the Egyptians." That is, took from them a great booty. This is not in the sense of defrauding, but rather of taking as one might a ransom or an exaction. The motive was no doubt that implied above, viz., desire to have the people go, and anxiety lest more harm should be done on their account. But whatever the reason for it, it was pure giving, and not on any false pretences.

Verse 37. Rameses (or Raemes) was that treasure city which the Hebrews had built for Pharaoh (see ch. i. v. 11). It was the starting point at which in the land of Goshen the people were collected. "Succoth" was the Place of Booths—the spot where they dwelt in huts of boughs, possibly known by that name previously. It was on the route toward the Red Sea. "Six hundred thousand on foot that were men." There are two objections made here, one as to the number of Israel, since this represents a population of about two millions, viz., that this is an unreasonable increase from the seventy souls who went down into Egypt. But on examination this is not found excessive, especially if in those four hundred years there had been no diminution of the people by pestilence or war. Now, there is every reason to believe that this was the case. The Hebrews were under the best conditions of growth, with manual labor and plenty of food. The other difficulty is in the collecting and marching such a company. But here, again, oriental habits must be taken into account, and the tribal and family subdivision. Moses spoke to the elders, the elders to the families—in fact, the army organization and the habit of obedience was almost perfect. "Children." This includes the women.

Verse 38. "A mixed multitude," viz., an alien population, possibly low caste Egyptians or slaves, who preferred to cast in their lot with the Israelites, and these were afterward a snare to them.

Verse 39. The baking of the bread was upon the embers of their fires, as Arabs now in the desert do.

Verse 40. "Four hundred and thirty years." This is the true time, no doubt. The Septuagint here is in error in giving the shorter period, "two hundred and fifteen." St. Paul follows the latter in Galatians iii. 17, where the time is of no moment; but the Hebrew account is clearly the true one.

Verse 41. "Four hundred and thirty years." It is but proper to say that Bishop Wordsworth holds to the shorter period, and makes this to be reckoned from the entrance of Abraham into Canaan. "The self-same day," viz., the 14th of the month Abib.

Chapter xiii., verse 17. "Not by the way of the Philistines." This would be the short caravan route by Gaza. Resistance there encountered would have forced them back across the Isthmus of Suez, whereas they took Canaan, as it were, in flank from the unexpected side.

Verse 18. "Led the people about." By a circuitous route. The wilderness, probably, not the desert that now is, only uncultivated wild land. "Harnessed." In armor, with weapons of war.

Verse 19. "He had straitly sworn." That is, Joseph, the vizier prince, had laid with a solemn injunction upon his people that they should give him final sepulture in Canaan. (See Genesis i. 25.) This was probably the more easy, as Joseph was doubtless embalmed after the Egyptian manner. "God will visit you." The prophecy had come to pass.

OUR CONDITION AND OUR DUTIES.

BY THE BISHOP OF SPRINGFIELD.

II.

Thus, dear brethren, as we find ourselves assembled here in our annual Synod, or think of ourselves at our homes, in our ecclesiastical relations, we are confronted by three facts, which stand out with startling prominence in our diocesan life and experience: we are a little flock, we can lay claim to no worldly prestige; and we are very poor.

These three facts again suggest, and indeed imperiously enjoin upon us three corresponding lines of duty, upon which we have been enlarging: union, by sinking personal preferences and prejudices in loyalty to the cause, the shepherd and the flock; trust in God, and in Him alone, as working with us when all other resources fail, and obeying, in consequence of our faith, His command to go forward; and the incorporation into our business and administration of our estates and secular affairs the principles of Christian paying and Christian giving, as announced and illustrated by our Sovereign Creator and Ruler in Holy Scripture.

If we face these facts and follow these lines of duty, we will speedily emerge from our Red Sea of danger and perplexity, and if we persevere in our onward march, we will ere long enter our promised land of fertility and plenty and rest.

All that we have thus far said has naturally sprung from your presence; you are the text of our sermon, you are the inspiration of our thoughts. But we cannot leave you thus; you are too interesting a theme and too important a factor in the future of the diocese to be dismissed without fixing your attention upon your responsibility as the connecting link between what has been and what is to be. You and I are handing over the past to the future; it is passing through our hands; shall we leave it as we found it? We cannot; things must either grow better or worse, advance or retrograde. Can we afford—it is a question of profit and loss—can we afford to live and die and never lift our finger or give of our time and money to make them better? Alas! while we cannot take hours and days and dollars and cents with us into and beyond the grave, and yet in their effect upon our souls, our seat of being, whence are the issues of our endless life, we do take them with us, and hence it is a question of profit and loss to us, of infinite moment, of immediate practical personal concern, how we pass our time, how we spend our money. Bear with me while I point out to you plainly what I conceive to be the mind of God in regard to the administration of money, the most perilous trust in its relation to himself which is confided to the hands of man.

In the first place, the primary safeguard is to bear ever in mind that wealth, money, is a loan lent to us; it is not our own in the sense that we have absolute control of it; we may use it and dispose of it, but we must, after all, give an account of our stewardship of it to God. It is all the while absolutely His, and he allows us to occupy it until He calls us away, and we let go, as our hands chill with death, of our bonds and stocks and silver and gold. To keep this truth steadily before the mind is the path of safety for every one who has riches in possession or who is in pursuit of gain.

Secondly, subordinate to this and helping to keep this fundamental principle in mind, is the consideration that God takes the first fruits in lieu of the whole, and allows us the use and enjoyment of the rest of the good things which He gives us with His benediction of blessing and love, provided we think of Him first, and set apart a certain portion and devote it in solemn offering to Him. The law of the first fruits runs through the entire Jewish economy and entwines itself so completely with the whole system of sacrifice that we are prepared to find it fulfilled in the Only Begotten Son of God and resting as an obligation upon those who would be like their Lord. The first fruits of their time, the first hours of the first day of the week are due to Him; the first fruits of their substance, as did the first believers, who were full of the Holy Ghost, are to be presented to Him in the offertorial gift.

Thirdly, to proceed one step further, and, as men would say in our day, reduce the matter to business principles, so as to make it eminently practical and remove it entirely from the sphere of sentiment, let us ask what amount shall we pay? What proportion shall we offer? We answer the tenth, and we advise the tenth. We are well aware that there are many—and they wise and good men—who dispute the obligation of the law of the tithe upon us, Christians. Well beloved, I will coincide in this opinion only on one condition—that you make the proportion larger, the interest greater. "Freely ye have received, freely give." Dare we stint God? Shall we haggle about the amount which we are to offer to Him, who has given us His Only Begotten Son, and with Him given us all things beside? Read "The Sacra Privata" of holy Bishop Wilson, and see how one who lived near to God came, as life ran on, to feel more and more his debt of gratitude and love, and as he felt the obligation grow, one-eighth, one-fifth, one-half was offered to God. Contrast this with Judas Iscariot, who begrudged our Lord the alabaster box and the precious ointment, and asked "to what purpose is this waste?" The one represents the Christian payer and the Christian giver; the other stands for the hard-hearted, hard-hearted, secular, worldly-wise man of business. Choose ye under whose leadership we will march to the grave and the bar of judgment—under the leadership of Thomas Wilson, Bishop of Sodor and Man, who gave half of his goods for the sake of his dear Lord and Master, or of Judas Iscariot, who sold his Lord and Master for thirty pieces of silver, and inscribed upon his banner, as he went forth in the darkness of the night to consummate his mercenary bargain of betrayal by the horrible prostitution of a kiss, "to what purpose was this waste?" Choose ye under whose leadership and with whose banner floating over you you will march into the presence of your Saviour and your Judge, who gave up all things for you, and allowed Himself to be stripped of everything, so that He was suspended, literally naked, between heaven and earth, that He might, by His poverty, purchase for you all things. Think of this, and then decide by your present conduct in the management of your business, and the making of your wills, and the disposal of your estates, to whose legions you will belong—Thomas Wilson's or Judas Iscariot's. Ah, brethren, have I won you to recognize God as your Father, your Benefactor, the Great Giver, to whom you owe all that you are, and have, and ever can be, in time and eternity? Then you ask, what will you have me to do? And I answer, and I beg you to take it with you all the days of your life, and not simply as a rhetorical flourish in an address. I would give you the counsel were you dying; I would give you the counsel were I dying; I give you the counsel upon which I have acted ever since I had anything which I could call my own—Pay one-tenth of your income, as your legal, lawful interest which you owe to God for His investment in you, in yourself, and the raw material with which you work, and the instrumentalities of air, and light, and heat, and all the ministries of nature which do you service at His bidding; and when you come to dispose of your effects at last, and make your will, divide your estate, whatever it may be, little or much, divide it into ten parts, and devote the first tenth, at least, to God, in some bequest to His service in Church or eleemosynary institution, and then distribute the remaining nine-tenths as you may deem wisest and best, as in the sight of God, to relatives and friends and whatever objects may claim your charity.

Wills made with such convictions of duty, and with such a recognition of God's personal nearness to us, and with such an acknowledgment of His paramount claims upon our gratitude and love, will not be likely to be the subjects of litigation in law courts. The consciousness of the divine presence supervising our acts, solemnly expressed by the fact that we place Him first among our heirs to receive the first fruits of our estate, when it is distributed as we direct, after we are dead and gone, is likely to exercise a salutary influence upon the mind and conscience, and restrain those exhibitions of passion and caprices of fancy which largely give occasion for quarrelling and dispute in the manifest injustice which is exhibited toward heirs by those who have not the love of God in their hearts nor the fear of God before their eyes.

Consider, I pray you, by acting upon this principle of devoting one-tenth of your substance to God at your death, what you can do for this diocese in the future. You can build it up and put it on a self-sustaining basis, and enable it to take care of itself and do aggressive work, and plant a mission in every town and city throughout the vast domain. By degrees it would put on strength, and when once enabled to stand and walk without external aid it would go forward with rapid strides.

The conditions of the diocese are such that, with the exception of a few, the parishes and missions require a partial endowment in order to be permanently self-supporting. The population is largely devoted to agriculture, and the business and prosperity of all classes are measured by the character of the crops. Their ability to give varies from year to year, and cannot be counted at a fixed ratio. Emigration draws away our people, and often five or six families, representing a sixth or a fourth of the salary of the clergyman, will remove in a single year from the same mission or parish. It will be seen, then, that the relations of demand and supply between the pastor and his flock cannot be regulated in this jurisdiction by any fixed laws of economic science. But we can fall back upon God's method, and urge you to obey His directions and fall in with His plan. Then, in time, the problem will be happily solved, the difficulty will disappear, our missions and parishes will be supplied with clergy living in comfortable rectories and maintained by incomes adequate for decent support.

Let every Christian, when he comes to make his will, divide whatever he has to devise, whether it is little or much, into ten equal parts or portions, and bequeath the first tenth as an endowment for the mission or parish, the annual interest or rental to go towards the salary of the rector, and let the provision be always added that unless the people of the mission or parish raise a minimum sum, easily within their power, towards the clergyman's support, such annual interest or rental shall be paid into the treasury of the mission fund of the diocese. This condition will secure against the temptation, which besets people when there is an endowment, of doing nothing themselves and leaving the endowment to do all. It will take time for these bequests in most instances to accumulate in quantities sufficient to provide the desired support. This matters not. We are moving in the right direction; we are not leaving things as we found them; we are doing something to make provision for the spiritual needs of those who will dwell in our neighborhood, the sphere of our responsibility for all time to come. The little sum thus left will never be missed by the heirs; and, oh! what an amount of good it will do for us, and for them, and for our fellow-men. Suppose a man has ten thousand dollars to distribute at his death, the one thousand which he bequeaths to God will not mar the inheritance of his children. Far from it, it will bring a blessing upon them, and make them fellow heirs with their Father in Heaven. Suppose he has five hundred acres of land to bestow, the fifty withdrawn for a glebe will be a thousand times more useful than they would as adding a few more acres to farms already large enough, and whose character, in any event, would not be essentially changed by the small fractional addition. It is not a question of amount, it is a question of principle. However limited a man's possessions may be, let him in every case devise them by will, and give God the first fruits—it may be a single acre of land, one share of stock, one bond, a few dollars. He who followed with his eye the poor widow with her two mites as she cast them in life into the sacred treasury, will mark well his servant who provides that when he is dead a tenth of his effects, be they much or little, shall be given to the Lord. We have been sufficiently practical, but we may not close this discussion without specifying some of the objects which you should have in mind when you make your wills.

Duty begins at home, like charity, and then radiates in all directions. Remember first your own parish or mission, take into account its needs; a church to be built or enlarged, a rectory, an endowment for the clergyman's salary, a fund for the supply of a choir, or the erection of a parish school-house. Then, secondly, think of the diocese and, as your sympathy may draw you, devote an offering to some one or more of its funds, missions, theological education, the aged and infirm clergy, the diocesan library, the support of the episcopate. Thirdly, have in mind our schools, St. Agatha's, in Springfield; St. Maur's, in Mt. Carmel; the Normal Kindergarten, in Danville, and our cathedral schools. Ah! brethren, our instruction and exhortation about wills is based upon the assumption that you recognize and act upon the duty laid upon you by Almighty God of paying and giving to Him in life, on principle, year by year, a certain proportion of your substance and your earnings. This is the education, the training which leads up to and prepares for the settling one's affairs in the fear of God. Without this it is to be apprehended that the passion strong in life will be stronger in death, and the low, mercenary spirit which holds back the man in health and strength from parting with his money will harden his heart and stay his hand from devising liberal things for the benefit of others when he is gone.

We need your help now, steadily, constantly. Failure of crops and prostration of business reduce income and limit resources. Still, we must not close our hands and give nothing, because we cannot give as much as we did once. Beware of the temptation which at such seasons always steals in upon us and suggests, "the times are hard, economy is necessary, cut off all your contributions to God. No matter if the church be closed and the sacraments cease, and the voice of praise and prayer be heard no more, and the clergyman leaves, and the congregation be scattered, and there is a general break up; no matter, these things have no material worth, no market value, they can better be spared than the comforts of your houses and the luxuries of your persons." Beware of this sophistry; it is plausible, but it is ruinous. When yielded to it deprives you of the best things which you have in the present, and it prejudices your prospects of improvement for the future. As you face this temptation and behave under it you can gauge your spiritual condition. If you listen and are convinced, and forthwith cut off the Lord's portion, then you come forth from your hiding-place and proclaim what manner of man you are, of little or no faith, secular, to whom the present world is well-nigh all, the future world is as nothing; on the other hand, if you resist and say to the tempter, "Get thee hence, Satan; I will not listen to thy preachings!" and begin to cut off your superfluities in food and dress and amusements, you will discover that you need not reduce very much your offerings to God, and you will discover what is better still, that your hold upon the things of faith is firmer than you knew, and amid your self-denial for the dear Lord's sake you will feel stronger and happier than you ever felt before. Aye, you will feel richer, because you will understand the meaning of the emphasized passage of Scripture, quoted by our Lord, "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word which proceedeth out of the mouth of God."

There is no contrast more comforting and suggestive of all good things than the church open, the services kept up, the parochial agencies in vigorous operation, while on the other hand, as men express it, "the times are hard," industries are checked, factories are closed, business is dull, crops are poor, and the outlook for the future is gloomy. Such a sight would startle one, and lead him to ask the question, "What does this mean? That gentleman has reduced his retinue of servants, that lady has dismissed her carriage, that farmer has recalled his son from school, that merchant has abandoned his sea-side trip with his family, those mechanics are doing extra work. What does all this mean? And the answer comes: "Look at that congregation issuing from the house of God; see that infant in the priest's arms as it is received into Christ's flock; watch those children as they recite their Catechism; follow the steps of the minister of God as he carries peace and the light of the other world into that sick man's dwelling; note, mark well these things, and know that the people who live here prize these things highest, put these things first, really, truly love these things better than they do servants, and carriages, and watering-places, and gold and silver." I covet such people. Give me such, and I ask nothing more. Ah! brethren, you have it in your power to present this inspiring, lovely picture in every mission and parish of the diocese. The conditions are all supplied in the stagnation of business, the scanty harvests, the grave apprehensions that the coming season will be less productive than the last; it remains for you to rise to the occasion and affirm by your acts that, whatever else you forego, you cannot and will not give up your Church, and the sacraments, and the blessed Word of God, read and preached.

Our diocese is worthy of our best efforts. Under the hardest conditions in which a diocese could possibly come into existence, Springfield has steadily done well. Her growth has not been unprecedented, but it has been satisfactory. The gains which have been made from year to year have added real strength and solidity to our household. We are homogeneous, we are at unity among ourselves, we believe in our mother the Church, and we know why we believe in her, and hence we can afford to be generous and patient, because we are so strong in our convictions and firm in our faith. After our missionary work our schools deserve our first thought and best care. They are doing a grand service to their pupils, and through them they will do a grand service to the Church five or ten years hence. Let us encourage them to the extent of our ability.—Synodal Address.

A GREAT necessity is a great opportunity. Much more is to be done for Truth amid the agitation and turmoil of an age like ours than in the old days of stagnation, when the life of the Church was frost-bound and frost-bitten, when there was little place for and recognition of heroism and self-devotion. Nothing is really lost by a life of sacrifice: everything is lost by failure to obey God's call. The great struggle of good and evil, of truth and error, which was raging when Deborah judged Israel rages still.—Liddon.

CHRISTIAN UNITY.

BY A. BATTE.

The recent meeting of the Congress of Churches in Hartford, Conn., has set many minds to thinking. The evils of a divided Christendom are recognized by a larger number of people than before, and those who had already seen them, feel more intensely. The friends of Christian unity are not discouraged by conflicting views of many of the speakers. It was not expected that there would be anything like a general agreement among them.

But the mere fact that such a meeting has been held, is in itself significant. It shows that people are getting tired of divisions. They want a change, and are seeking the best way to bring it about.

The wisest of them feel that organic union of any kind among Christians is not a thing to be brought about in a short time. Those who are laboring for that end do not expect to see it in their day. Their hopes are upon the rising generation. If these are instructed in fundamental Church principles, if the leading facts in the beginning of Christianity are made prominent, they may succeed in realizing what their fathers hoped and prayed for.

But what are those fundamental principles and facts, which it is believed will help all who are earnestly and honestly seeking to escape the dangers which a divided Christendom threatens. The following are suggested as likely to be useful:

1. The Christian Church was founded by Christ and His Apostles.

2. The first Book of the New Testament was not written until five years, some writers put it later, and the last nearly seventy years after the Church commenced her great work on the day of Pentecost, Acts, ii., 41.

3. It follows then that the Church is older than the New Testament Scriptures, and for about five years, at least, was the sole keeper and teacher of the faith, and the only visible guide of mankind in manners and morals.

4. This relation of the Church to the people was practically maintained up to the invention of printing and the general diffusion of elementary knowledge, when the Scriptures became accessible to all who desired to know the will of God.

5. It is in a measure maintained now. We do not give the Scriptures to our children to determine for themselves what is right in faith and practice, but we teach them these things orally, and when they are old enough send them to the Scriptures to know the certainty of the things wherein they have been instructed. St. Luke i., 4.

6. Without the Church there would have been no Scriptures. The books of the New Testament were written by members of the Church either to national Churches or individual members of it.

7. In the beginning there were many other books claiming to be inspired, and consequently the voice of God to men. The Church, by virtue of being the ground and pillar of the truth (I Tim. iii. 15), decided upon their conflicting claims, collected the books that were indeed inspired by the Holy Ghost into one volume, and has ever since kept and guarded them.

8. Snipped improbabilities of the organized Church having come down unbroken and entire through the centuries, apply with equal, if not with greater force to the Scriptures. Both had to watch during the long night of the middle ages. And both were exposed to the same influences, and had the same enemies. Besides, there is a special promise of Christ that the Church shall endure; there is none such as to the Scriptures.

9. The Church was fully organized during the lifetime of the apostles, and its purpose was to carry on upon earth the work which the Saviour began for the regeneration and salvation of fallen man. He said to His apostles, "As my Father has sent Me, even so send I you." (St. John xx. 21.)

10. No outward persecution nor inward corruption can totally destroy the Church, since Christ has said of it, "the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." (St. Matt. xvi. 18.)

11. The Church so established was to continue throughout time, for when He gave His last command to His apostles to make Christians of all nations, He promised, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world." (St. Matt. xxviii. 20.)

12. These same sayings of the Saviour were spoken during the forty days between His resurrection and ascension, when He instructed His apostles concerning the Kingdom (or Church) of God. (Acts i. 3.)

13. Since the Church as established by Christ and His apostles is to continue to the end of the world, no person, or set of persons, has the right to establish another in its place, and whoever attempts to do so commits a great sin. (Rom. xvi. 17, 18.)

14. If the Church in any part of the world should be in danger, so far as men can judge, of becoming corrupt in faith and loose in morals, even then it would be a sin to desert it and set up a rival one. All good people should remain in her fold, and labor at reformation as our English reformers did, and as the prophets and other holy men did in the darkest days of the Jewish Church. Even idolatry and gross wickedness in the Church could not drive them out, or lessen their love. (Ps. cxxxvii. 5, 6.)

15. The faith was once for all delivered to the saints. (St. Jude, 3d v.) and as such can not be added to or taken from.

16. The first Christians knew that faith, which was very early summed up in a form of sound words (II. Tim. i. 13), and has come down to us (in substance) in what is known as the Apostles' Creed.

17. What is contained in this Creed, only, is matter of faith, all outside is matter of opinion, on which it is lawful for persons within the Church to differ.

18. All people cannot think alike. This is not a discovery of the nineteenth century. Our Saviour was aware of this fact. So was St. Paul. Yet the one prayed that His disciples might all be one (St. John xvii. 21), and the other commanded that there be no division among them. (I. Cor. i. 10.)

19. Sectarianism, in dealing with this fact, says there ought to be a separate Church for the accommodation of the different classes of opinions. The Churchman says no. The Church must be tolerant enough to receive all, provided they also hold the faith as contained in the Apostles' Creed. And the Church founded upon the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ Himself being the chief corner-stone—the Holy Catholic Church—is high and broad enough to do so.

20. Since we must obey the doctrine of Christ, in order to dwell with God, to be saved (II. St. John 9), it is certain that God has ordained some infallible way of ascertaining that doctrine.

21. That infallible way is to consult, first, the word of God (St. John v. 39); secondly, the teachings of the Church, which have been from the beginning, or, later, through any of her general councils, (Acts xv.) and lastly, to do the will of God as far as one knows it. (St. John vii. 17.)

22. This is the only infallible rule known to the Church. In its use there is no place for the Bishop of Rome and his pretended infallibility.

23. The conditions of perfect health are obedience to the laws of health. The conditions of spiritual health are obedience to spiritual laws. Without these conditions, an infallible personal teacher, even if we had such constantly at our side, could not teach us the doctrine of Christ.

It is not necessary to add that the Church of England and her daughter, the Protestant Episcopal Church in America, maintain the above principles, and that for them the teachings of the Church, from the beginning, are to be found in the Book of Common Prayer, not catechetically stated, but embodied, for devotional purposes, in the various offices, prayers, exhortations, collects, epistles and gospels; also in the articles, the creed and in the catechism. The Prayer Book does for the Church what the Law Reports do for the State. They both preserve for public use the decisions of the highest tribunals of each.

THE REB'D. MR. BLACKMAN OB DE
WEST INDIES PREACHES ON DE EBIL OB CHURCH DEBT.

BY J. D.

My brederin, in dis discourse I will not begin wid a tex', for de tex' dat fit de subject best is found in de book ob Mackbeth ("out dam' spot"). I hab seach de 'cripture from Dan to Beershebar to find de word "church-debt," an' I gib it up for it is not dere. So now I will begin my discourse. If a great general like de Duke ob Willington was to sale dis country from de foreign foe we would want to show him dat we feel grateful, an' we would say, "De duke hab no house, let us build one an' gib it to him." Now, my brederin, when we come to count up how much money it will take to build dat house we find dat de money we hab will only build a house half de size ob de one we tink a great general ought to lib in. So we call in de mortgage man, an' he say, "Ob, yes, I lend you de money. All you hab to pay me back is de interest, an' when you can't pay dat it will be all right, de least say de soonest mend, I will pay de mortgage mysel' an' tek de house." Well, we build de house, a big house, grand inside an' grand outside, an' we all march in a body, wid a big flag, an' a band playin, an' all de oder tings dat a great general should hab, an' we invite de general to come to de house, an' we mek a big 'preech, an' he de general say to we, "My friends, gib me de deed to mek me know dat dis house is mine, so I can 'tak you for it," an' we say, "Oh, general, de mortgage man is keepin' de deed for you; it is all right." An' de duke say,

"Is thy servant a dog dat he should do dis ting?" an' he walk out ob dat house. Now, my brederin dis tek me to anoder ebil ob my discourse, which is dis: Don't you tink it is mockin' dem good saints like St. Paul, an' St. John, an' St. Barnabas, an' de oder holy apostle, to baptize a church wid dem name, an' ax dem to stan' god-farder for it, when de mortgage man hab de deed? Dem holy man, who 'owed no man anyting' but love! I tell you, my brederin, a church can't prosper eben wid St. Paul's name, if de mortgage man hold de deed. Call you church by de right name, "de church wid de chancel mortgage," or "de church wid de church debt." It would sound more honest, my brederin, an' de people who jine would not jine it under a false name, for de name would tell dem dat de mortgage man hold de deed. An' dis bring me to de tird part ob my discourse. When you go to build a church don't gib a mortgage man stan'tin' room, for if you do he will not only draw out him own lawful interest out ob dat church, but him will draw out de interest ob all de people long wid it. Sometimes you can't find out de 'riginal people dat call in dat mortgage man. De want ob interest hab make dem not only leave de church, but leave dere debt for oder people to pay on dat spare room dat was only build for de looks ob de ting. So I say, my brederin, when you go to build a church ax de Lord to be de archeteeck—for 'except de Lord build de house, dey labor in vain who build it." Dey not only labor in vain, but dey labor in vanity. Yes, my brederin, we like de looks ob de big church, an' we don't like to b'long to dose who leaves dere person out in de cold—so we build a big parsonage an' we like to b'long to de parish wid dat beautiful church an' dat beautiful house for our minister. An' we feel proud dat we build it, an' we forget in de vanity of our heart dat de mortgage man hold de deed, an' dat take me to de fourth part ob my discourse. Now my brederin, when de mortgage man hold de deed, gibing for de sake ob de Master is lost sight ob. De ting dat is fust an' last wid us is gibing for de "church debt"—de ting we can't find in de Bible—so we hab to call in de help ob de world, or as de pilgrim hab it in him "Progress," "Vanity Fair." An' dat word "fair," my bredren, hab more den one meannin'. It means sometimes "envy," "hatred," "malice," an' all uncharitable tings, an' it mean poor, tired waden and sick children, an' it mean also dat de mortgage man wont gib up de deed. An' to tink wid it all my brederin, dat dat chnrech stan' dare like a poor, modersless chile, wantin' nourishment, for de hendens are neglected, for de mission work is wantin' 'pon dat debt, de children is loosin' de "early dew," for de Sunday-school is hungry for books, de Dorcas Society is in rags, for dat debt de hospital is wantin' for de "oil an' wine," but my brederin, de mortgage man hold de deed, an' de "cry from Macedonia" come to us in vain. Now my brederin, in conclusion, we will try to find out if dere is not some way to get dat deed from de mortgage man an' gib it to de Lord. Fust I will say, "call a solemn assembly" of all de people ob de church an' show dem dat forbidden tree dat dey call de debt. Show dem how it suck de berry life out ob de church, an' we will den and dere make a vow to cut it down an' not hab it to "cumber" us any more. But what shall we use to cut it down wid? My bredren I make answer: "Let us tek de ax ob unity, and sharpen it 'pon de grindstone ob self-denial, and if we don't cut it down to de berry root, den may I neber preach anoder discourse. Lastly, my brederin, let us tink ob de joy dat will come to us, dat joy dat kill de fatted calf couldn't hold a candle to it, for dat was joy ober one son, but dis will be joy ober a whole church, an' when we take dat deed from de mortgage man an' gib it to de rightful owner, what a joyful sound to hear de words "for dis my church was lost an' is found again, it was dead an' is alive again." Den we wont hab any 'casion to be 'shamed to ax de Lord himself to be de God-farder, an' instead ob de modersless chile 'tarbin' for de want ob nourishment, we shall hab de bride wid de 'weddin' garment "all ready waitin' for de bridegroom. Amen.

ONE GENERATION AND ANOTHER.

In the course of a sermon preached at the Trinity ordination in Cuddesdon parish church, the Dean of Windsor said: "Did you ever in the face of the cry our 'credless generation' and the 'rotteness of our moral standard,' turn back a century or so, and compare with such details as is possible the then literature, the then popular creed, the then moral standards with our own? Do we realize what the faith and the morals of educated men in England were, say at the beginning of the last century? Look at the sparkling pages of the Spectator or the Tatler, and see how Steele and Addison drag to light a moral turpitude, an intellectual credlessness, fifty times blacker than anything our own day has seen. To appreciate Addison's scathing essay on the supposed visit of an Indian king to St. Paul's Cathedral, or Swift's satirical 'Argument against abolishing Christianity,' it is necessary to realize a prevalence of godlessness among educated men to which the nineteenth century in England offers no parallel at all. Pass on half a century and we find Bishop Butler, the most careful and guarded of men, opening his famous charge to the clergy of Durham with a complaint that 'the influence of religion is now wearing out of the minds of men;' and again, 'It is come, I know not how; to be taken for granted by many persons that Christianity is not so much as a subject for inquiry, but that it is now at length discovered to be fictitious, . . . and nothing remains but to set it up as a principal subject of mirth and ridicule.'"

The fact is, one generation and another are pretty much alike. The fashionable scepticism of Swift's and Butler's time was only agnosticism in another dress. And the world will always wag along in the same manner. Be the results of science what they may, Christian men will continue to "love not the world, nor the things thereof" and irreligious men will continue to love both. See that ye be wise in your generation.

ALL agree that the lessons of adversity make the most lasting impressions; but, unfortunately, there are but few who can turn them to account, because to do so requires thought and a due appreciation of the difference between right and wrong.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

CHARLIE'S REWARD.

BY MINNIE E. KENNEY.

There was a vigorous slam of the front door, the sound of a boy's feet coming upstairs two or three steps at a time, a shout that made his mother involuntarily clap her hands over her ears, and Charlie was home from school.

"Oh, mother!" he exclaimed, bursting into the room where she sat at work, with a face radiant with delight—"oh, mother, we fellows at our school are going to have the grandest time to-morrow! We are all invited to an archery party, and we can take part in the shooting if we want to. We are going to meet at Willie Ellison's after school, and his father is going to drive us out to the place where the match is to take place. Won't it be fun, mother? I can hardly wait for to-morrow to come!" and he turned a double somersault on the floor by way of expressing his delight.

"I am sure you will have a delightful time," answered his mother, smiling at his enthusiasm. "Where is this party to be?"

"Out in the country, about ten miles from here," answered Charlie. "Will Ellison's uncle is going to give it, and I suppose that's how our school came to be invited. I am so glad I have been practising so much lately. There are to be two prizes given, one for the older boys, and one for us younger ones. Wouldn't you be proud of me if I should get one, mother? I'm going out to practice a little now," and he was darting out of the room, when his mother's voice recalled him.

my books," he answered. "Now I am going to see how much chance I have of winning that silver cup," and he was out in the garden in a moment more, putting up his target and preparing for practice in his favorite amusement.

He was really very skilful for a boy of his age, and he had good reason for the hope that he might be the successful competitor. He was quite sure that none of his school-mates were in better practice than himself, but perhaps some of the other invited guests might far surpass him.

He was so absorbed in his amusement that he did not hear his mother's voice, and she had to repeat her call before he answered.

"Charlie, it is time for you to come in and study your lessons," she reminded him.

"Oh, mother, just let them go this once," he pleaded. "I'll get up early and study them before school. To-morrow is the last day of school, so it won't matter much if I am not quite perfect."

"You won't enjoy pleasure as much if you neglect duty for it," answered his mother. "No my dear boy, I can't let you neglect your lessons even if this is the last of the term. Come in now and study hard for an hour putting everything else out of your mind, and then you will have plenty of time afterward for practice."

Charlie obeyed reluctantly. His lessons

HE PAUSED TO ADJUST ITS BRIDLE AND GIVE IT A KINDLY PAT BEFORE HE PASSED ON.

"Wait a moment, Charlie. Some young man of my acquaintance has left his school-books right in the centre of my work-table, and they are very much in my way."

Charlie laughed merrily as he gathered the books up and put them in order on the shelf.

"I was so excited about the shooting-match that I never once thought about would be very hard to conquer while his thoughts were so completely occupied by his prospective pleasure.

He seated himself at his books, and for a few moments really succeeded in giving his mind to them, but presently he broke the silence by exclaiming,

"Mamma, I do wish I knew whether any of the other boys who are going to be there are better shooters than the boys in our school. If they are not, I really think I have a pretty good chance of getting the prize. I do want it so, and wouldn't you like to have me get it?"

"There is something else I would like better, just now," answered his mother. "I would like to see my boy put all thoughts of the prize out of his head until he has learned his lessons. It won't take you very long to learn them if you apply yourself to them, and then you can think and talk about the party all you wish. Now don't think of anything but your grammar just now, and I will hear you when you are ready to recite."

"All right, mother, I'll try," answered Charlie, and he did try, although now and then visions of a silver cup would jumble themselves up in the oddest way with the nine parts of speech.

In somewhat less than an hour, however, all his lessons for the morrow had been perfectly recited to his mother, and he hastened out in the garden to utilize the daylight to the last moment.

He did not put away his bow and arrows until the purple twilight had made it too dim for him to clearly distinguish the target; then he reluctantly went into the house, wondering if the long hours would ever pass away until the afternoon of the next day.

He was glad when bed-time came, that he might go to sleep, to dream of the pleasures of the morrow.

He was up and dressed with the earliest dawn, and found time for an additional hour of practice before it was time for him to start to school.

"Charlie, will you leave a note at Mrs. Briggs's for me, on your way to Will Ellison's?" asked his mother. "It will only take you a little out of your way, and I think you will have time enough."

"It won't take me a minute to leave it," answered Charlie, putting the note in his pocket. "Now good-by, mother dear. You musn't be surprised if you see me come home with the silver cup, for if I shoot as well as I did this morning, I think I shall have a pretty fair chance."

"I hope you will be successful," answered his mother, returning his good-by kiss. "But don't let it spoil your pleasure if you don't win the prize. Good-by."

It was very hard for all the boys to keep still that day in school, and more than one wished that they could give the slow hands of the old clock a good push that would send them faster on their way toward the hour of closing.

The longest days pass at last, and the master, knowing that the boys were excited over their coming pleasure, made due allowance for their restlessness, and closed school earlier than usual, that they might give full vent to their delight.

Charlie started off at once to execute his mother's commission, fearful that he might forget it if he delayed until all the boys set out to Will Ellison's. He whistled cheerily as he went along, and he wondered how people that he passed on the street could look so contented when they had no archery party in prospect.

A poor old horse, who was tossing his head impatiently in its efforts to get its nose into the bag which held its dinner, attracted Charlie's attention, and he paused to adjust its bag and give it a kindly pat before he passed on.

He climbed the dark rickety stairs that led up to the room where Mrs. Briggs lived, and knocked at the door more than once before the sound was heard.

Mrs. Briggs was washing, and Charlie had to repeat his knock before she heard him, and called out "Come in." "I brought you a note from mother," said Charlie, handing it to her, and turning to leave the room.

"Wait a minute till I read it, and see if she wants any message sent back," answered Mrs. Briggs, and Charlie, rather against his will, waited in the small, close room that was full of steam from the tubs, and as hot as the bright rays of a June sun pouring down the tin roof just overhead could make it.

Suddenly there was a childish cry of pain and terror, and Mrs. Briggs echoed it as she dropped the note and sprang forward.

Her little girl, a child of two or three years old, had been wandering around the room unnoticed, and had pulled a pan of starch that stood on the edge of the table all over herself.

Mrs. Briggs had taken it from the stove a few minutes before, so its contents were hot enough to burn the child severely.

The mother was nearly frantic with distress. She began hastily to remove the child's garments, and exclaimed:

"Oh, Master Charlie, do run for your mother, quick! She will know just what to do, and stop for the doctor as you come back. Do make haste."

Charlie dropped his books and darted off, glad that he could be of some use to the suffering child. It was quite a long distance to his home, and he was quite out of breath when he rushed into the house and begged his mother to hasten to the child's relief.

Hastily collecting a few articles that she thought would be required for immediate use, she started at once, accompanied by Charlie.

"I must get the doctor now," he said, as he regained his breath. "Who shall I go for, mother? Our doctor lives so far away."

"You had better go for the one who generally attends her," answered his mother. "Perhaps a doctor may not be necessary. You can come back to Mrs. Briggs's with me, and then go for one from there if it is necessary."

Mrs. Briggs had applied some simple remedies to relieve the suffering of the child, but Charlie's mother saw at once that a doctor's services would be required, as the little girl was severely burned, and, obtaining the address of the physician, she dispatched Charlie at once to summon him.

As Charlie turned to leave the room the clock on the wall struck the hour of three, and for the first time since the accident had occurred he remembered the archery party.

This was the hour at which the boys were to meet at Willie Ellison's, and if he was to go with them he must start at once and go as speedily as possible, or he would be left.

But who would go for the doctor? "Mother, could any one else go?" he whispered.

Mrs. Briggs overheard him.

"There isn't a child in the house I could get to go," she answered. "They are all small, and they wouldn't know how to find the way. Won't you go, Master Charlie?"

It was a bitter disappointment to Charlie to give up the archery party upon which he had built such hopes, but he never once thought of preferring his own pleasure after he learned that there was no one else to go for the doctor.

"I'll go," he answered briefly, "and then I'll come back again and go for anything that you may want."

Tears came to his eyes as he caught his mother's look of sympathy for his disappointment and approval of his unselfishness, but he dashed them away as he hastened down stairs.

"I couldn't possibly have gone with the boys and left Mrs. Briggs without any one to send for the doctor," he thought to himself as he hurried along, "but it's awful hard to give up the archery party, for I feel most certain sure that I could have got the prize."

It did not make it any easier for him to catch a glimpse of the merry party starting off, as he passed the street.

He would have been one of the happiest among them if he could have been there as he had expected to be.

Even now there was time to join them, but that was not to be thought of. He could not have gone with any pleasure, knowing that he had purchased his happiness at the expense of duty.

He was just in time to meet the doctor starting out on his afternoon round of calls, and was glad to climb up by his side and ride back to Mrs. Briggs's, for he was beginning to be thoroughly tired with his exertions as well as his disappointment.

When Charlie and his mother went home together an hour later, after all had been done that was possible for the suffering child, he did something that I am afraid some of the boys of my acquaintance will think was very babyish.

He hid his face in his mother's lap, where no one could see the tell-tale tears, and gave vent to his disappointment in a hearty cry.

He was only ten years old, and I think many an older boy than Charlie would have found it very hard to bear up bravely under such a disappointment.

"I did want to go so, you know, mother," he said, as he raised his flushed face at last, feeling rather ashamed of his outburst of feeling.

"I know you did, Charlie dear," answered his mother, as she stroked the curly head, caressingly, "but I am prouder of you for giving up your own pleasure to do a kind act, than if you had won the archery prize, and I know you are happier, even though the disappointment is very hard to bear."

Charlie's eyes rested on the illuminated text that had been his last birthday gift, "In honor preferring one another," and he had the glad consciousness that he had indeed followed its teachings that afternoon.

It is not always that we are rewarded for an act of self-denial or a kind deed, but although Charlie did not know it, a far greater pleasure was in store for him than the one he had voluntarily surrendered. He went out in the garden to amuse himself as best he could, when he heard the door-bell ring, and presently his mother called,

He went into the house and entered the parlor, wondering who the visitor was; he gave a cry of delight when he found his sailor uncle waiting for him.

"Now I haven't but a few minutes to stay," said the captain, presently, "and I will tell you what I have come for. I think it would do this little fellow good to take a trip with me. I will take the best of care of him, and bring him back all safe and sound, and as brown as a berry. What do you say, my boy? Do you like the idea?"

"Oh, mamma, may I go?" cried Charlie, eagerly, for it had always been his chief ambition to take a trip with his uncle, and he could scarcely realize that he was really to have this happiness.

His mother willingly gave her consent, for she knew that she could safely trust him to his uncle's care.

All thought of his disappointment about the archery party was forgotten in his delight at this greater pleasure, and it would have been hard to find a happier boy anywhere than he was when his mother had hastily packed a small valise with the things that he would need, and he was ready to set out with his uncle.

He felt every inch a sailor in his blue sailor suit and broad hat, and his uncle assured him that in a few days he would be a regular little Jack Tar, as brown as he was himself.

There was only one thing to mar Charlie's happiness, and that was leaving his mother for so long a time, but her promise of frequent letters comforted him, and he started off with a bright face and light heart. I will not tell you all about his pleasant trip, and the many sights he saw and the nice times he had. I will leave you to imagine it all for yourselves, but I know he never had any reason to regret his self-sacrifice, although it seemed very hard at the time.

If he had followed the dictates of selfishness, and gone with his companions, he would have missed the greater pleasure of taking a trip with his uncle, for the ship was in port only for a few hours, and was on her way again long before the time that Charlie would have returned from the archery party.

It does not always follow that we will be rewarded as Charlie was for his kind deed, but we will always be far happier than if we consult only our own wishes, for we will have the happy consciousness that we are following the example of our Saviour, whose life was one continual denial of self for the sake of others.

PARAGRAPHIC.

THE first English Bible printed in this country owed its existence to the enterprise and capital of Robert Aitken. Bishop White read the proof, and Congress passed a formal resolution in approval of it.

THE parish at Jamaica, L. I., in the fall of 1704 received a challenge from the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, inscribed with the society's name in Latin. This cup, with one belonging to the church in Hempstead, which was five years later in date, was used at the late consecration service at Garden City.

THE Rev. Benjamin F. Matrau, of St. John's church, Saginaw, Michigan, is endeavoring to interest, with the approval of Bishop Spaulding, the Church in the mission work in Wyoming, and especially among the Indians of that far off territory. He has personally visited the field and made himself familiar with its wants.

MEN are provoked to jealousy and good works. Ezra Cornell's $1,000,000 to the university that bears his name was soon followed by Henry W. Sage's $300,000, Hiram Sibley's $85,000, and Mrs. McGraw-Fiske's $1,000,000. Many of our own institutions would be the better for such provocation from our men of wealth.

AT the annual meeting of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel the Rev. Bartholomew Edwards, who may be called the Patriarch of the English clergy, occupied a seat on the platform. He is ninety-seven years of age, was graduated at St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1811, and has held the same cure for seventy-two years, Ashill near Watton, Norfolk.

A REPORTER at the late Missouri convention gave an account, for a daily paper, of one of the sermons which was wholly fictitious, and had in it no shred of fact. He excused himself by saying that "he had to leave just before the text was given out, and so felt compelled to make up such a sermon as he thought would be likely to be preached." It need not be said that he had very original ideas of what a convention sermon should be.

IN a census of the morning congregations at some of our popular places of worship on a recent Sunday morning St. George's church was the third in rank, its worshippers numbering 1,232. The aggregate number attending divine service must be large, though often the congregations have a thin look. Sound, strong preachers attract hearers, and if the sheep are sometimes few, may it not be because there is so little fodder in the rack adapted to their spiritual wants? It is ill-feding upon wind.

IT is said that 50,000 Swedes annually leave their native country, and the majority of them find a home in the United States, where they make excellent citizens. At home they are familiar with the idea of episcopacy, the Established Church of Sweden being Episcopal. It might well be inquired if the Church here is doing its part to draw these incoming Swedes to her fold. Bishop Whitehouse officiated with the Archbishop of Upsala, but there is not as free intercourse between the authorities of the two Churches as could be desired.

The Churchman.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 1, 1885.

THE abject submission of Cardinal Pitra to the pope, as recited by our correspondent in Rome, is another illustration of the extraordinary process that is now going on in the Vatican. The present pope seems to believe it his duty to put the doctrine of papal infallibility into tangible, or at least visible, shape. With this end in view, he spares no opportunity to exalt himself, compelling even the highest of his ecclesiastics to remain on their knees, in interviewing him, though the interview may last for a half hour or more.

DR. BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, the philosopher, seems to have had very correct ideas of the relative place of worship and the sermon. In a letter to his daughter he says: "Go constantly to church, whoever preaches. The act of devotion in the Common Prayer Book is your principal business there, and, if properly attended to, will do more toward amending the heart than sermons. . . . I do not mean you should despise sermons even of the preacher you dislike, for the discourse is often much better than the man, as sweet and clear waters come through very dirty earth." George Herbert, long before Franklin, seems to have had the same idea when he said that with the worst of preachers he "could learn the text and patience."

It is a curious proof of the wrong-headedness of things that the English Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals recently held its sixty-first annual meeting, while the first annual meeting of the English Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children was held in the same week. In other words, animals were so much more than children objects of solicitude, that their Society antedates the children's by sixty years. It is curious to note that the last-named Society reported having found in the first year of its existence a woman, an orange-seller, who, to keep her boy from the School Board, habitually put him into an empty orange-box, corded it, and placed it under the bed, to remain there until her return at evening. The boy had become nearly demented when found.

In this city the Saturday half-holiday is a very large success, and the number of toilers released at one o'clock P.M. is now more than a hundred thousand. It is an unmixed boon, and there are no complaints on the subject except from the beer-shops and saloons. Saturday afternoon and evening were their harvest time, and the toilers now, instead of deadly poisons, are learning to drink in long draughts of pure air. The pleaders for the half-holiday have "buiided wiser than they knew," and have become efficient workers in the cause of temperance. Men will have stimulants of some kind, not to say must have, and Christian philanthropy has made a great gain when it substitutes ozone for the cup that corrupts the body and seethes the brain.

GENERAL GRANT.

OUR country mourns the loss of her most illustrious citizen, the greatest of her generals, and who stands among the greatest in the world's history. She mourns all together. It is not a sectional grief, for there is no longer sectional feeling.

From the days of Forts Henry and Donaldson, Gen. Grant has been a prominent figure in this country, not to say in the world. Twenty-seven battles crowned him with the laurel of victory, and Appomattox gave him a still dearer trophy, in the olive branch of peace; it was to conquer peace that he wielded the sword. He was brave in battle, he was moderate in victory, he was magnanimous to the vanquished, and his rank is forever secure among the great captains of the world—with Washington, Wellington and Bonaparte, he has taken his place in the Pantheon of fame.

He was twice President of the United States. In his progress around the world emperors, kings, courts and the people vied to do him honor; he was restored to his place as General in the army, which he had vacated at what he deemed the call of duty; he was assured of the grateful love of fifty millions of people. His cup was overflowing full with honors.

But it remained for him to achieve a greater honor still—he was to win victory over disease and death. We may say, with admiring reverence, that

"Nothing in his life

Beamed him like the leaving it; he died
As one that had been studied in his death
To throw away the dearest thing he owed,
As 'twere a careless trifle."

In the midst of vigorous life and health he was stricken down with a dread disease; at the very first there was no element of hope, "Even Saladin must die." It was proclaimed in his own and in the ears of the world. Day by day, month by month, for three quarters of a year, with suffering the most poignant, he watched its slow progress, the waning strength, the inevitable hour. The spectacle had in it something of the sublime, and the world looked on with bated breath. He had no murmur, no complaint, no thought of his sufferings and untimely end, but only for the anguished hearts around him. "I want no one to be distressed on my account," he said. It was such an example of patience, resignation to the will of God and hope, as is rarely witnessed. He was, in the full possession of his senses, dying, almost dead, and he had but one pang of regret, the separation from the wife he loved and from his children. It shows what even an imperfect religious system and education can do even in the last mortal hour, and the last struggle of Gen. Grant, facing death without fear, and going to the grave with hope, will win for him more enduring love than all his victories in battle and his civic honors. It was the supreme triumph of his life.

A WISE PLAN.

The subject of the Destitute Poor was recently taken up in Parliament, many leading members joining in the discussion. The member for Liverpool brought forward some very startling facts which have a pertinent bearing on the condition of things in large American cities. Sixty thousand families in London, he said, lodged each in a single room, while 600,000 people belonged to the semi-pauper classes. In the present century the population of London had increased three or four times as much as in the seven hundred years preceding. If it went on increasing at the same rate, by the end of the next century London and its suburbs would have a population of 30,000,000. Taking account of how such an enormous population was to live, he contended that the best way to solve this great and ever-increasing problem was to require the attendance of the destitute poor children at industrial schools to be held in the evening. In these schools the children should be taught tailoring, shoe-making, printing, as also the rudiments of other trades. This proposition was variously discussed, and though a motion to the above effect was lost, it was agreed on all sides to try to improve the technical education of children. It was for the want of this that they could neither get a living at home, nor would they be fit material to send as emigrants to America or to the British colonies. Indeed, it seemed to be generally agreed upon that improvement in technical education should be specially aimed at, that some fit proportion of these children might be qualified to migrate to other shores where there would be a demand for their skill and training, and where they could hope, at least, for a decent livelihood.

One trade, agriculture, as one of the speakers contended, was not overdone, while there were five brass foundries when only one was wanted, and so of other trades. Agriculture had the power of absorbing the population and of turning their knowledge to account. In Birmingham, he said, they sent children eight and ten miles that they might be taught in the details of agricultural industry. Another speaker thought that children should be taught in such special industries as cheese and butter-making, the idea being to keep them upon the land.

What was said by one of the speakers referred to in the matter of agriculture most certainly holds good in this country. Persons at all skilled in tilling the ground and in the raising of crops can always find employment. Farming, in fact, is the one occupation which will never be overdone. Therefore we wish to call attention to a scheme set forward by certain Church clergy who are intimately acquainted with the conditions of the very poor in this city, and who have satisfied themselves that their children, and especially the boys, can hope for a decent support only by being weaned away from the city and trained to agricultural pursuits. Consequently they have rented a farm to which from time to time they send instalments of boys from their mission in this city, and also intend to establish a training school in the matters of farming, stock raising, etc., the school to be a permanent establishment throughout the year. In due time they hope to form a colony of well-trained boys who have no further cravings after the society and surroundings of the city, and who from time to time may be drafted out West and put to useful and profitable labor. They have gone over the plan time and again, and see nothing in it visionary or impracticable. They believe the scheme calculated to bring usefulness, comfort, and independence to those who may have the advantage of it, while their staying in the city means helpless poverty, want, and wretchedness. A scheme of this sort is certainly to be looked into, and if it appears to combine the elements of reason and practical good sense, ample means should be forthcoming with which it may be carried out.

Men often confound charity with the giving of money for religious uses. One builds a church, he pays his minister's salary, he upholsters his own pew, and prays out of velvet-and-gold, and the sum total of the contributions may rise to a creditable amount. His praise may be in the gates, and deservedly so. But gifts like these have no relation at all to charity; they do but minister to one's own comfort and wants. The church and the minister, the upholstered pew and the velvet-and-gold prayer book are for himself and his family; they give repute in the community, they help supply his own wants, spiritual and temporal; but the money expended upon them is no more money given in charity than is the money spent upon food and apparel. It is money given for religious uses; it is a just and necessary expense; but it is not charity. Men give in charity when they give for others' uses, and not their own; when they do not expect personal benefit in return, as the Lord says: "Not hoping to receive as much again."

We believe in multiplying dioceses and bishops, and we are not uneasy about the provision to be made for their support. The dignity of the episcopate does not necessarily depend upon an unwieldy diocese or the extent of a stipend. Rhode Island was never in better condition than when its governor received just four hundred dollars annually, and its public men have never risen to greater eminence. Some fifty years ago or more a bishop of the Church was seen in the early morning blacking the boots of a brother bishop who was his guest, because he could not afford to keep a servant. The guest was shocked at the sight, but we doubt if the House of Bishops ever had in its ranks the superior of the one who that day wielded the brush. There are all over the Church priests the peers in learning and every kind of work of any bishop who ever wore lawn, and who live with their families upon salaries of less than one thousand dollars per year. We are not concerned, then, about the multiplication of bishops. They are ordained of God, and we believe in the motto of the pioneer bishop of the West, Jehovah Jireh.

THE REV. PHILO SHELTON, M.A.

The founder of the New England branch of the Shelton family in America was, a native of England, who emigrated Daniel to this country toward the close of the seventeenth century. He settled in Stratford, Conn., and married on April 4th, 1692, Elizabeth Welles of Wethersfield, and had nine children—two daughters and seven sons. He was an earnest and resolute Churchman, and suffered many indignities and hardships peculiar to the times in support of his religious faith.

The subject of this sketch was a grandson of Daniel Shelton—one of a family of fourteen children—and was born in Ripton (now Hamington) on May 7th, 1754. He received a classical education, and was the first alumnus of Yale College who bore the name of Shelton. He graduated in 1775, just after the outbreak of the Revolutionary War, and soon became a candidate for Holy Orders, and acted as a lay-reader in several places until his ordination. When a British expedition under the command of General Tryon was fitted out at New York in 1779, to harass the shore towns of Connecticut, Fairfield was one of the places invaded, the torch was applied to the dwellings of the rich and the poor, and the Episcopal church there, the parsonage, and other property belonging to the parish were consumed in the general conflagration. This destruction impoverished and depressed the people as a whole, and many of them fled; but the few Churchmen who remained rallied from all discouragement, rebuilt their houses, and met in them on Sundays to worship God according to the forms of the old liturgy, Philo Shelton, having been secured for a lay-reader. He acted at the same time in this capacity for the Episcopalians at Stratfield, where a wooden church was built as early as 1748, and also for those in Weston, where the flock had not been broken up by the disasters of the Revolution.

While waiting for ordination, he settled in life and married in 1781 Lbcy, daughter of Philip Nichols, Esq., of Stratfield, (now Bridgeport,) a strong Churchman, and the first lay-delegate chosen to represent the Diocese of Connecticut in the General Convention. In February, 1785, a formal arrangement was made that his services in each of the three places should be proportioned to the number of Churchmen residing in them respectively, and until he should be in Orders it was stipulated to pay him twenty-eight shillings lawful money for each day that he officiated. He was one of the four admitted to the diaconate by Bishop Seabury at his first ordination, held in Middletown on the 3d of August, 1785. Ashbel Baldwin, another of the four, who afterwards became his nearest neighbor and intimate friend and associate in efforts to build up the Church, used to say that the hands of the bishop were first laid upon the head of Mr. Shelton, so that his name really begins the long list of clergy who have had ordination in this county by bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church.

After his admission to Holy Orders, according to his own statement, he took full "pastoral charge of the cure of Fairfield, including Stratfield and Weston, dividing his time equally between the three churches, with a salary of one hundred pounds per annum from the congregations and the use of what lands belonged to the cure." It was a small living for a clergyman who already had a wife and two children, but the Revolutionary War had so reduced the people and their resources that it could not well be made larger. Five years passed away before the enterprise of building a new church in Fairfield was entered upon, and then it was erected about a mile west of the site where the old one stood, being only inclosed and made fit for occupancy at the time, and not finished and consecrated till 1798.

The population was drifting from Stratfield toward the borough of Bridgeport, and in 1801 it was deemed advisable to demolish the old church and build a new one in a more central situation. Mr. Shelton saw the wisdom of this movement and encouraged it, though it was attended very naturally with some painful considerations, and took away a pleasing picture from the landscape which filled the vision of Dr. Dwight when he wrote his poem entitled "Greenfield Hill."

"Here, sky-encircled, Stratford's churches beam,
And Stratfield's towers greet the roving eye."

The new church in the borough was so far completed as to be used for public worship in the beginning of Advent 1801, and two years later "the ground floor was sold at public vendue for the purpose of building the pews and seats thereon and finishing the church, and the money raised in the sale amounted to between six and seven hundred dollars." The cost of the building, about thirty-five hundred dollars, was over and above this, and was met by the voluntary contributions of the people. Mr. Shelton, in speaking of the completion of the whole work, said: "It has been conducted in harmony, with good prudence, strict economy, and a degree of elegance and taste which does honor to the committee and adds respectability to the place."

For forty years the scene of his ministerial labors was undisturbed, and he dwelt among his people in quietness and confidence, and had the satisfaction of seeing them attain to a high degree of worldly prosperity, and St. John's church, in Bridgeport, especially, to be one of the strongest and most flourishing in the diocese. The silent influence of a good life carried him along smoothly, and left its gentle impress wherever he was known. "A faithful pastor, a guileless and godly man," is a part of the inscription upon the marble monument erected over his ashes in the new cemetery at Bridgeport, a few years since, by his son William, and these words sum up very appropriately his ministerial and Christian character. While he confined himself closely to the duties of his cure, he shrank not from work put upon him by the diocese, and was for twenty-four years a member of its Standing Committee, and a firm supporter of ecclesiastical authority in times of trial and trouble.

There were things that gave him great pain towards the end of his days, and "put his confidence in the providence of God to a sure test." He and Mr. Baldwin, so long earnest and friendly workers in adjoining fields of labor, appear to have reached the same determination at the same time, and probably conferred together before resigning their respective rectorships, which they both did in 1834. Bishop Brownell, referring to this action in his address to the annual convention of that year said: "These clergymen were admitted to their ministry at the first episcopal ordination ever held in America, and have served their respective parishes for more than thirty years. They have labored faithfully in the Church in this diocese during its darkest periods of depression, and through the progressive stages of its advancement they have taken an important part in its councils. They have 'borne the heat and burden of the day,' and are entitled to the gratitude of all those who enjoy the fruits of their counsels and labors."

Mr. Shelton confined his services after this wholly to the church in Fairfield, but he did not long survive the change. He died on the 27th of February, 1835, and was buried under the chancel of the old church in Mill Plain, Fairfield, where he had ministered for more than forty years, and a marble tablet was provided by the congregation to mark his resting place, on which, among other things, were inscribed the date of his birth, graduation, admission to Holy Orders, and the words, "being the first clergyman episcopally ordained in the United States."

In 1843 the parishioners of Trinity church, Fairfield, voted to remove all the public services to the chapel, which had been built seven years before in the borough of Southport, about a mile and a half distant from Mill Plain, and to transfer the site, title and rights of the parish to that edifice. The old building was some time afterwards designedly or accidentally burnt, and the memorial tablet destroyed. Then the remains of Mr. Shelton were removed, and now have a final resting place with his wife and children in the cemetery before mentioned. A monumental tablet in the wall of St. John's church, Bridgeport, "bears an affectionate testimony to his Christian worth and ministerial fidelity."

His widow survived him thirteen years, and the clergy in convocation adopted a resolution of sympathy, and requested Bishop Brownell and their secretary to communicate to her; in doing which they said: "We beg you will accept it as a token of our affectionate respect and consideration, though we trust you needed no such formal expression of our sentiments. Forty years of faithful labor in the vineyard of his Divine Master, a manifest devotion to the best interests of the Church, and a character distinguished for Christian simplicity had secured for your deceased husband a united and affectionate attachment of his clerical brethren, which few of his survivors can hope to surpass. It must be some consolation to you that his memory is duly cherished, but it is a still higher consolation to reflect that all those amiable qualities and Christian virtues which endeared him to his earthly friends served to constitute his preparation for that better world, where they will find their appropriate sphere, and where they will be perfected for a still more exalted service of his God and his Redeemer."

Two of his sons entered the ministry of the Church. The younger of them, George Augustus Shelton, a graduate of Yale College, died in 1863, rector of St. James's church, Newton, L. I. The other, the late William Shelton, D.D., succeeded his father for a time in Fairfield, and then went to Buffalo, where for more than half a century he was the distinguished rector of St. Paul's church, the oldest parish in that city. Both died childless, and the name of Shelton disappears from the list of our clergy.

REVIVAL AND THE ADVENT MISSION.

Every good thing is attended by dangers, has within it the possibilities of evil, in its exercise may be perverted to harm.

Sensible men are not so influenced by the perversion of a principle that they are willing to condemn the principle, or refuse to exercise it.

Human nature is the one thing in all the ages remaining the same.

Every holy teaching has been made the occasion of unholy strife, every dogma has rallied about itself wicked discussion, not any sacred thing has ever been above being dragged into the arena of evil uses. Yet holy teachings abide, dogmas remain steadfast, sacred things are inviolable. He is foolish who, resisting perversion of good uses, goes so far in his opposition as to relinquish the uses.

Religious revivals are nothing new. The first chief one mentioned in Scriptures is that for which Joel commands, "Sanctify a fast; call the solemn assembly." Another prophet expresses the need of the thing when, from the depths of a troubled heart, he cries, "Revive Thy work, O God!"

The first sermon preached by the mighty power of the Holy Ghost created such a stir that we might well say its effects were other than quiet and moderate. Because some thought the disciples were drunken, no Christian disparaged Peter's sermon or found fault with apostles' methods.

Very early in the history of the Christian Church a special rank, if not an order, of the ministry was created, and "evangelists, to preach the Gospel only," worked with bishops, priests, and deacons, to gather together the elect. Very early, too, the perversion of the principle of revival appeared in the sects of Montanists and Kathari, who, adopting methods more grotesque than serious, had to be disciplined by council and rebuked. Still the idea of revival remained, and very soon—so soon that antiquarians confess their inability to fix the date of its beginning—the season of Lent became a settled ordinance in the Church, and once a year it became understood that extraordinary acts of penitence and devotion was the rule. But not then did revivals, as such, cease. The history of the Church in any age reveals the need, at times, of special awakening, and the revivals instituted to meet the need. He who thinks the revival in religion originated with the Wesleys is very much on a par with him who imagines the Christian Church began its history with Martin Luther. We acknowledge that our experience with a certain sort of religious revival conducted by ignorant enthusiasts of a sect has not pleased us; yet we would be slow in saying that even from such doings good had not resulted.

When the conservative Christian queen and the notable premier contribute to the support of a movement whose methods are faulty, we feel reluctant in altogether condemning the movement. Facts are stubborn, and here is one fact awfully stubborn for an English Churchman to confront. A class of people reached by none other has in large measure been appealed to and quickened into spiritual life by the Salvation Army, all of whose principles and none of whose tactics, for the life of us, we can approve. For us, rather would we leave such agencies alone, and say, "If they be not of God, they will come to naught."

But though we may leave faulty methods alone, we cannot do the same with a righteous principle. We cannot, if we would, leave the principle of revival alone. Conscience will not let us. The same thing which moves others without proper means to effect their object moves us, or ought to move us. Something is wrong if it does not.

It is all well enough for us to go to church Sunday after Sunday, and say, "Soul, take thy ease, all is well with thee," but meanwhile souls are perishing all around us. Within the sound of our church-bells whole families are godless, intemperance and vice stalk before us with familiar mien, injustice cries for mercy, wives and children are suffering agonies they cannot tell—and all these things near us, very near us, some of us ministers know how near. One man converted would make a whole family happy. One woman brought to feel the need of her Saviour might turn a home now worldly into a peaceful sanctuary. One child made to think seriously might introduce an angel into abodes now peopled only by fiends.

Year after year we go on like an exclusive set of "holier than thou" saints, satisfied to attend church once a week, wait upon sacrament once a month, and increase our numbers only by the natural increment of our own children maturing.

A church satisfied with such a work is nearly dead, if not quite gone. Christians contented with such a work certainly need a revival, several of them.

We hail the coming mission services in Advent. It is a revival, genuine revival. Let us not fear the name. It is a better name really than mission, and more scriptural. If by this means we can arouse the careless, deepen the spiritual life of the zealous, awaken the sinner, and bring all sorts and conditions of men to a real saving knowledge of Jesus, then thank God for the privilege.

We believe that such a concerted movement as shall be made in the several large cities next Advent will create such an impression upon the community and leave such a blessing behind it, that for months we shall feel that God was with us directing in all our doings. Our brethren may feel that a revival is not a new thing, nor an untried thing, nor an unapproved thing. The Holy Spirit has thus engaged before this. A righteous motive impels this movement. All of its methods are to be strictly Churchly, and in harmony with liturgical rites and usages. The results, we believe, will be such that all occasion for questioning the methods will be taken away. Regular Morning and Evening Prayer services are forms approved for the use of those already Christians. To expect to arouse the conscience of a man not yet interested in holy things by our morning and evening office, is equal to expecting to awaken in the soul of a deaf man the appreciation for music by thundering in his ears some of the fugue movements of Bach.

It can't be done this way.

Churchmen, of all others, can afford to be liberal in methods. Our stiff conservatism will keep us out of trouble, even if some of our methods do vary from the ordinary, and occasional services be run in a different mould.

If for a season shorter services be had, new and simpler hymns be sung, sacraments be ministered at other times than early dawn or mid-day, opportunity be given for those desiring after service a few moments of meditation and prayer, a word be said in private to the soul yearning for a kind assurance from some one higher in grace than himself, if more earnest practical sermons be preached to awaken an interest in such serious themes as life, probation, death, salvation, let us not stop at methods, but down upon our knees, let us pray God to bless any means whereby souls may be brought out of darkness and into His marvellous light.

There need be no fear on the part of over-scrupulous Churchmen that mission methods are to bring discredit upon our Zion. What with rubrics and canons and bishops, fortified by the tremendous power of conservatism among the laity, it will be very difficult, if not impossible, to go very far wrong.

The aim of the coming revival is holy. Its methods will be holy. Its results will be vast, if all do their duty. Pray for its success, brethren, pray often, pray fervently. It would be a sad state of things if we were so conservative and so self-satisfied that, surrounded by the necessities for a religious awakening, we could not find it in our hearts to lift up a prayer for a revival in Zion. God help us if we have come to this!

Rather from our hearts the prayer of Habakkuk, according to the variable songs "upon Shigionath."

"O, Lord, revive Thy work in the midst of the years, in the midst of the years make known; in wrath remember mercy."

DISESTABLISHMENT IN ENGLAND.

One of the greatest of the joys and privileges of a visit to England is the opportunity it affords to American Churchmen to hear the topics of religious and ecclesiastical interest handled by the most cultured minds of the age. The faith is the same, and the lessons taught are not dissimilar to those we have heard at home, but there is often a depth of treatment for which the leisure of ample endowments gives opportunity, and there is a culture of style and diction based upon the most finished scholarship of the old universities which make old truths shine with a force and a brightness which hold us wrapt in admiration, and create impressions never to be effaced.

I was travelling through Oxfordshire, and found that the Archdeacon of Oxford was to deliver his charge on that day, and I contrived to stay over for the service. The archdeacon was Dr. Edwin Palmer, younger brother of the Earl of Selborne, the Lord Chancellor. He was a distinguished Oxford scholar, and for some time Professor of Latin in the University of Oxford, before he became archdeacon, and never was I more impressed with the grace and exquisite culture of diction which the old classical curriculum of the universities affords. This utilitarian age has begun to substitute what are regarded as more practical subjects of study; but I am as far as ever from being convinced that for accuracy of expression and beauty of style we can find any course so efficient as the study of the ancient Latin and Greek authors.

The subject was disestablishment, which is now much talked of as being possibly a consequence of the extension of the franchise to the agricultural laborers. It may interest your readers to know what view earnest-minded Churchmen take of this question.

The archdeacon said that the popular notion was that at some time or other in the past the State had selected the Church of England as one out of several religious bodies, and had bestowed upon it certain exclusive advantages. He said it was amazing that a view so utterly devoid of any historical basis whatever should for a moment be put forward by men who professed to be educated. Churches were built in the early days of English history, just as they are now, by pious persons, and were endowed then, as now, with land or money to support the services. If kings gave, sometimes liberally, it was not out of taxes or national funds, but out of those means which they bestowed freely upon friends and courtiers for their private use; they did not give as kings, but as individuals well-disposed to the Church. Then it must be remembered, too, that there was but one Church in those early days to which all the people belonged, and so there was no preference.

Then what did establishment mean? It did not mean that at any certain date the State began to favor the Church, for the Church was here before there was any State of England. But establishment meant support; it meant that whereas the bishop and the earl held their courts at the same time, the State began to help to enforce the judgments of the ecclesiastical courts, to protect the clergy in the use of their property, and what now we should not approve of, to punish or persecute those who resisted the authority of the Church. But the advantage was not all on the side of the Church. The State, in return, claimed to nominate the bishops, and to exercise the right of judgment upon appeal, and in other ways, to control the clergy, and very ugly statutes of præmunire and provisors were passed to restrain the clergy in obedience to the State, and the convocations of the Church can pass no canons without the royal consent.

The class of persons who desire to disestablish the Church call themselves the Society for the Liberation of the Church from State Control. By this we should suppose, if language were used in its natural sense, that they desired to give the Church greater liberty of action, as e. g. in the choice of its bishops, by removing the threat of præmunire which a prime minister in this age was found on one occasion to remind a cathedral chapter was still on the statute books, or to give our convocations liberty to regulate the affairs of the Church. But strange to say we do not find the friends of the Church in this society, but its bitter opponents, the truth being that under the specious name of liberation they mean not only the withdrawal of the recognition of the Church by the State, which we call establishment, but also disendowment, which is a far different thing.

The power of the State over property has been exercised in all ages. The dissolution of the monasteries and the distribution of their lands for other purposes is an instance; and so, too, in our own days, there has been the disendowment of the Irish Church. But some strong reason is supposed to exist to justify such procedure. In the present case it would be well to ask the question and have it fairly answered, "Whom will disendowment benefit?"

It would not destroy the Church of England. That Church, founded by our Lord and filled with His Spirit at Pentecost, will go on endowed with a power which no human hand can destroy, whether established or not. Disestablishment would not hurt her; nay, on the contrary, there are many of her best sons who feel that the full power to choose her bishops and regulate her own affairs would be worth a heavy purchase. But disendowment would cripple missionary work at home and abroad, and destroy for the next fifty years much of that overflow of charity into numberless channels of blessing from the very necessity which would at once arise of concentrating all our contributions on the sustentation of the clergy, and whilst in the towns where wealth abound the change would not be much felt, in many of our small country parishes the light of religious privileges would be sadly dimmed.

But who would be benefited by this? Surely not those religious dissenters who, we think, love the name and the cause of the Saviour as ardently as ourselves. Would it gratify them to see God's work in the world diminished and impaired? The answer to this is that there are tens of thousands in our cities entirely unbenefited by religion as well as in foreign lands, and so there is more than room for every Church and religious denomination to work. There is indeed, said the archdeacon, a definition of jealousy given in one of the old writers of antiquity in which he speaks of envy or jealousy as the desire to take something from another, not because we thereby derive any benefit to ourselves, but only to injure the other. But never can I believe, he added with a noble burst of feeling, that such a motive can seriously be attributed to sincere Christian men of whatever name. He scorned the imputation. The truth is it is a purely sentimental grievance, and to abstract this amount of money from the support of religion to which it is now devoted, would be a benefit only to the enemies of all religion. Some had thought that the Church of Rome would in the end profit by a blow thus inflicted upon the Church of England. He did not believe this. The only party which would be served thereby was that of those who are opposed to religion of every kind. It would be a distinct concession to them to take out of the way all those religious influences which for centuries had gathered around the established Church, but to no Christian body could such a sacrifice be any gain.

He hoped that this practical question, Whom would disendowment benefit? would be well considered by all thoughtful men before they proceeded to entertain their ideas, and it should be regarded as a practical and not a sentimental question.

The clergy of England are now suffering very much from the depressed prices. In many places the glebes cannot be let at all, and they have tried to farm them themselves, with the result of getting deeper into the mire; for if professed farmers cannot make the land pay, it is useless to expect that the clergy can farm to advantage. Endowments have a darker as well as a lighter side. G.

LETTER FROM ROME.

The final decision of His Holiness Leo XIII. to nominate Dr. Walsh to the Archbishopric of Dublin has excited a good deal of astonishment here. Strange to say it is attributed to the influence of English Roman Catholic dignitaries, especially Cardinal Manning. His Eminence has never favorably viewed the negotiations between the Gladstone Government and the Holy See, and in fact when last at Rome, told the pope quite plainly that the grand old man was humbugging him; no official envoy would be appointed in return for the cardinal's hat given to the late Archbishop McCabe. Dr. Walsh being the reputed author of the "No rent" manifesto, it cannot be supposed there was not sufficient reason for loyal Irish Catholics to oppose his nomination, and his intentional discourtesy to the Prince and Princess of Wales must make him unacceptable to any British government. The Queen having signified her approval of Mr. Errington's efforts in the cause of law and order, by conferring a baronetcy upon him, will probably have an effect at the Vatican, where the tone of the raving Bishops Croke and Nulty had latterly prevailed in his disfavor.

The cardinal's hat for Dr. Moran is to be a bonbon to make up for any disappointment he may feel as to the Dublin archbishopric. In fact the pope is interesting himself in having all his robes and laces as Prince of the Church prepared for him. Both Dr. Moran and Dr. Walsh are expected here for the public consistory on the 23d.

Leo XIII. has indeed lately given fresh proofs of a just and conciliatory disposition toward Italy, although the expectations founded upon them of speedy accord on the "Roman question" are quite exaggerated. His Holiness probably in return for the concessions of the Italian government as to the Propaganda property; for exemption of missionaries from military service; for increasing the apportionment of country curates, has nominated three Italian cardinals of pronounced liberal politics. One is Monsignor Schiaffino, who is most zealous for peace between State and Church, and for the political unity of Italy. Then Monsignor Battaglini, Archbishop of Bologna, a prelate acceptable to King Humbert—a friend of Minghetti, and the actors. Lastly Monsignor Capecepatro, the learned Archbishop of Capua, confessor to Queen Margherita and known as having by his pious counsels contributed to the quieting of her majesty's conscience during the first years of the present reign, as to the lawfulness of the Italian occupation of Rome, the City of the Pope.

Leo XIII. has likewise silenced the violent Ultramontane Journal de Rome, which as champion of the Temporal Power and Legitimism, went such lengths in exciting revolt against the present order of things that its editor, M. des Honz, was several times fined and imprisoned and the paper seized about once a week. The motive which decided the pope to suppress the paper was the republication in it of a most reactionary letter from Cardinal Pitra, Bishop of Porto, to the editor of another inflammatory ultramontane paper of Amsterdam. This epistle is wholly laudatory of the fanatics who would rule the whole world by the Inquisition, with a pope at their head who should not dare to think for himself, and abusive of the moderate Catholics and their journals. Regretful reference is made to the later policy of Pius IX. and the present pontificate is utterly ignored, as if the Church was tossing about without any guidance whatever. This production called forth a stern rebuke from Leo XIII. himself in an autograph letter addressed to the Cardinal Archbishop of Paris. Then came the order from the Vatican suppressing the Journal de Rome, and Cardinal Pitra was summoned to give an account of himself to the pope. A noble guard on duty at the Vatican that day told me the interview between the pope and Cardinal Pitra lasted an hour, and that the cardinal came forth from the pontifical presence exceedingly crestfallen—looking in fact as if he had just got what the Romans call a lavata di capo, which means a good scolding under the figure of your head having been under the pump.

Next the repentant cardinal published a letter in the Osservatore Romano to His Holiness, beginning thus: "Most Holy Father, prostrate at your feet I bow beneath your hand, before the reproof of Christ's Vicar, whose displeasure is so great a chastisement that I can only protest before God from the bottom of my heart that I can only find there the most entire submission to the reproaches, advice and to every word of your letter to the Cardinal Archbishop of Paris. I deplore that which your holiness deplores, I desire what you desire and condemn what you condemn."

Cardinal Pitra's submission was not followed by his associates in the curia and the press, who are more papal than the pope himself. Reports were spread from clerical sources that Leo XIII. was going to accept the Law of Guarantees and the Dotation, but these are only explosions of ultramontane temper and have been officially contradicted.

A curiously interesting discovery has just been made on the bank of the Tiber close to Monte Testaccio and the colossal ruins of the great Emporium of Ancient Rome. Here were situated the wharves and warehouses where the galleys from all parts of the known world, and from Africa and Asia especially, discharged their cargoes. At this spot some eight hundred blocks of marble of various kinds and of the rarest descriptions were found twenty years back just as they had been landed from the quarries of Greece, the Grecian islands and Asia Minor fifteen centuries ago, with the quarry numbers and the indications corresponding it is supposed with the entries on the "hills of lading" cut on each and fresh as the day they were carved. And now in the process of the building operations for the spread of the city in that direction, two warehouses (buried out of sight from the days when Gothic hoards wrought destruction in Rome) have been discovered, the one filled with splendid elephant tusks and the other with lentils; very different objects of importation, though, as regards the lentils they may perhaps have been stored there for export, for we know they were often shipped as ballast.

ENGLAND.

CONVOCACTION OF CANTERBURY.—The Convocation of Canterbury reassembled at Westminster on Tuesday, July 7th.

In the Upper House a motion expressive of the sense of the bishops of the loss sustained in the death of the late Bishop of Salisbury, and of their sympathy with his family in their bereavement, was unanimously adopted.

After an earnest speech by the Bishop of Peterborough (Dr. Magee), a resolution expressing the gratification of the house that the Criminal Law Amendments Bill, though but a partial remedy for the terrible evils which it is intended to cure, has received the assent of the House of Lords, and the bishops' deep conviction that there should be no delay in regard to the steps necessary to be taken in order that the bill may become law, was unanimously adopted.

[NOTE.—This action was taken prior to the publication of the Pall Mall Gazette exposures. Convocation has been urging this bill for some time.]

On Wednesday the Upper House considered and agreed with the resolution relating to the proposed House of Laymen as finally amended by the Lower House.

An important report on the subject of Sisterhoods and Deaconesses was brought up and read. The substance of this report is as follows: Speaking of vows, it says,

"A vow, in the proper sense of the word, is a promise unreservedly made to God, which, therefore, if rightly and lawfully made, cannot be set aside—cannot be annulled by any authority but that of God himself. But, inasmuch as cases have occurred, and do from time to time (however rarely) occur, in which the life-long engagement must be, or ought to be, set aside; a vow, as already defined, ought not to be taken. No engagement, therefore, should be made without the reservation of release to the bishop. For the greater solemnity of the promise, and for the better understanding of his power of release and its limits, the profession of a sister should be made to the bishop himself." Having dealt with the authority of bishops over sisterhoods, which, it was stated, must depend greatly on their statutes, the relation of sisterhoods to the parochial clergy was alluded to. The report then stated that "it is of the utmost importance that no suspicion should attach to the dealings of a sisterhood with the property belonging to its members." The committee thus concluded its report:

"It is true, however, that in order to obtain well qualified deaconesses there must be a home or institution in which they can be trained as deaconesses, and probably not only trained there, but maintain a relation to it throughout their deaconess life. Women require more support than men; it is a constant resource and strength to them to have a home to which they are attached, and to which they can return from time to time, either for refreshment during their labors, or for retirement when they cease to be employed in any particular parish. Experience in the last twenty years proves that deaconess so set apart and so engaged are able to do a work the value of which cannot be over-estimated. In case of the young, the ignorant, the poor, the sick, the tempted, and the sinful, they have shown an efficiency which is beyond all praise. It seems desirable—

(1.) That a deaconess should be admitted in solemn form by the bishop with laying on of hands.

(2.) That there should be an adequate probation.

(3.) That a deaconess so admitted should never cease to be a deaconess, unless either deposed or released by the bishop.

(4.) That, however, there should be no promise of celibacy, at all events for more than a limited period.

(5.) That a license should be given to each deaconess employed in any parish by the bishop of the diocese.

(6.) That the dress should be simple, but distinctive.

(7.) That a deaconess should not pass from one diocese to another without letters commendatory from the bishop of the original diocese.

(8.) That special care should be taken to provide for every deaconess sufficient time and opportunity for the development of her own spiritual life."

An interesting discussion ensued.

The Bishop of London thought that the House should be allowed time for a more careful consideration of the important report before adopting it. He felt that it was drawn up with a certain idea of a sisterhood, and excluded from consideration sisterhoods of a different character. He could conceive of a sisterhood with not only no vow and no life-long engagement, but in which the engagement should be of a distinctly temporary character. He should regret that the report should go forth as an expression of the favorable opinion of the House.

The Bishop of St. David's said that the report seemed to place the deaconess in a position analogous to that of the deacon, but he thought it was more analogous to that of a lay reader. Deaconesses were not yet an order in the Church of England as at present constituted, and they had no power to create such an order.

The Bishop of Winchester entirely agreed with the Bishop of London as to vows, but the committee took the question of sisterhoods as they found them. The committee felt the force of that which was urged by some sisterhoods, viz., that they had been allowed to grow up in the dark, and had done a great and good work for the sick and suffering without having received much countenance from their lordships. They even urged that if they could only receive the confidence and a few kind words of support, and be taken, as it were under the protection of the Church, they would be far more obedient children than hitherto. Caring as they did for the countenance and guidance of bishops, the committee were not neglectful of that wish in their report. It would be a most excellent thing if they could dispense with life-long vows. There was a great deal of evidence that in the primitive Church, deaconesses was one of the orders of the Church.

The Bishop of St. Asaph pointed out that the possibility of sisters being allowed to endow the Church might prove very injurious to the members of their families.

The Bishop of Winchester stated that the committee had to deal with facts as they found them. He agreed that it was not desirable that such a power of endowment should belong to the sisters, and the committee had in the report shown their desire to restrain it.

The Bishop of Chichester stated that many of the sisters took vows believing that no earthly power could release them, and that they were for their lives devoted to God's service. They fully believed they were under a life-long obligation when they took the three vows of celibacy, poverty and obedience. They believed that they were as much devoted to God's service as the nuns of the Roman Catholic convents. That he believed to be the case with the majority of the sisters in the sisterhoods in England.

The Bishop of Lincoln was of opinion that even in Roman Catholic countries there was a power of dispensation from vows.

On the motion of the president the report was accepted with gratitude for the labors of the committee, who were requested to frame resolutions based upon the report.

In the Lower House, on Tuesday, the Rev. Dr. Edwin Harwood, of New Haven, Conn., and the Rev. Dr. C. R. Hale, of Baltimore, Md.; was introduced and welcomed by the prolocutor as visitors from the sister Church in the United States.

The amendment of the Upper House to the scheme of the House of Laymen was considered. The provision, struck out by the Upper House, limiting the subjects for consideration, was reinserted, and the proviso added by the Upper House agreed to, "that nothing in this scheme shall be held to prejudice the duties, rights and privileges of this sacred synod, according to the laws and usages of this Church and nation."

On Wednesday nothing of general interest occurred in the Lower House.

PROPOSED UNION OF TWO SCHEMES.—The "Free Church of England" held its annual convocation in London on June 30th and July 1st. The "Right Rev. Bishop Price, Primate," presided. Among other things, a long discussion took place as to the advisability of union with the "Reformed Episcopal Church," and the convocation unanimously accepted a draft scheme to form the basis of such union, and ordered it to be laid before the Synod of the Reformed Episcopal Church.

MR. CHARLES POWELL'S RETURN.—Mr. Charles Powell arrived in England from America on Monday, July 6th. As a practical result of his visit the organization of guilds and the development of existing societies has begun in the United States, while Churches in Canada have already started branches of the Church of England Workingmen's Society. He reports that the bishops have been most cordial in their expressions of approval. Mr. Powell has received several offers to return to America. The organizers of the New York Mission in Advent next gave him a very cordial reception, and his farewell address was given under their auspices at the Church of the Holy Communion.

PETITION AGAINST THE NEW TESTAMENT REVISION.—The following petition was presented and received by the Upper House of the Convocation of Canterbury from a number of the clergy of the Diocese of Hereford:

"Whereas in the Provincial Synod of Canterbury a committee was appointed to revise the Authorized Version of the New Testament, and the said committee co-opted other persons as assistants in the work;

"And whereas the revisers so constituted have, without any discrimination whatsoever, translated the following five severely distinct Greek words (see notes), viz., (1) ναός, (2) τιβύρις, (3) καθημέριος, (4) ερασιγνώμων, and (5) ἀποστρέφω into the one single English word 'appoint';

"And whereas the aforesaid English word 'appoint' is the word in modern times recognized among a large section of Nonconformists (6) as signifying nomination and designation to the place and office of a preacher, but is a word at no time recognized by any one as signifying admission to Holy Orders in the Church;

"And whereas the revisers in translating several other passages, and notably Acts xiv. 23, have, against the authority of Wiclif's, Tyndale's, Cramers, the Geneva, and Rheims Version, substituted the above-mentioned word 'appoint' for the word 'ordain' (7), as now appearing in the Authorized Version;

"And whereas the revisers in translating Acts xv. 23 against the authority of scholars both ancient and modern (8), and also against the recorded dissent of the American Company (9), have 'excluded' (10) 'presbyters' from the superscription of the Encyclical Letter of the Council of Jerusalem, and have substituted 'elder brethren' in their place—this new translation ill according with Acts xv. 2 and 6 and Acts xvi. 4, and being diametrically contradictory to the revisers' own rendering of Acts xi. 18 and 23;

"And whereas the revisers by newly placing in the margin at Acts xx. 17 'presbyters' for 'elders,' and then by newly introducing into the Text at Acts xx. 28 'bishops' for 'overseers,' have tended to confuse two distinct orders of the Christian ministry;

"And whereas the revisers in reviewing I. Tim. iii. have newly and needlessly introduced into the margin the word 'overseer' as an alternative for the word 'bishop';

"Now seeing—

"1. That presbyters are thus divested of apostolical ordination;

"2. That 'presbyters' are thus excluded from one of their proper functions, and that 'elder brethren'—i. e., lay elders—are substituted in their place;

"3. That two orders of the Christian ministry are thus confused; and

"4. That 'overseer' is thus newly and needlessly introduced as an alternative for 'bishop';

"We, the undersigned, pray your right reverend House never to concede your sanction to the above-mentioned translations of Acts xiv. 23, and of Acts xv. 23, nor to the method of dealing with Acts xv. 17 and 28, nor to the marginal addition to I. Timothy iii. 1."

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC PRELATES AND EDUCATION.—The Roman Catholic prelates have unanimously adopted a series of resolutions directed against the Queen's colleges, and demanding further endowments for the educational institutions which they themselves control, or desire to control.

FRANCE.

PERE HYACINTHE AND THE PANTHEON.—On Thursday, July 26, Pere Hyacinthe delivered an address on the secularization of the Pantheon at the Winter Circus, Paris. He was heard with respectful attention as long as he confined himself to describing the Pantheon as a patriotic temple, but he excited a storm when he protested against the antagonism which it was sought to create between the spirit of revolution and the spirit of religion, and it grew into a tempest when he denounced as unwise, unpatriotic, and unphilosophical the proposal to tear down the cross from the building which sheltered the remains of St. Genevieve, the patron saint of Paris, and of Victor Hugo. He protested against the notion that the great national uprising of 1789 was irreligious. This caused considerable uproar, which increased tenfold when, continuing his address, he asked, "Must the cross be retained on the summit of the Pantheon?" For full ten minutes there was a scene of wild confusion and cries of "Out" and "No." After the audience had shouted themselves hoarse, he was able to continue:

"Even if the cross had ceased to have a religious signification, if even it were but the emblem of a thing that was utterly past and gone, it would be needful to proceed to long and exhaustive deliberation before doing away with it. The early Christians showed greater toleration than modern Republicans. In the foundations of Notre Dame an altar of the days of Tiberias had been discovered. The altar of Christ had not destroyed the altar of Paganism, but had been raised above it, and the maxim of the early Christians was 'Dis ne insulies!' Do not, therefore, suppress the past; only barbarians such as Attila—"

Here there arose a tremendous tumult. Amid the din Father Hyacinthe was heard to say, "You cannot place another emblem above the cross." (A Voice—"Why not a weathercock?") Father Hyacinthe—"You see you have no other emblem." (Another Voice—"And the national flag.") M. Loyson continued:

"Yes, I love and reverence the national flag, but it is only the emblem of our country, whereas the cross is the sacred symbol of the common Fatherland of all mankind. Do what you will, however, you cannot prevent the Pantheon being beautified with the cross. You may tear it down from the roof, but it is embodied in its very structure, which is in the form of a Greek cross."

After fresh uproar, mingled with applause, he proceeded, amid constant interruption:

"Revolutionary fanaticism is but Ultramontanism reversed. Even before the clergy had raised its voice to protest, they shouted to the priests, 'Away with the cross, or we shall tear it down.' (Shouts of 'Yes! yes! down with the cross!') I know that too often the cross has sheltered intolerance and superstition. It had been lighted up by the lurid glare of autos da fe—(cry of 'And the St. Bartholomew!'). Yes, I know all that, but precisely because the cross has been profaned let us uphold it in our more faithful hands, and not surrender it to those who profaned it. (Cheers.) Do not forget the tears it has dried, the devotion it has inspired. (Ironical laughter.) If you do not believe me, hear your great poet, Victor Hugo. To touch the cross would be the act of criminals and madmen. (Fresh uproar.) But it will survive and defy all attempts to overthrow it. (Shouts, 'We shall see!')

The close of the address was greeted with applause mingled with hooting. M. Loyson once more rushed into the tribune, and exclaimed, "La croix, je vous le dis, c'est la liberte."

MASSACHUSETTS.

PARRISH MISSIONARY MEETINGS.—Gladly recognizing the awakened interest in the missionary work everywhere manifest in the diocese, and unwilling, as we enter upon this new century of life, to content itself with doing only what it has in the past, the board took action at its annual meeting looking to the still further arousal of the zeal and interest of the people. To this end, and at the suggestion of the bishop, it voted the appointment of a committee of five, to be called a Committee on Missionary Meetings. Upon a plan similar to one already successfully tried within the limits of the Southern Convention, the purpose is to hold missionary meetings throughout the length and breadth of the diocese, visiting not only the large centres, but the smaller and more feeble parishes and missions. It is believed that wider knowledge of the work and aims of the board is what is chiefly needed to stimulate the interest and earnest cooperation of the people, and that by this means such knowledge can be most effectively given. Meetings will be arranged and speakers provided. The committee will not only gladly welcome, but earnestly solicit the cooperation of the convocations in their several districts, and of the rectors and missionaries, in this effort to more faithfully discharge the great and increasing responsibilities of the board.—The Diocesan.

GREAT BARRINGTON.—St. James's Church.—Great improvements have been made recently in this beautiful church, (the Rev. H. A. Adams, rector,) including a complete rearrangement of the chancel, which has been very much enlarged and raised two steps higher. Among the things presented may be mentioned a handsome altar and credence, together with a cross, altar-desk, and prayer-desk of brass; an altar-rail, eagle lectern, and alms-basin, also of brass; a litany-desk and prayer-book of walnut, and two hymn tablets and service books. The entire church has been carpeted anew, and presents an exceedingly churchly appearance. On the morning of St. James's Day the new furniture was solemnly blessed, and immediately afterwards the Holy Eucharist was celebrated, the Rev. Chas. Morrill being celebrant, assisted by the Rev. J. S. Ellis. There is now no debt resting upon the parish, and the congregations have increased to an unprecedented size.

RHODE ISLAND.

CROMPTON.—St. Philip's Church.—The vestry of this parish have issued the following circular:

"To the Friends of St. Philip's church:
"It is somewhat less than two years ago that the Rev. George S. Pine came to the people of this parish and cast his lot with ours, to share with us in our sorrows, and in the hour of sickness and death to offer such spiritual comfort and consolation as is most meet and becomes the office of pastor of this parish, which position he has so acceptably, ably, and so honorably filled during his short sojourn with us. Through his untiring energy and zealous devotion to the promotion of the best interests of the charge entrusted to his care, the parish debt, with which we were burdened at the commencement of his pastorate, amounting to $871, has been reduced to $171 at its close. Ever found ready in his ministrations to the sick, kind and courteous toward all, he has made hosts of friends, and won the respect of all. In these few short months he has been called to mourn at the bedside of a most dear and honored mother, as she passed "through the valley of the shadow of death" to the bright world beyond. How our hearts' deepest sympathies went out to him in those sad and lonely hours, or how the strong chords of our best love have entwined our inmost souls with his, our feeble words would fail to express. That mother now sleeps beside the little church she loved so well. As duty calls him to labor in other fields than this, it is with painful regrets that we are forced to accept the resignation which is to sever the official relations of the pleasant past; yet we indulge in the hope that in whatever part of the vineyard he may be called to work, although absent from us, we may not be forgotten, and that the God of our fathers may ever be with him, to guide and prosper him to his life's end."

CONNECTICUT.

MIDDLETOWN.—Commemorative Service.—In accordance with the request of the late diocesan convention, a service, commemorative of the first ordination administered by Bishop Seabury, will be held in the Church of the Holy Trinity, Middletown, on Monday, August 3d, at 11 A. M. It is hoped that there will be a good attendance of clergy, and that all will bring their surplices.

ALBANY.

TICONDEROGA.—Convocation.—The Convocation of Troy held its midsummer meeting in the Church of the Cross, Ticonderoga (the Rev. J. E. Bold, rector,) on Tuesday and Wednesday, July 14th and 15th. A spirited missionary service was held on Tuesday evening, when addresses were made by the Rev. C. Pelletreau on "Faith in Church Work," the Rev. F. H. T. Horsfield on "How shall we best promote Church Life?" and the Rev. Dr. W. T. Gibson on "The Law of Growth in Missionary Enterprise."

On Wednesday Morning Prayer was said at 9 A. M. by the Rev. Messrs R. G. Hamilton and C. T. Whittemore. At a later hour there was a celebration of the Holy Eucharist, the Rev. Dr. Joseph Carey, Archdeacon of the Convocation, being celebrant, and the sermon being preached by the Rev. C. T. Whittemore.

The business meeting was held at 2:30 P. M., fifteen clergy being present. The Rev. Dr. W. T. Gibson and the Rev. Messrs. Olin Hallock and I. McElroy, visitors, were invited to seats.

The treasurer's report showed a balance on hand of $45.00. Missionary reports were made by the Rev. C. P. Wilson, in charge of Luzerne and Conklingville, and by the Rev. W. H. Cook, in charge of East Line and Jonesville. An interesting paper on "Iona and St. Columba" was read by the Rev. James Caird, and the Rev. H. Macbeth read a paper on the recent publication, "Reassuring Hints." The publication of both papers was requested by the Convocation.

A second missionary meeting was held in the evening, when addresses were made by the Rev. Messrs. G. L. Neide, R. Shreve and Olin Hallock.

NEW YORK.

NEW YORK.—St. Philip's Church.—The funeral of the Rev. John Peterson, an assistant-minister in this church, in Mulberry street, took place on Sunday, July 19th, a very large congregation attending. The assistant-bishop, the Missionary Bishop of Cape Palmas and the Rev. Peter Morgan took part in the services, the former making an address. The celebration of the Holy Communion followed.

Mr. Peterson was eighty-one years of age, and for more than forty years, he had been connected with St. Philip's as teacher in the Sunday-school, assistant-minister, etc.

NEW YORK—Grace Church.—A fare well service for the departure of Bishop Ferguson for Cape Palmas, and of Professor and Mrs. J. McD. Gardiner for Japan, was held in the sanctuary of this church (the Rev. Dr. W. R. Huntington, rector) on Thursday, July 23d, a large congregation attending. Of the clergy robed and sitting in the chancel, there were the Rev. Messrs. Joshua Kimber, L. M. Dorman and Peter A. Morgan. Mr. Kimber began the service, reading some special prayers, and Mr. Morgan reading the lesson.

In making a short and appropriate address, Mr. Kimber alluded to the fact that the bishop might well be called a native of Africa, having well-nigh spent his entire life in that country, laboring among his people. He spoke of the excellent work he had done for nearly fifty years as teacher, and in the capacity of deacon, priest, etc. Last of all, at a meeting held in Grace church he had been elected to the office of bishop, as most worthy to superintend the work at Cape Palmas, and a fit successor to the three bishops who had preceded him. When Bishop Auer died, he who exclaimed "alas! for Africa," was destined in the Providence of God to take up the work and carry it forward under a native ministry. He would depart for his field of labor, having our earnest prayers, our sympathies, and as far as possible our support.

Referring to Professor and Mrs. Gardiner and their departure for Asia, he spoke of the excellent work they had done at Tokio, Japan, in building up St. Paul's and St. Margaret's schools. The former had become well-nigh self-supporting. He also spoke of Mr. Gardiner's most commendable work as an architect. He had himself planned the buildings in which the above schools were held, St. Paul's school building combining also Trinity Divinity school. These buildings would do credit to the streets of New York, and the speaker might have added, to the best among its streets. It had been said on high authority that if Mr. Gardiner had done nothing more than plan these buildings, his going to Japan would have been abundantly worth while. The speaker concluded by saying that Professor Gardiner, as also his wife, would be followed by the prayers and sympathies of our people.

Bishop Ferguson sailed the same day in the Adriatic, expecting to reach Cape Palmas on the 27th of August. He would stay a week in London, till the vessel taking him to his field of labor sailed for Africa. In taking up his work he was specially anxious to extend it further back from the coast. Though his jurisdiction had a reach of four or five hundred miles along the coast, it extended little more than five miles inland. He proposed to start new stations, having the money in hand, and hoped to push back seventy-five miles or so in the interior. Some of those stations were to be planted along the Cavalla River.

In the absence of the assistant-bishop it was hoped the Rev. Dr. John C. Eccleston, rector of St. John's, Clifton, Staten Island, would make the address. Bishop Ferguson had preached in St. John's, and shortly after Dr. Eccleston wrote a letter saying, "there was only one feeling, viz., that the preacher was a thoroughly earnest, godly man, peculiarly fitted for the difficult work to which he had been called. The novelty of his manner, joined with his effective style and natural eloquence, quite won the hearts of all who heard him." Dr. Eccleston considered it a pity that Bishop Ferguson could not remain six months after his consecration to canvass the churches, and answered for it that there would be large results.

LONG ISLAND.

GREENPOINT—Church of the Ascension.—In addition to the statements given in last week's issue, the following facts concerning the building now being erected by this church may be due to the rector and congregation who have entered upon such a praiseworthy undertaking. The height of the building to the roof will be 60 feet, while that of the square tower on the northwest corner will be 80 feet.

On the first floor the hall, with ample stage and gallery, will have a seating capacity of 500. Dimensions, 70x37; height of ceiling, 26 feet. On the second floor is a guild room, 32x16, and 14 feet in height, the room leading on to the gallery, and fronting on Java street. On the third floor is a gymnasium, 50x25, as also a large and a small ante-room. The finishing will be simple, and will cost from $3,000 to $4,000. The outside work will cost $8,500. This money is nearly all in hand, and is the hard earnings of the congregation, mechanics and such like, of the church.

FARMINGDALE—St. Anna's Cottage.—This cottage was opened four years ago by the Sisters of St. John Baptist to provide a country holiday for the German mothers and little children connected with the Mission of the Holy Cross. Only those who know something of the tenement house districts can appreciate the suffering which the heat of summer brings to the crowded population in the vicinity of the mission. In some degree, however, one may realize it by passing through Avenue C and the adjoining streets on any day in July and August. He will see all the inhabitants in the street, apparently, even to the youngest baby—men, women and children looking faint and exhausted, and the very boys languid with the stifling air. The benefit and pleasure which the brief holiday of a week afforded, proved even more than was expected. Consequently the work has been so extended as now to provide rest and fresh air not only for the mothers and little children, but for the older girls whose life is passed in the close confinement of factories and tailor's shops. The cottage is managed in a very simple way, and as almost all who come are personally known to those in charge, there is a homelike atmosphere which adds to the enjoyment of the visitors, who feel the brightening effect of friendly interest in their duties and care. It would be hard to say which get more pleasure out of their visit. The women, girls and little ones each in their own way enjoy the fresh air and country life.

Sometimes it is the first time a woman has been out of town for many years—perhaps never since she left Germany. In such cases tender memories are awakened by the sight of trees and fields, and their pleasure is expressed with simple eloquence. In many the sight of nature awakens thoughts of better things. "God seems so much nearer in the country," one woman remarked; "everything makes one think of Him, and in the city we seem forgotten." The children's ignorance of the commonest country sights is sometimes very amusing. Animals, of course, are a never ending delight, and a fine pig was an object of contemplation from which one little girl could hardly tear herself.

Their pleasure in flowers is very great. Great bunches of dried flowers always accompany the girls back to town with which to decorate the house. The Sunday evening is usually spent in gathering bouquets of the many wild flowers to be found on Long Island. The Sunday evenings are perhaps a little penance, since except in cases of illness or some special circumstance they are the limit of the visit, though the visitors console themselves sometimes with the unselfish thought that "some one else will enjoy the next week."

A report of the work at St. Anna's pictures the routine of the week, which does not seem to grow wearisome, although there is necessarily little variety in it. Each party arrives on Monday evening, returning to town the following Monday morning. During the day the cottage is carefully cleaned and got ready for its forty new occupants, who are brought from the depot in a large wagon. The arrival is an amusing sight, the children's excitement being most demonstrative as each strange country sight meets their eyes, or as when in case they have been before they greet any remembered spot with exclamations of delight.

As soon as tea is over, the newcomers are settled into their dormitories. The next morning the routine begins. The meals are ordered with scrupulous punctuality, and there is a regular order as to hours, a thing necessary for comfort where there is a large household. As much freedom as possible, however, is allowed, and no household work of any kind is required. These comers from the city are visitors, and the object of the Sisters is to provide as much rest and amusement as is possible for them all. In the morning the women sit about on the piazza or in the shady sitting-room, while the little ones play outside. The girls amuse themselves with the swing or croquet, or roam about the scrub oaks which form the "shrubbery" of the grounds. In the afternoons long walks to gather wild flowers or berries are delighted in by the more active, while others stay at home or pay visits to some of the neighboring farm houses where acquaintances have sprung up. On certain days of the week long drives are taken, which are the crowning delight to all, from the oldest woman to the youngest out of babyhood. Now and then a dip in the sea is combined with the drive, to the children's great enjoyment. In the evening after tea friendly chats and singing fill up the time before the short evening prayers, which conclude the day.

On Sundays there are always services in St. Helena's chapel, the chapel of the Sisters' cottage, the walk to which is only a few moments. The clergy of the Holy Cross Mission usually minister in the chapel, and the boys from St. Andrew's Cottage, which provides weekly parties of boys from the mission with a holiday, and trains some older ones in farming, also form part of the congregation, which is farther reinforced by some of the neighbors, so that the services are very bright and hearty ones.

This year before the season when it was possible for the women to leave the city, the cottage was opened for a few weeks, and between thirty and forty young girls came down for a longer stay than is possible later in the season, and received a little training in household work under the Sisters. It was a time apparently of unshared delight to them, the cooking, etc., seeming to be as entertaining as the walks and drives. Many were the wishes of these little city children that they could always stay in the country. It is not only their physical health that is benefited by the country life, but it is found that leading an orderly life away from the wretched surroundings of their ordinary life tells much on the moral tone of the children. The women also return to their home duties with spirits as well as bodies refreshed by even this short cessation from the daily toil and fret of life.

Each year proves more plainly the need of such country homes for every section of those who are "tollers of the city," and one feels that it only requires the knowledge of the need to make those whom God has blessed with wealth ready to give to all such work a helping hand.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

THE REGISTRATION CANON.—The bishop has received inquiries as to the operation of this canon, which some have conceived to be something like that of suspension, in the case of parties failing to make their Easter Communion without reasonable cause or hindrance.

This is not the nature of the canon, the object of which is not to suspend, but the reverse; it is to keep communicants from self-suspension.

But, in form, it is merely a canon of registration. The minister is bound to report his communicants; not those who may be communicated, but who actually are so, at least once during the year. And he is called upon not to report any as communicants who do not value their privileges enough to come to the holy table, nor even to give a reasonable excuse for their neglect.

If any communicant wishes to be registered, he has only to appear at the altar and it is done.

This canon has already been productive of great benefit. It has awakened many consciences, and it has led to the reform of parish registers which for a long time have exhibited a practical falsehood, and so have led to the most untrustworthy returns. In the aggregate the statistics of the church and diocese are very unfaithfully represented.—Kalendar.

NEW JERSEY.

ELIZABETH—St. John's Church.—On the evening of Tuesday, July 21st, the vestry of this church received the resignation of the rector, the Rev. Dr. W. S. Langford, to take effect September 1st. Dr. Langford resigns to accept the office of General Secretary of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, to which he was unanimously elected by the Board of Managers. No official action on the resignation was taken for the present.

MARYLAND.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—St. John's Church.—On Thursday, July 23d, the rector of this church (the Rev. Dr. W. A. Leonard) publicly accepted at the daily Evening Prayer a beautifully-wrought brass font-ewer. It is the gift of the Rev. and Mrs. F. B. Reazor, in memory of their child, Theodore Lowber, who was baptized one year ago at this font, and whose pure spirit is now in the Land of Eternal Light. The ewer is one of Giesler's designs, and is graceful and massive.

Last week the vestry purchased a valuable lot of land south of St. Mary's church and hall for $3,250. Of this sum $2,000 was the gift of a faithful parishioner and his wife. The Rev. C. J. Curtis is the assistant in charge, and a fine work among the colored people is being pushed forward by him and his earnest helpers. An industrial day, and Sunday-schools are crowded with eager pupils, while the mothers' meetings are in flourishing and active operation. A new church and other buildings are in contemplation.

The orphanage of the parish has received a legacy of $900. The children, fifty-four in number, are now enjoying a country home on the hills overlooking the city, which has been rented for them by the generous gift of Mrs. Capt. G. V. Fox.

Through the energy of the Rev. F. B. Reazor money has been secured to finish a substantial brick tower to St. John's chapel, and the work is now going on. A year ago he raised nearly $1,000, and placed a fine pipe organ in this chapel, whose people are under his faithful pastoral care. Great credit is due him for his successful labors in this portion of this venerable parish.

CLERICAL CHANGES.—During the convention year last past, thirteen clergy were transferred by letters dimissory to other dioceses, and five were received. During the convention year there were seven ordained. Seven Maryland clergymen have died.

THE BISHOP'S PENNY.—This the bishop asks from each child in each Sunday-school, once a month, toward the missionary work of the diocese, to be sent punctually in March, June, September and December, to the Treasurer of the Diocesan Committee of Missions, in order that Maryland be no longer humiliated by asking and receiving aid from the Board of Missions. The Rev. Dr. Griswold reports, "Bishop's Penny regularly brought on Bishop's Sunday."

PRINCE GEORGE'S PARISH—Christ Church, Rockville.—This parish (the Rev. R. T. Brown, rector.) has expended $6,900 in rebuilding the church at Rockville, its total offerings for the year being $7,148, nearly all of which was expended for parish needs. It has a chapel of the value of $1,500, parsonage and glebe, $2,000, and rejoices in two endowments, $1,000, 93 communicants, some 50 families, and sittings for 350 persons.

This parish is situate in Montgomery county, and still bears the name of the older county of which it was originally the parish.

FLORIDA.

GAINESVILLE—Holy Trinity Church.—The rectory is rising rapidly, will probably be under roof by the time these words are in print. The Rev. Gouverneur Cruzer, of New York, officiated on the Fourth Sunday in Trinity. On the same day the rector held first Sunday services in Arredonda, or rather at Z. T. Taylor's, two miles beyond. Services had been held here on week-day evenings with fair success, but the Sunday afternoon service gathered a large and interested congregation, among them twelve communicants. Steps will be taken to secure ground for a church here, in the hope that with a little outside aid it may be erected during the coming winter. With a church building and a fair prospect of regular services, say once a month, a congregation of from forty to sixty adults, with fifteen to twenty communicants, would at once be gathered.—Church and Home.

MISSISSIPPI.

VICKSBURG—Convocation.—The fourth regular meeting of the Natchez Convocation was held in Holy Trinity church, Vicksburg, (the Right Rev. W. F. Adams, rector.) on Tuesday, July 7th, and the two following days. There were present the assistant-bishop, and Bishop Adams, the Rev. Dr. H. Sansom, and the Rev. Messrs. Alex. Marks, E. C. Langhlin, Nelson Ayres, N. Logan, and W. W. De Hart, and Judge Farrar of Vicksburg.

The session opened with the Litany and the celebration of the Holy Communion by the assistant-bishop, who also preached. Immediately after service the convocation met for the transaction of business in the vestry room of the church. The Dean (the Rev. A. Marks) reported that the committee appointed at the last meeting had agreed upon a programme for the present meeting, but he had thought best upon the advice of the assistant-bishop to somewhat modify the plan, and that the order of services would be announced from day to day. It was also agreed that services should be held in St. Mary's chapel by the clerical members of the convocation and the other clergymen present. Woodville was selected as the place for holding the next (the fall) meeting of the convocation, the precise time being left to the dean to determine. On motion it was resolved that a series of essays be prepared for the next meeting, and the dean, Bishop Adams, and the Rev. Nelson Ayres were named as essayists. After a lengthy and earnest discussion regarding the work of the convocation, the meeting adjourned until next day, after Morning Service. At 6 p. m. the bishop delivered his first concio ad clerum. The convocation assembled for Evening Prayer at Holy Trinity church at 8 p. m., when a sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Ayres.

The second day's session was opened with Morning Prayer, and a sermon by the Rev. W. W. De Hart. At the business meeting following it was resolved that the dean correspond with the Rev. J. W. Turner, with reference to the next convocation, with authority to change the next place of meeting should it become necessary to do so. "It was also resolved that the treasurer be authorized to pay the expenses incurred by the Rev. Mr. De Hart in attending this meeting. Nothing further being proposed, the business sessions were declared adjourned to the next meeting in course. At 6 p. m. the bishop again met the clergy for council. Evening Prayer was said in Holy Trinity church, and a sermon preached by the Rev. W. W. De Hart on Judges xvi. 30.

The convocation assembled for divine service in Holy Trinity church at 10:30 a. m., when an address was delivered by the Rev. Newell Logan on "Woman's Work in the Church."

At Evening Prayer the final sermon of the series was delivered by the Rev. E. C. Langhlin, on the "Layman's Example." And after an address by the dean upon the object and scope of the convocational system, the convocation adjourned.

TERRY—Convocation.—The first annual meeting of the Jackson Convocation was held in the Church of the Good Shepherd, Terry, (the Rev. U. B. Bowden, rector.) on Wednesday, June 24th. There were present the assistant-bishop and the rector, the Rev. Dr. G. C. Harris, and the Rev. Messrs. J. E. Martin, W. Short, and W. W. De Hart. The assistant-bishop celebrated the Holy Communion and preached.

Grace church, Canton, was selected as the place of meeting on the Tuesday after the second Sunday in October.

The Rev. William Short read an essay on "The Ministry of Reconciliation," which was followed by a general discussion.

In the evening there was an Evening Service, at which the Rev. Dr. G. C. Harris preached from Judges xvi. 15-20.

On Thursday morning, at 9 a. m., an essay on "Preaching" was read by the Rev. J. E. Martin.

COLORADO WORK IN THE DIOCESE.—The air is full of work and progress. One of the best parishes in the diocese has thrown its doors open, with unanimous agreement, to a special service each Sunday for the colored people.

St. Mary's, Vicksburg, is every way successful, but furniture, etc., is still wanted, and at least $300 to carry the missionary through.

KENTUCKY.

VERMILION—St. John's Church.—This church was consecrated to the service of Almighty God on Thursday, May 29, at 11 a. m. There were present the Rt. Rev. T. U. Dudley, the Rev. Messrs. Perkins, Venable, Penick, Sneed, Grubb, and the rector. The bishop preached a fine discourse appropriate to the occasion. The church building is 36x73 feet. The nave is 36x60 feet and the recess chancel is 12x18 feet. The organ chamber is to the right of the chancel and the vestry to the left. The building is of brick, and has a seating capacity of 300. The ceiling is of yellow pine, arched with heavy timbers. The cost of the church complete was between $7,500 and $8,000. The rector of this parish baptized a young man by immersion on Wednesday, May 27. The Rev. E. A. Penick preached two effective sermons May 29 and 27 at night.—Kentucky Church Chronicle.

ARLAND—Mission Service.—The Rev. Messrs. Penick and McCready visited this place on Trinity Sunday. Services were held in the Northern Methodist Church, which had been kindly loaned. Services were held twice on Sunday, and Monday and Tuesday nights. The attendance at all of the services was fine. A volunteer choir, a portion of which were Church people, rendered the chants very well indeed. At least 35 persons, most of whom are communicants, were found here; and there are seven persons now to be confirmed. The dean baptized one adult and one infant.

The writer has never seen so much intelligent interest manifested in Church work as here. The town claims 5,000 inhabitants. It is on the Ohio river, near the West Virginia line and about 225 miles east of Louisville. It has four railroads, two large iron furnaces and one large furniture factory.

Eastern Kentucky is as yet almost unknown and undeveloped. The Church has opportunities here that she has in no other portion of the State. If Churchmen are grateful for their manifold blessings, they will show forth their gratitude by their good works.

The town was laid out about twenty-five years ago by a party of capitalists. There is a regularity and beauty about the streets and an air of refinement and elegance about the people and their residences. The town is the liveliest in Kentucky for its size. Indeed, one has no conception of the activity of the people and the importance of the place without a visit there. Arrangements were made for monthly services, and $400 was raised toward the erection of a church building. The Churchmen of this diocese will be solicited for aid toward the erection of this church. It will be a good investment. There is a distance of ninety miles between this point and Mt. Sterling, where no services of our Church are held. Let us be alive to our duty and privileges and consecrate a portion of our means to this portion of our Master's work.—Kentucky Church Chronicle.

MISSOURI.

ST. LOUIS.—Prayer Book Revision.—The committee appointed at the recent convention to report on the proposed revision of the Prayer Book has put forth a circular to all the clergy of the diocese, in which they are requested to make a careful study of the subject and communicate their views to the chairman or to certain others of the committee. They request each clergyman to send to New York for a copy of "The Book Annexed" and the "Notification to the Dioceses," that he will associate with himself any qualified layman in his cure, and that he make his recommendations under the four heads: (1) to be accepted, (2) to be rejected, (3) to be modified, and (4) to remain as in the present standard, stating his reasons as tersely as possible. The committee, however, does not surrender the right of determining, finally, the character of their report.

LOUISIANA.

NEW ORLEANS.—Christ Church.—The original church building for this parish (the Rev. A. I. Drysdale, rector,) was erected on the corner of Canal and Bourbon streets, and was a frame octagonal building. It was the first non-Roman place of worship erected in New Orleans, and was completed April 7th, 1816, at a cost of about $8,000. In 1835 this building was torn down, and a much more imposing one erected on the same site, costing $40,000.

The congregation moved in 1847, and the church building was sold, and now forms part of Toussaint synagogue, the property having been purchased by Mr. Judah Toussaint. In 1847 a new church was built, costing $50,000, and the congregation have worshipped there until recently, when it was found necessary, owing to the removal of the resident portion of the city, again to change the location of the church.

A spacious site has consequently been purchased on the corner of St. Charles avenue and Sixth street, and it is proposed to erect a church there which will be one of the handsomest in the southern part of the country. Designs were called for from this city, and also from elsewhere, and after careful and critical examination, a design presented by Mr. Lawrence B. Valk was adopted.

The style of architecture of the design is pure English gothic, with transepts, cloisters, etc. It will be abundantly supplied with large mullioned stained glass windows, broad arched entrances, heavy buttressed walls, and English bell-towers.

The front on St. Charles avenue occupies nearly the entire ground, with handsome entrances through porches and tower, the latter forming the corner of the building, and reaching a height of one hundred and twenty-five feet. This will be square from base to turret, and it is to be handsomely decorated with large windows of different patterns. The bell will be hung in the upper division of the tower.

The front on Sixth street will present an elongation of architectural lines, gracefully broken by a broad transept. Another broad and imposing entrance here will lead to the sacristy. Adjoining this is the entrance to the church, and, separated by an alley, the rectory will be in the rear.

The church will be built of rough "ashlar" or quarry-faced limestone. There will be no fence, but a low coping of granite and a border of green grass will separate the church from the sidewalk.

The interior is to be finished in oiled light woods. The ceiling will be open gothic, timbered. The chancel will be spacious, and will be easily seen from nearly every seat. There will be no galleries. To the left of the chancel will be the sacristy, which will be amply provided with all furniture, etc. On the right of the chancel, and extending about one-third the length of the church, is to be a chapel and Sunday-school building, approached by a handsome cloister from St. Charles avenue.

The body of the church will be so arranged as to suit all classes of pew-holders. Some of the pews will be arranged for families, some will contain seats for two persons, while there will be several single-seated pews. The seating capacity will be about one thousand. The church will be illuminated by gas jets, so placed as to be invisible, but at the same time to give abundance of light.

Work will be begun as soon as building specifications are received from the architect and the contract signed. It is thought that it will be a year before the church is ready for occupancy. In the meantime the congregation will worship in Calvary church.

The rector has, at the request of the congregation, taken a summer vacation for the recovery of his health.

PARAGRAPHIC.

COCOAINE, which has been used so freely in the case of General Grant as an anæsthetic, is a fluid not unlike glycerine.

It is estimated that the California gold mines have added $1,200,000,000 to the gold supply of the world, and there is not yet enough to go round.

The expenditures of Christ Church Hospital, Jersey City, last year were $5,010.42, and there were 8,877 patients treated. It is doing good work for humanity and the Church.

The number of visitors at the late exhibition in New Orleans was 1,158,840, as against 9,910,966 at the Centennial Exhibition in Philadelphia, which was open but little longer.

FRENCH grocers have been convicted and fined for using coloring matter with tomatoes to make them a deeper red. We have the Statue of Liberty, and a little French justice would not come amiss.

EPISCOPAL service was held in Boston as early as 1686, Governor Andrews making use for that purpose the now meeting-house when not otherwise occupied. This gave offence, and a church was soon built.

ONE of the singular changes by the Old Testament revisors is of the words in Solomon's song, "desire shall fail," into "the caperberry shall fail." Learning may require the change, but it none the less turns poetry into prose.

THE Rev. Frank L. Norton, D.D., Dean of the Albany Cathedral, inherits, with the exception of a few legacies, the estate of Mrs. Sarah R. Farmer, a parishioner recently deceased. It will doubtless be devoted to pious uses.

THE Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh, Pa., set forth its mercantile, manufacturing, and mining interests in a volume of 160 pages, full of important facts, and it has come to a second edition. It is well worthy of study and preservation.

Few schools make a better showing than does the Pennsylvania Military Academy, whose announcement for the ensuing year we have before us. It gives views of the institution and of some of its interiors, and with its course of study must commend itself to parents. It is located at Chester, Delaware Co.

TRAMPS applying to the Wayfarer's Lodge in Boston are treated to a bath and shampoo, their clothes are thoroughly fumigated and they are required to do a turn of work. The effect has been happy in reducing the number of applications very much. The genuine tramp hates both water and work.

FROM the Year Book of St. Paul's church, New Haven, the Rev. E. S. Lines, rector, we learn that the baptisms of the year were 68, the confirmations 31, communicants 600, Sunday-school scholars 440, and the offerings $13,018.94. The book gives an account of the various parochial organizations, which show a vigorous life.

IT appears by the sixty-fourth annual report of the Mercantile Library Association that its income last year was $27,805.61; there are in library 207,123 volumes, and the circulation was 138,509, showing an increase of more than 7,000 over the preceding year. It makes just complaints of the vandalism that mutilates and defaces the books of the library.

A RELIGIOUS society at Ionia, Michigan, has disbanded, and its assets will be divided among other societies still remaining. It saw there was no need or place for it, that without it there were more societies than there was a call for or than could be supported. It was a good example, and might be followed up to advantage in many other towns both east and west.

THERE are $485,000,000 lying in the Chancery Exchequer of England, waiting for claimants, and it increases by $5,000,000 every year. Many duped Americans, through agents who are knaves, make applications for portions of it year by year, as they do for the estate of Anneke Jans, in this country, but they would find it far more profitable to maul rails.

THE Free and Open Church Association, in its tenth annual report, states that of 3,035 churches in the different dioceses, 2,106 are free. There has been a gain in six years of more than fifty per cent. The work would seem to be prospering much in the same way in England, and especially in the dioceses of Chester and Liverpool, where a monthly paper, devoted to the subject, is published.

COLLEGIATE AND ACADEMIC.

HOLDENESS SCHOOL FOR BOYS, PLYMOUTH, N. H.—The sixth year of the Holdeness School for Boys closed on Wednesday, June 24th. Examinations were held on Tuesday and Wednesday, and prize speaking and the giving of prizes for the year's work took place on the evening of Wednesday. Prizes were awarded: For the highest average score in all studies to Walter C. Flanders, White River Junction, Vt.; for the second average standing to William T. Ladd, Lancaster, N. H.; for the best speaking on the evening of closing day, Charles I. Merrill, Roxbury, Mass.; for a special examination in algebra to Charles W. Alkins, Jr., of New York; for a special examination in Latin paradigms to W. C. Flanders. The school has passed through a highly prosperous year. The courses have been enlarged and improved, and very noteworthy improvement has been made in the chapel music under the charge of the choir-master, Mr. J. C. Flanders. There have been fifty-two resident scholars during the year, of whom forty are to be absent in September. Especial attention is to be given in future to fitting boys for schools of technology, to the study of English, and to a knowledge of French. The next school year begins September 30th.

THE De LANCY SCHOOL, GENEVA, N. Y.—The closing exercises of this admirable school may be said to have opened on Sunday last at the college chapel, where, by invitation, the school was assembled, and, after the services, addressed by the Rev. Dr. Moore, President of Hart. The course of instruction it is known, has always been endorsed by the President and Faculty of Hart College, but we think the first occasion on which even a semi-official endorsement has been made, and it must be beneficial in giving more extended knowledge from high authority of the educational experience of the lady principals and assistants as recognized by its patrons.

The academic exercises were held at the school rooms on Monday afternoon at 3 o'clock, and consisted, as usual, of recitations and readings by the young ladies, all reflecting credit on the school as well as the individuals concerned. It is not infrequently to mention those of Misses Dox and Bronson, who graduated; the others will be remembered in the future time and we deem it eminently proper to congratulate the teacher of French on the great success of the performance, and on the grace and purity of pronunciation, which was only excelled by modest self-possession.

The Right Rev. Bishop of Western New York, Doctor Cox, arrived in Geneva in the caboose of a special train just in time to attend the exercises. Never happier than when in the midst of the young, his remarks seemed to reflect the thoughts of those heard and to centre on the "Turning Point," the subject of the essay of one of the graduates. Graduates of the school, patrons and other invited guests most heartily join with the venerable bishop in his congratulations to the Misses Bridge and the young ladies of the De Lancy School. As we write these hurried lines "youth and beauty have met to chase the fleeting hours" under the same happy, hospitable roof.—Geneva Gazette.

In Bordenstown, N. J., Monday, July 27th, 1885, of heart disease, the Rev. NATHANIEL PETTIT, rector of Christ church, Bordenstown.

MR. WILLIAM MOORE. At a meeting of the vestry of St. Philip's church in the Highlands, held at the rectory on July 25th, 1885, the following resolution was ordered to be made in the minutes of the vestry, viz: The vestry of St. Philip's church in the Highlands do hereby resolve that the loss of their dear and beloved associate, MR. WILLIAM MOORE, who passed through death unto life on the 15th day of July, 1885, is mourned and sorely felt.

Sweet and lovely in his nature, and in his intercourse, but stern and inflexible in principle, Mr. Moore's was a life which a Christian may wish to have lived, and to which a Christian may point for an example. Firm in his religious convictions, free in the dissemination of his charities, of his affections, but free still in the breadth of his love, and of his philanthropy, he walked among us, a model of Christian life, and a true and devoted friend and benefactor. For many years a member, a vestryman, and a warden of this parish, his presence was counted for and his zealous devotion at the services of the Church inspired zeal and devotion in others.

Long retired from the active duties of the world, following his later years to his duties to his family, to his neighbors, and to his God. A life of eighty-seven years, well spent, is closed without a spot or blemish on its long career. Love and sorrow follow him in death, as they attended him in life.

The vestry place on his grave this testimony of their sincere and affectionate admiration of his character, and of their deep lament of their loss in his departure.

Resolved, That a copy of this entry unanimously ordered, be communicated by the rector and the vestry to the families of the deceased, and to his friends, and that it be also published in "The Churchman."

WALTER THOMPSON, Rector of St. Philip's church in the Highlands. H. W. BELCHER, Clerk of the Vestry.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.

In view of the recent appearance of the revised version of the Old Testament, we feel that a special interest will arise with reference to the history of the Bible. We have therefore secured Messrs. A. D. F. Randolph & Co.'s edition of Dr. Mombert's "Hand-Book of the English Versions of the Bible," published at $2.50, and offer it, with THE CHURCHMAN, at $5.00, or to subscribers now fully in advance at $1.50.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

"The book can be recommended to readers and students alike."—Literary World. "A clearer and more comprehensive collection of the copious materials on the history of the English Bible does not exist."—Good Literature.

This book will give new and deeper impressions of the value of the English Bible, for it will show how great a cost of time, labor, and learning the world owes to it."—The Churchman.

"A characteristic of this work is its mingling of the internal with the external history of the descent of our English versions—themes which Westcott, for example, keeps separate. The book, therefore, already crowded with the condensed facts of narration, is further crowded with examples illustrating the ancestry and relations of the several versions. . . . All this gives variety, and makes the whole more readable and more interesting as a continuity than if the two portions were separated—to leave a dead body and a departed spirit. Crowded as the volume is, it is readable throughout, and, in some of its sections, intensely interesting."—Sunday-school Times.

REVISED PRAYER BOOK.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN :

It is no reflection upon the very able and laborious committee who reported the Book Annexed, or upon the General Convention which adopted it, to suggest that it may have faults as well of omission as commission. In some respects they may have done too much, in other respects they may not have done enough. May I be permitted to offer one suggestion, which I have not seen anywhere presented, although I am told that it was before the committee. It concerns not the text, but the arrangement of the Prayer Book services. Those services include, on the one hand, the Daily Office of Morning and Evening Prayer, together with the Occasional Offices of Baptism, Confirmation, etc., and, on the other hand, the Liturgy proper, or Communion Office. The distinction between these was marked in the early Church, by having separate books for each, called, respectively, the Antiphony, the Lectionary, the Sacramentary—a distinction which was preserved in later and Roman times by the Breviary and Missal. In our Book of Common Prayer we have all these several and distinct offices bound together, and not only so, but we have them needlessly intermingled, the Daily Offices coming first, then the Collects, Epistles, and Gospels, followed by the Communion Office, then the Occasional Offices, then the Psalter for the Daily Office, finally the Ordinal.

This arrangement is unfortunate in these two respects: first, that it fails to present either the Daily Office or the Liturgy properly by itself, as a connected and completed whole; and secondly, that it causes to those who are not yet familiar with the Prayer Book needless and serious trouble and confusion in finding the places, and following in the order of the services. Thus, if a minister reads the Psalter for the day, one must turn from the beginning almost to the end of the book, and back again for the rest of the Daily Office; and in the Communion Office one must go back often a long way to find the Collect, Epistle, and Gospel for the day.

If, therefore, the commission to "enrich" may be understood to give authority also to simplify the Prayer Book, the following arrangement might be adopted, without the change of a single word either of text or rubric: Place the Psalter, preceded by the Proper Antiphons and the Table of Proper Psalms, directly after the Occasional Prayers and Thanksgivings; then place the Communion Office directly after the "Short Office of Prayer," if that be adopted, followed in their proper place by the Collects, Epistles, and Gospels, and the Occasional Offices last. This arrangement would present, first, the Daily Office, with Psalter, Litany, and Occasional Prayers, complete; next, the Liturgy proper, with Collects, etc. in their order; finally, the Occasional Offices by themselves; and would seem to be a decided gain of both instruction and convenience. THE POINTING OF THE PSALTER.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN :

The recent letters of Mr. Matthias and Mr. Durham on the above subject reveal a strange oversight of two things: first, that the pointing of the Psalter must ever remain largely a matter of taste; second, that the much-advanced beginning of a chant, improperly called an accented note, is an integral part of the chant form, and cannot, at will, be made one syllable or twenty syllables long. In the differences in pointing found by a slight comparison of various psalters and hymnals, good arguments can be brought forward often on both sides; the case is a chant, matter of taste, and we are forced back to the de gustibus, &c. The remarks about the first notes of the chant show strange ignorance of the chant form. The improperly so-called accented note or syllable is that on which the real time of the chant begins, the recitation proper lying wholly outside this. The chant does not begin here, but the cadence. The very name of the portion occupied by this first note is significant. It is the first measure of the chant, and on it some portion of the words must be held and measured. The quoted criticism of the Rev. C. L. Hutchins that it produces a "drawing effect," is no argument whatever against its use, for the truth of the matter lies simply here, that if a choir draw out the first note, it is most assuredly the fault of the choir-master and not of the chant. One of the reasons for such drawing, if it exist, is that few choirs are given distinctly to understand what this peculiar note really is, and therefore fail to obtain the true feeling of time indispensable to success. One thing is certain, that without the observance of this "rallying point" it is next to impossible to preserve the same degree of time in the articulation of the recitation and of the cadence. Much of the "draw" comes from the too rapid recitation and the too slow cadence. The criticism that the "accents" make a "lame, halting, indecisive rendering," is a singular one, especially when it is at the same time conceded that it is a point which all the voices may reach simultaneously. The canticle sung is not the canticle read, and never will be, and it is a forced and unnatural rule laid down for anyone, set to music that requires it to conform in an any way whatever to the ordinary rules of reading.

READING THE PSALTER WITH THE GLORIA.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN :

In the last number of the CHURCHMAN a correspondent from Florence, Alabama, asks a question concerning the reading of the Psalter when the Gloria Patri is used (as is very proper) after each Psalm. I would suggest in answer a usage which is I believe quite general. It is that in every instance the minister should read the first portion of the Gloria, the people responding with the second. This would naturally happen when a Psalm consists of an even number of verses. When the Psalm is of an uneven number the minister reads the last verse, and without pause continues "Gloria be to the Father," etc. That makes the rule that in every case the minister begins each Psalm and each Gloria.

HOW TO USE THE REVISION.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN :

I beg to be allowed to express hearty concurrence in the suggestion of your editorial as to the "Revisions." It is entirely practical. It lays on one side all vexed questions. It gives every one (should it be adopted) the needed opportunity for examining proposed alterations in detail. It enables the student to suggest the marginal readings as a commentary. I hail the suggestion as a most opportune relief. G. T. BEKKLI.

NEW BOOKS.

PRIMITIVE CONSECRATION OF THE EUCHARISTIC ELEMENT: with an EXTENSIVE APPENDIX for its Revival. By the Rev. Edmund S. Ffolkes, B. D., Vicar of St. Mary the Virgin, Oxford. [London: T. Fisher, New York: James Pott & Co.] 8vo., pp. 484. Price, $3.50.

In his article on the Eucharist in Smith's "Dictionary of Christian Biography, etc.," Mr. Ffolkes gave the outline of a part of the argument which he has elaborated in this book. He showed that, with scarce an apparent exception the teaching of the Church of the first eight centuries was that the consecration of the elements in the Eucharist was effected by the operation of the Holy Ghost, Who was invoked by the prayers of the faithful; and he used these weighty words: "As long as the Holy Ghost was invoked, and wherever He is invoked still to consecrate, there never was any confusion of terms or extravagance of thought or irrelevant reasoning witnessed in discussing the Eucharist."

The volume before us enlarges the proof of Mr. Ffolkes's teaching in this article with very great learning, showing painstaking and minute study of theology and of history. The style of writing, we regret to say, is somewhat obscure; the thoughts are not always arranged in logical order, and are too often repeated; the reader is perplexed by being told over and over again that some matter, to which allusion is made, will be treated of further on, while no reference is made to the page where it is to be found; and, most inexcusably, there is no index. But the book deserves, and can hardly fail to have, careful attention; though it will probably be long before scholars will be agreed as to the proper answer to be given to the questions which it raises. It may be well to trace out its general line of argument, and then to venture upon a criticism of some of its positions. It should not be forgotten all along, that the author writes with the professed hope that, when attention is called to the primitive teaching, it may be generally received by different branches of the Western Church, and thus may lead towards a restoration of the unity from the lack of which the Church is suffering. Mr. Ffolkes, as many will remember, left the Church of England some thirty years ago, and after fifteen years' experience in the Roman communion, returned to the Church which he had left, the doctrines of which, as he says, he now maintains in the Church of St. Mary the Virgin, Oxford, where he listened to them "from almost inspired lips" as an undergraduate.

I. After calling attention to the work of the Holy Ghost revealed in Scripture as the Person of the Godhead by Whose operation the Eternal Son became incarnate, and as the Person through Whom the Incarnation is applied to men, the author calls attention to the fact that this office and this work of the Holy Spirit were recognized and taught by the early Church, especially in its invocation of Him as the efficient agent in the sacraments. In a long chapter, of nearly one hundred pages, he traces out what he calls "uno ore consensus patrum," the constant testimony of Christian writers from Justin Martyr to Chrysostom, all speaking of the work of the Holy Ghost in the Eucharist, and all testifying directly and indirectly to this as the object and—so to speak—the result of the prayer of the Church, and thus proving most conclusively that the consecration was attributed not to man, but to the Spirit of God. The arguments are very full and elaborate, and though they may not always carry persuasion in every particular (as when, for instance, he claims that by the Word of God Justin Martyr means the Holy Spirit*), yet there can be no doubt that the author proves most conclusively the point which he has set himself to establish.

Passing on, Mr. Ffolkes finds the first evidence, as he thinks, of contrary teaching in certain later writings of St. Chrysostom, in which the consecration of the eucharistic elements is attributed to the priest pronouncing over them the Lord's words, which, he claims, had been used heretofore, as by the Lord Himself, only at the delivery of elements which had been consecrated by prayer for the descent of the Holy Ghost. This new teaching prevailed in later times, especially in the West, until it changed the whole doctrine of eucharistic consecration and controlled the form of the liturgy. To what is it to be attributed? Our author says—and his contention is a most startling one—that it was due to the so-called Clementine liturgy, and that this liturgy was framed, under Arian and Macedonian influences, in such a way as to subordinate and put out of sight the work of the Holy Ghost and even to degrade from the dignity and honor of the Son of God; for in it the words of Institution are placed before the invocation or "Epiklesis," and its long preface uses expressions carefully and craftily framed in the interests of those who called the Son by the titles of God, and who yet desired him to be of the same Godhead as the Father. Mr. Froide has little hesitation in attributing it to Eusebius of Emesa, who was copied by Diodorus, the teacher of St. Chrysostom; and he thinks that this great writer, and St. Basil also, were deceived by the name which was attached to liturgy, and while they would not adopt all the phraseology of its preface, they came to "attribute a power of consecration to words used by our Lord in administering to communicants which had already been consecrated by those words of His in blessing and giving of thanks, not a monogamy of which He permitted other evangelists or apostles to record for use by man." So, through the influence of these great doctors, it is claimed that the practice of the whole Eastern Church was changed, though it retained a formal invocation of the Holy Spirit, and though (as is conceded,) it did not altogether change its doctrine as to consecration.

* In the article, in the Dictionary of Biography, referred to above, it is claimed that in a passage where St. Augustine speaks of the Eucharistic elements as "sanctified by the Word of God," the context shows that he means the Holy Spirit.

Coming then to the Western Church, Mr. Ffoulkes claims that both the Roman and Mozarabic liturgy were modified through the influence of Constantine.

St. Gregory of Rome and Leander of Seville having been at the Eastern capital together, and having followed St. Chrysostom in revising their own liturgies by those of the supposed Clement. At the same time he holds that in the Roman liturgy the prayer (or part of a prayer,) beginning with the words "Supplices te rogamus" was retained in its ancient place at the beginning of the canon, and that St. Gregory introduced into it the words "per nos Angeli Tui," by which he meant the Holy Ghost; so that, though the words of Institution were introduced, there was an express invocation retained that the Holy Ghost might sanctify the oblation; and nearly the same thing is said of the change effected in the Mozarabic liturgy. The ancient doctrines may then have been obscured, but it was not altogether changed or denied in the West.

The change and the denial came, Mr. Ffoulkes holds, from a "Gallicianizing" of the Western Church; and those who recall this author's writings on the "Filioque" and the so-called Athanasian Creed will not be surprised to learn that he lays the blame largely on Charlemagne and his successor, Lewis. He enters upon a long discussion of the False Decretals, which he thinks were adapted to further the policy of the great emperor as against the East, though they turned in later times to the benefit of the pope rather than of the secular power. And, as he holds that the emperor and his associates used the names of St. Jerome and St. Athanasius to introduce into this creed a doctrine as to the Holy Ghost different from that which was revealed in Scripture, so he seeks to show that under the name of St. Ambrose they sought to find authority for a new doctrine of the Eucharist, their purpose in all being to make the West independent of the East. For, from writings falsely attributed to St. Ambrose,* authority was claimed for a doctrine which, ignoring the operation of the Holy Spirit, attributed the consecration in the Eucharist to the use of the words of Institution, and gave a carnal meaning to that which was, and had been held to be, spiritual. The author of this change Mr. Ffoulkes holds to be Amalarius, who removed the prayer "Supplices te rogamus" to a later place in the canon, and made the canon begin with the paragraph "Quam oblationem tu Deus," as in the Roman use at present. There is evidence to show that this change took place between the publication of the two editions of the well-known work of Paschasius. At any rate, it is held that the alteration was made and the old office-books destroyed, and that finally the modified canon was accepted at Rome under the influence of French popes, though Rome resisted the introduction of the altered liturgy for awhile, even as she did not at once consent to adopt the interpolated and pseudonymous creeds. "It took two full centuries to reconcile Rome to the interpolated creed;" "the Gregorian revision of this liturgy was not displaced at Rome by the Gallican version of it before the days of the French Pope, Leo IX., when Berengaritis of Tours was condemned there by him for tenets as yet only considered heretical in France."

Mr. Ffoulkes, in his last chapter, urges upon the English Church and the Roman Church to reject the work of "court divines," who have defended themselves by forgeries, as in matters of canon law and of statements of Catholic faith, so in regard to the form of eucharistic consecration. He calls upon the former to allow (at least) the use of the liturgy in the First Book of King Edward VI., and upon the latter to displace in the canon of the Mass, the paragraph, "Quam oblationem," by the older prayer, "Supplices te rogamus." Then, he holds, as the Greek Church has never failed to believe that the consecration in the Eucharist is effected upon the invocation of the Holy Ghost, all the Church will teach the ancient and Catholic faith in regard to this sacrament, reparation will be made for "a flagrant offence against the Holy Ghost," and that inter-communion will become possible, without which the Church cannot hope to do her work in converting the world.

DEMOCRATIC GOVERNMENT. A Study of Politics. By Albert Stickney. [New York: Harper & Brothers.] pp. 106.

On the one hand Mr. Stickney has fully grasped and admirably stated the evils of the present political system. On the other hand he proposes a very sweeping remedy. His plan is clearly thought out and distinctly set forth. It is to make the unit of the elective system a small district in which every adult male citizen shall have a vote on all local affairs, much as in the old-fashioned town-meeting of New England. This district shall elect one representative to a body which shall consider its county interests. This body in turn elects its representative, and so on till a supreme council is reached of manageable size. This last takes the place of the present Congress. It appoints the Executive, who has the sole authority over all administrative appointments. The Legislature is to be of one chamber only. There is to be no fixed tenure of office, but each electoral body can remove its representative at pleasure, and the chief council can change the Executive. The theory is that each will get the best man that can be had, and that death or superannuation will be the only causes of vacancy.

We can only say that this presupposes a great deal, and in one respect at least is impracticable. The army, the navy and the judiciary can rest on no such tenure. It is a principle as old as the English Revolution of 1688—that an honest bench of judges can only be where it is independent of the appointing power. As for the army and navy, no man will enter either of these professions unless with the purpose of following it for life and with reasonable hopes of promotion. In other branches of administrative service there is perhaps less of objection to Mr. Stickney's plan. But taken as a whole it seems to us both impracticable in the carrying out and dangerous in the provisions. It is more akin to the Venetian Constitution than to any other known plan of government. It seems to us that the safeguards of personal liberty and the provision for sectional protection are clearly wanting. Its theory is of a government by the wisest and best through a gradual series of eliminations. The question is, can that be attained by this method? In case of an ambitious and corrupt Executive and a corrupt central legislature in combination, an irresistible power would be concentrated in practically irresponsible hands.

The freest and best government the world has ever known is, we hold, the British, and it is also the most anomalous. It has grown, and not been constituted. Its provisions are, to the ideas of a French constitution builder, as illogical as possible. It is with difficulty that an outsider can comprehend them at all. But on the whole measuring alike results obtained and perils shunned, we think no other can compare with it. The present American system, as Mr. Stickney well shows, is drifting into great abuses. It is a government by a political machine, and there seems no way out of it, because under present conditions only men who make politics their business can expect to control matters. We think the situation is a grave one, and we beg our readers to consider very carefully this part of Mr. Stickney's work because it cannot be gained. To use a medical illustration—we fully accept his diagnosis of the disease, but we are not equally satisfied that he has found the remedy. But it is a hopeful sign, that men of ability and principle are discussing these topics, and this book is an evidence of the fact.

TROUBLED WATER. A Problem of Today. By Beverley Ellison Warner. [Philadelphia: J. H. Lippincott & Co.] pp. 327. Price $1.25.

The author's name sounds to us suspiciously like a fancy appellation, and just such a one as the author of such a book would be likely to select. It is a work of admirable intentions. It pictures social evils with a certain vigor and spirit, if not over carefully. It proposes two remedies which, in our judgment, are the right remedies. One is the power of the Church applied in antiring and effective ministrations. The other is the plan of operatives owning shares in the factories and other enterprises they labor for. All this is perfectly true, and very desirable to be inculcated. We only wish it were better done in this instance. We think this novel is a first effort, and we are pretty sure the author (or authoress) has the capacity for better work. But it is only just and necessary to say that this present writing is crude, wanting in finish and delicacy of tone. There are a great many people in this day who write admirably without having anything especial to write about, and therefore when an author like Beverley Warner, who has something to say, does not come up to the standard, it is a pity. If, by telling this frankly, it may be the means that the next work shall be better done, we shall be very glad. But in this day inferior fiction cannot be put up with, and especially novels "written with a purpose." This style of writing can hope to succeed only by producing the strong illusions of a scene of real life. Coarse drawing, harsh coloring, unreal characters, and a general chromo-lithographic effect will assuredly fail of the end in view, which is to draw attention to social evils and their remedies. Take it all in all, our verdict here is: "A well-intentioned book inadequately written."

*They are held to be really the writings of the same Eusebius of Emesa who was mentioned above.

POOR WRITING OF NATHANIEL PARKER WILLIS. Selected by Henry A. Beers. [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.] Pp. 260. Price $1.00.

In the days gone by, when Mr. Willis was the favorite American writer of short stories, when young gentlemen in the sophomore class and young ladies in the final year of "boarding school" supremely admired him, the selected among his tales were almost as many as the tales themselves. It is curious to look back as from a new world, upon those once admired and mildly-worshipped pages. For most of the points in which they then were dear to young Yale and young Harvard, they have ceased to please, but the senators and judges and doctors in divinity that now are, take up the pages which once stirred their young enthusiasm, and find unsuspected merit of another kind. Mr. Willis wrote a pure and polished English, and illustrated his points by more than one exquisite bit of prose poetry. He had a fair sense of humor, and there are a number of college stories which he evidently never cared to reprint, which were clever enough to be worth preserving. The above selection is not a bad one, but we should like to add one or two quite the equals of those here given. In fact "Peddlar Carl" is, perhaps, the best thing he ever did in the way of a short story, and as good as anything the magazines can now show. In this volume "The Female Ward" and the "Lunatic Skate" are two representative and capital papers. But it is hard to judge these with the eyes of the present day. For those who in the times of their youth read and admired Willis, there is a charm about those pages which is not wholly due to the writer's skill. They call back memories of a social and literary life as utterly vanished from this telephonic and electrical-lighted world as the days of Addison and Johnson. And to some few who still live, there are memorials of a man who, more than almost any American writer, was generous and kindly to every young aspirant to literary fame.

ZOROASTER. By F. Marion Crawford, Author of "Mr. Isaacs," "Dr. Claudius," etc.

This has been called in some criticisms Mr. Crawford's best work. We can hardly agree with this. A novel founded on ancient history can only be written by a man profoundly interested in the time described. For one "Hypatia" there are twenty failures. "Zoroaster" is not a failure, but it does not impress us as the result of any special interest in the time or personages described. What, we think, moved Mr. Crawford to write this book was his knowledge of modern Parsee mysticism. The real gist of the book is found in that portion which describes Zoroaster's experiences as the founder of the new cult. The rest is mere background painting. The jealousies and strifes of the two rival heroines are well drawn, but they might serve for any other time. We judge that Mr. Crawford has a passion for the occult and preternatural, and that he chose the era of the Persian sage in order to have full play for his taste. This is a mistake. One is never so much impressed with this element as where it is skillfully combined with the most modern and realistic incidents. Like the footprint Robinson Crusoe sees on the beach, it affects us powerfully till we know how it got there. But when the supernatural is thrust back into almost prehistoric ages it is, like every other peculiarity of the past, a matter of course. "Zoroaster" is fairly successful, but hardly a masterpiece, and the delicate touches of "Dr. Isaacs" and the "Roman Singer" are wanting, at least in our estimation. However, as we have said, some others think differently, and consider this Mr. Crawford's best work. He has done enough to be able to afford inferior, at least unequal, work. Every novel writer has made experiments, and has not always been up to his own mark, and the strongest proof of merit is to be able to fail now and then.

HYMN OF RECONCILIATION.

BY EDWARD HENRY ECKEL.

Dedicated, by permission, to the Presiding Bishop.

"O Lord, rebuke me not in Thine anger, neither chasten me in Thy hot displeasure."—Psalm vi. 1.

Father, I come to Thee,
Thy humble, sinful child,
Confessing bitterly
A life by sin defiled.
Extend to me Thy hand of grace,
Nor turn away, in wrath, Thy face.
The rains of penitence
Are pouring from mine eyes,
And at Thy feet each sense
In prostrate silence lies.
Before Thy throne of mercy bent,
I wait Thy word of pardon sent.

I weep for broken vows
Made with my hand in Thine—
I an unfaithful spouse,
Thou still a Friend Divine.
Forgive, and draw me to Thy heart,
And treasures new of love impart.

Man looks at outward show,
Is pleased, and goes his way.
But Thou alone canst know
The cankering soul's decay.
Surgeon of souls, probe deep within,
And bare the loathsome sores of sin.

Deep in thy darkness may seat
Where never man sees,
My darling sin retreats
To work its ill in me.
Resolved am I with shield and lance
Of Thine, to meet the foe's advance.

Tear from its throne of power
This demon-child of hell,
And make my heart a bower
Wherein all virtues dwell;
And fragrant flowers shall greet His eye
When my Beloved passeth by.

ROBERT ORD'S ATONEMENT.

BY ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

A Love Idyll.

"Moon of the summer night,
Far down you western steep
Sink, sink in silver light,
She sleeps, my lady sleeps!
Sleeps!"

"Dreams of the summer night,
Tell her her lover keeps
Watch while in slumbers light,
She sleeps, my lady sleeps!
Sleeps!" —Longfellow.

And after that neither of them knew exactly what had happened. The prince had come to Rotha—the prince in the shabby coat; but this time it was the princess who held out her little hand to him.

"Don't go, Garton; I want you."
"Do you know what you have said, Rotha?" asked Garton. "Do you understand what your words imply?"

"Oh, hush! yes, I know," returned Rotha hurriedly.

She sat in her place a little shy and frightened. She cast odd, wistful glances at Garton, who was standing beside her with a face transfigured with joy. The poor fellow would have liked to have knelt down and kissed the hem of her garment for very reverence and gratitude; he would have burst into some fond, worshipping phrase if he had known how; but Rotha understood him. She thought his silence very eloquent. The chiming of a church-bell jarred on them like a discord, startling Rotha by the lateness of the hour.

"How late is it! You must go now," said the girl softly.

She took away her hand with a little decision. She looked up at him with bright impatient eyes, as though bidding him to leave her.

"If I go now I may come again to-morrow, may I not?" said Garton, lingering. "I shall wake up and think it is only a dream, I know. Are you sure that you really meant it?" persisted the foolish fellow. "What am I to tell my brothers, Rotha? Of course Robert must know if I am not to go away."

"Tell them what you will," replied Rotha, blushing. "I suppose they will understand that I was unhappy, and that I would not let you go." She grew rather hot over her lover's incredulity. "Of course I meant it when I said I wanted you," she said a little tremulously; she was dazed, and his impatience bewildered her.

"Come, Garton, you must go now." She put out a soft hand again, and half led, half drew the excited young man to the door. She let him out herself into the wind and storm. It might have rained showers of roses on them both. A shy good-night followed him through the darkness. Garton, turning round in the garden-path, saw her still standing, with flowing dress and hair, on the doorstep, with the silver lamp in her hand. The radiant figure haunted him all night long.

Rotha went up to Meg when she had let out Garton. Meg was not asleep when she entered. The elder woman knew at once by the girl's kisses and silence that something had happened. She drew her into her arms without a word, and let her cry softly to herself. Rotha shed a few tears of wonder, and happiness, and excitement on Meg's shoulder. The strain and flurry of the last few hours had worn her out. This natural outlet of her pent-up feelings soothed and relieved her. By and by she sat up and told her friend all.

Meg was not much surprised. She lay and listened with a throbbing head to the shy recital. How strange and yet how familiar it all sounded! A hot quiver of pain darted through Meg's temples as she thought how she had known it all. Meg lost herself once in the midst of the girl's eager talk; the pine logs fell asunder, sending out a shower of sparkling fragments. A cricket came out and chirped upon the hearth; the room was full of a clear ruddy light. Meg is back again in the shabby parlor of Chatham Place. There she is, a tall, ungainly figure, with faded pinks in her belt. She is playing on the cracked old piano; the cool evening air comes through the wire blinds; the room is filled with warm, spicy smells; there is a bowl of dull red carnations. "Encore! encore!" cries somebody from a distance. "Play that again, Maggie," says a sweet old voice. A wrinkled hand beats time softly. "Ay, do, Madge, it is my favorite." A tall figure blocks up the light. Handsome Jack Carruthers is standing behind her; a dark intent face leans down to hers. Are those her tears splashing on the ivory keys? "Ay, Jack, for better, for worse; nay, for worse, worse only." Meg wakes up with a start and shiver, and a dull shadow seems creeping over the room.

"Do you love him? Are you sure you are happy? He is very good, but not good enough for my darling," says Meg, when Rotha had finished.

"Good! I wish I were half as good as he is," thought Rotha, when she went up to her room. She was a little disappointed at Mrs. Carruthers's reception of her news. Meg had said very little, but she had kissed Rotha and wept over her.

"It is too late to ask my advice now," Meg had said very solemnly, "and perhaps, after all, I should not have cared to give it. You have accepted Garton Ord's love, and I pray that he may be worthy of my darling's choice, but I would have her be very sure of herself and of him too."

Rotha had gone upstairs with these words ringing in her ears. In spite of her happiness they had a little sobered her. It was clear that Meg had been thinking of her own unhappy choice. To her such a subject must always be more or less invested with gloom. Nevertheless the words had been said, and Rotha had felt herself somewhat sobered by them.

"Do you love him? Are you sure you are happy?" Meg had asked her anxiously, and then she had avowed it as her conviction that he was hardly worthy of her friend's love. Doubtless it was rather chilling to the girl's enthusiasm; she sat down a little troubled as she pondered over Meg's words.

"Was she sure?" Of course she was. Rotha repelled the doubt indignantly. Was he not the best, the noblest, the dearest? Her breast heaved, her eyes filled with tears, as a hundred recollections of the young man's goodness crossed her mind. Rotha was right when she felt that she loved him dearly. Nevertheless Meg was right too. Mrs. Carruthers had grasped the truth instinctively when she told herself that Rotha's affection for Garton Ord was more a sentiment than a passion, and that the imagination had as much to do with as the heart.

Propinquity has much to do with such cases. One remembers the quaint old name that Shakespeare has given to the pansy—"and maidens call it Love in Idleness." How many a girl and boy fancy has grown out of summer's wanderings and the dolce far niente of holiday-time—youth, spring-time, and love joining hand in hand! In after years things are different. Damon is not forever piping to his Chloe; a little honey may refresh the eyes, but too much sweetness may cloy a man's palate for all that. Adam, as he delves in the sweat of his brow, is not always thinking of his future Eve. One who has lately gone from us, and who gave his all of earthly love to one woman, as child and girl and wedded wife, once said, "Love is the business, but not the sole business of a man's life."

Rotha had always had a pleasant liking for Garton; his society had become a sort of necessity to her. Those three days of his absence had seemed a break in her life; he had fallen out of her daily existence, and Rotha had been restless. Garton was away from her, unhappy and miserable, and all the sweetness had gone out of everything in consequence.

And after that it had all come so suddenly on her, "and maidens called it Love in Idleness, or, as Meg would have said, love in pity or out of pity. When Rotha questioned her heart in the presence of Garton its answer appeared conclusive. She put out her hand to him with a great throbb of pity and love, with genuine blushes, with a little burst of honest frankness. She would make him happy; it must all come right, she thought. Poor Gar's passionate protestations awoke responsive thrills.

Rotha was in a great measure blind to Garton's failings. The faults that provoked others were to her but the errors of circumstance. In some degree he was glorified in her eyes. The stern or ascetic side of Garton's nature, which Mrs. Carruthers found so grievous, was simply admirable to the young girl, who would have gone through fire and water for those she loved. She looked at Garton through the glamour of her own imagination. She invested him with a hundred imaginary attributes. Garton, with all his clumsy honesty and his tender heart, would have fallen far short of this standard, for no one knew his own faults better than Gar.

As she thought about it now, Meg's doubts ceased to harass her. "He will owe everything to me. I shall make up to him for all his disappointments and his wasted life," she said to herself. "I need not fear that he does not love me for myself now. How noble of him to go away without asking for anything, and now he will have it all—have it all."

When Burnley Woods are green with summer sap, when the red leaves of autumn flame deep in windy hollows, or when the winter snows lie crisp and untrodden in the bosky dells, how will Rotha remember that she has promised to be Garton Ord's wife?

CHAPTER XXIX.

Beluicid and Belween.

"An avant—en avant! not doubting, nor fearing. Though clouds gather round thee, obscuring the sun. Yet turn not away from the duties before thee. Give each thy whole strength as they come" one by one.

"Steadfast and strong, though the path should be lonely— Never look back though thy heart seem to yearn To linger awhile with the beautiful day-dreams That come with their brightness to tempt us to turn.

"Sweet the reward when the labor is ended. To feel that each day thou hast faithfully striven: It may be that soon the great Master will call thee To render account for the life He has given."
—Helen Marion Burnside.

As for Garton, he went home through the wind and rain as though he were treading on air. He came back once and put his lips to the stone where the silver lamp had been gleaming. He murmured a thousand blessings as he looked up at the curtained window, where the firelight was still playing on the blind. He imagined her still sitting there in her gay dress, with downcast eyes, thinking of him. He would have lingered there, Heaven knows how long, in the rain and darkness, keeping watch and ward over that hallowed threshold, but for Rotha's little Skye terrier Fidgets, who flew barking at him round a corner. He quitted the dim garden walks with reluctance. Rotha would have wondered if she had seen him pacing up and down underneath the soaking evergreens. Garton would have paced on there quite happily for hours, entirely oblivious of his outer man, but for Fidgets' annoying attentions. The dog positively refused to recognize his friend. He growled at Garton's wet overcoat, till Garton gave up the contest and retired.

He performed a few more acts of worship, however, in the front of the house, leaning on the gate which Rotha and he had so often entered. Was Rotha or he the happier now? "Oh, God, bless her for all her dear love and goodness to me!" cried Gar, lifting his hat in his youthful chivalry. How many more delirious things he would have said and done are doubtful, but Fidgets found him out again and came grumbling through an aperture in the wall. Jock and Jasper from the vicarage joined in the duet inside, and all the village dogs took up the chorus, while Garton, baffled by the canine music, took himself and his raptures to the sea-wall, till he felt sober enough to go back to Rotha.

The study looked very cozy when Garton entered. The fire was blazing, the lamp freshly trimmed, and the vicar sat in the arm-chair which Garton usually occupied opposite to Robert, with Cinders comfortably curled up on his knee. Garton could hear their voices as he climbed up the dark staircase. The cheerful light almost dazzled him coming in from the gloom outside.

Robert broke off directly at Garton's entrance. His face looked flushed and excited, his eyes sparkling, his whole appearance and manner changed. The vicar also looked beaming. The two confronted him with some curiosity. Garton, with his radiant face, his wet coat and muddy boots, presented a strange appearance to his two brothers. Austin put his hand on his wet shoulder rather anxiously, and Robert exclaimed in surprise:

"Why, where have you been, Gar? It is nearly eleven o'clock; and, my dear fellow, just look at your boots."

"Yes, I know," returned Garton, not looking at them, however, and shaking himself like a water-spaniel. "I have been with a friend a part of the evening, and since then I have been taking a walk by myself on the sea-wall."

He did not add that his friend had been Rotha, and if Robert had any suspicion as to the cause of his radiant looks he did not say so.

Austin was the next to speak. "Making the most of your liberty, eh? Now I'll be bound your friend was Rube Armstrong, and that you were both making a night of it up at Bryn. Here have Robert and I been wearing out our patience waiting for you. Mary has sent in once to know when I was coming, but I would not go till Robert had told you the news."

"What news? It ought to be pleasant to judge by Bob's face," replied Gar dreamily. He wondered with a sort of pride if they could guess how little their news could affect him. It was something to see Robert look happy however. "Is Belle better?" he asked, with a consciousness that this news must be about her.

"Better. No, I cannot say that she is," replied the vicar, becoming a little grave at the question. "Mary will have it that she gets gradually worse."

"Oh, Mary is always croaking," interrupted Robert hastily.

"It is natural that she should be anxious about her only sister," returned the vicar, mildly. "I cannot bear to see her worry herself so; it is making her quite thin. You know you were getting anxious yourself, Robert."

"Yes, but this will make all the difference; it will put a stop to the unsettled state of things; and then the change of climate, you know."

"You think, then, of arranging it before May?" inquired the vicar significantly.

Robert nodded and then looked at Garton. "We have not told him your news yet. Look here, Gar; we are talking in hieroglyphics, old fellow. What should you say if you had not to go to New Zealand after all?"

Gar stared at him stupidly. Not to go? Of course he was not going now; but how did they know? Robert took up his brother's parable rather impatiently.

"That is not the way to begin, Austin. Gar will never understand us like that. Listen to me, Gar. You recollect Aunt Charlotte's oldest friend, Mr. Ramsay of Stretton?"

"Remember him? Of course I do. Emma Ramsay was a pretty girl, too," he added mischievously for his brother's benefit, and, for a wonder, Robert did not resent the joke.

"Well, she is Emma Tregarthen now—Lady Tregarthen, I should say; and is prettier than she ever was, only rather stout. Well, what should you say, Garton, at Mr. Ramsay sending for me early this morning in quite a friendly way and telling me that he had accidentally heard that I was managing clerk at Broughton & Clayton's, and not getting on so well as I ought in the world, and then making me the most brilliant offer you ever imagined?"

"I should say he was a jolly old fellow, and no end of a brick," cried Garton rapturously. "Is he going to take you into the works at Stretton? Bravo, Bob! The star of the Ords is rising now," and boyish as ever he clapped his brother gaily on the shoulder.

"No nonsense, Gar; you have not heard me out. He can't take me in at Stretton, though I see he wants me, because Carter refuses to be superannuated, and very sensible, too, of Carter. By the by, he told me, Austin, that he had always hoped to see me at the head of that concern, in poor Bob Ramsay's place, but of course the fates would not have it," moralized Robert, looking very handsome and sentimental, as behoves a man who had had to choose between two beautiful girls.

"That was when he hoped you would be his son-in-law," returned the vicar, smiling. "It is getting late, my dear fellow, and you are leaving Garton a long time in the dark."

"Not in the dark now," answered Gar, with a happy laugh, but of course his brother misunderstood him.

"What do you guess?" asked Robert in surprise. "I was utterly taken aback when Mr. Ramsay told me that, knowing how my abilities were thrown away, he had taken the liberty to recommend me to the house of Fullgrave & Barton, old correspondents of his, who had applied to him for a well-qualified English manager."

"An American house?" exclaimed Garton, opening his eyes.

"Yes, I should have preferred England, if only for Bella's sake. Of course I know she will be willing to accompany me," he continued, with a smile; "still it is hard parting her and Mary. It is all arranged; Mr. Ramsay has the power to arm me with full credentials. I have given Broughton & Clayton three months' notice. My salary is to be six or seven hundred a year, and I trust, before two months are out, Belle will be well enough to marry me. Mr. Ramsay says there can be no objection to my taking a wife out, as we are to have a house rent free on the premises. So Belle will be quite a rich woman," finished Robert; but his voice was a little husky as he thought how late, how very late, all these good things had come to them. More than once the fear had crossed his mind that evening that Belle was hardly fit for the new duties she was to take on herself.

"Have you told her," asked Gar excitedly. "My dear Bob, I heartily congratulate you." He was a little absent now and then; he wondered when a break in his brother's talk would allow him to bring out his news. It was glorious to think that Belle and Robert were at last to be married, and there could be but one opinion at Robert's good fortune; but he must be forgiven a little natural egotism if he wished that Robert would not be quite so prolific.

"No, I have not told Belle yet; Mary begged me to say nothing to-night. Garton, you don't look half surprised enough, and you don't ask me why you are not to go to New Zealand."

"No," returned Garton, trying to suppress his impatience; "I forgot all about that part of it, Robert."

"Well, I am coming to it now. Mr. Ramsay did not send for me this morning only to tell me this news, but because he thought I should be a likely person to assist him in a sudden difficulty; he has no sons, as you know, and his staff, though efficient, is somewhat small, and he wants a trustworthy person with a fair amount of brains to discharge rather a delicate commission for him."

"Well!" ejaculated Garton. Robert was decidedly proud in his happiness; these particulars were not at all interesting to Garton; he began to think of Rotha standing out in the dark with a silver lamp in her hand; he could hear the sweet good-night echoing among the trees; he shifted his place and moved restlessly, somewhat to Austin's amusement, as Robert went on with his explanations.

"You see he is rather in a fix just now, as the Yankees say. He has just heard from very reliable sources that the Yera Cruz mines in South America are not yielding profits to the shareholders—that, in fact, there are rumors of immense losses. Mr. Ramsay is not one of the directors, but he has dabbled very largely in shares; and the person he has appointed to watch his interests over there has not quite come up to the mark. Some of the most influential shareholders have been selling out, a panic has been the result, and the directors want to hush it up; in fact, Mr. Ramsay cannot satisfy himself whether there be serious cause for alarm or not. Do you follow me?"

"Of course I do," returned Garton, impatiently. He could not understand what Robert was driving at, or why these lengthy particulars should be interesting to him. The vicar, who was watching him, exchanged a droll smile with Robert.

"It does not strike you as particularly interesting, does it? Well, it will soon; don't be in a hurry, Gar; it is coming presently. Well, Mr. Ramsay would go over himself, but he is not as young as he was, and he dreads the voyage; but he asked me if I knew of any one tolerably trusty who would go over there, and who would watch the whole thing for him and keep his eyes and ears open. The process, as Mr. Ramsay explained it, is very simple. His principal business would be to seek out a certain retired Spanish merchant, of whom Mr. Ramsay has lost sight for many years; this Don Gomez would give you—I mean the person in question—every reliable information that was to be had. You see it is very simple. The only thing is, there's not a moment to be lost. Mr. Ramsay wants immediate action."

It was evident Garton was getting very restive; he understood now at what Robert was aiming; he would have to bring out his news in a very different way than he intended; this long business talk was intolerable.

"Well, Gar," continued Robert, good-humoredly, "I suppose you know what I am after now? Mr. Ramsay offered very handsome terms, and I owed him a good turn for what he had done for me. Of course I told him that my brother would be the person. Aren't you glad it is South America and not New Zealand, Gar?"

"You told him I would go!" burst out Gar. "How dare you?—I beg your pardon—what right had you to say such a thing without my leave, Robert?"

"Tut! lad, don't lose your temper. Austin, just look at him. Do you think I would have answered for you if I had not been sure of your consent? Have you not been breaking your heart days enough over the New Zealand scheme? and didn't you tell me that you would go anywhere—to Timbuctoo if I liked?"

"Circumstances alter cases," returned Garton. His muscles were quivering, his whole frame seemed strung up to the contest. He looked every inch an Ord. "I hope you have not given your word, Robert; for I do not mean to go to New Zealand or South America either."

"Hear him," returned Robert in calm exasperation. Did you ever see any one so provoking in your life, Austin?"

"I thought you would have been overjoyed, Gar," said the vicar reprovingly. "Robert thought he was doing the best for you. He knew how you hated the thought of leaving England. The whole thing would not occupy you more than five or six months; it would simply be a pleasant change, and Mr. Ramsay held out the hope to Robert that if you pleased him in the way you discharged your commission he would take you into his works at Stretton."

"And," put in Robert, with an uneasy glance at Garton, "I would not have given my word to Mr. Ramsay if I had had a doubt of your approval; but there was not a moment to be lost—not a moment, Garton. He wants you to start by the Phoenix next Wednesday."

"And what did you say, Robert?" asked Garton, trying to keep himself still.

"I told him you would go," returned Robert steadily. "Why, Gar, what's the matter with you?"

"Oh, good heavens! give me patience," cried poor Gar. "Robert, you were wrong, very wrong, to pledge your word to Mr. Ramsay. How am I to go now? Indeed I cannot. Miss Maturin and I are engaged!"

A dead silence followed Garton's hasty words. If a thunderbolt had fallen between the three they could scarcely have appeared more astonished. The vicar especially could hardly believe his ears.

"Engaged! You and Rotha!" he gasped out; but Robert interrupted him.

"Do you intend to tell us that you have had the meanness to propose to her?" he almost thundered. But perhaps it is not well to repeat the words of a man when he is angry; forbearance and a tolerant estimate of other men's motives were not among Robert Ord's virtues. The vicar too was at first scarcely less displeased. Neither could rid himself of the impression that Garton had taken an ungenerous advantage of the young heiress.

"Go on," said Garton with a little scorn; "I shall not defend myself."

He folded his arms and listened with pale face and fiery eyes to Robert's brief cutting speeches. The vicar looked disturbed, as well he might, at the high words that raged between the brothers. Oh, the Ord temper! Garton had his share of it, without doubt.

"Hush! that will do, Robert," said Austin in an authoritative manner.

His great calm voice seemed to have an instantaneous effect on the excited young men. He put his hand on Robert's shoulder as he spoke.

"I don't think we ought to be so hard on him, Bobus," using unconsciously the name that belonged to their boyhood. "Let us rather hear what the lad has to say for himself."

"He ought to have gone away like a man without saying anything," returned Robert bitterly; "he told me he would."

"I never said that I would go away without bidding her good bye," replied the other vehemently. "Would you have me sink off like a thief or a coward? Was it my fault that I loved her," burst out Gar, "when every one in my place must have done the same?"

"No, no," broke in the compassionate vicar. He began to estimate the force of Garton's temptation. He held out his hand to the poor boy kindly.

"We've been too hard on you, Gar. Tell us how it all happened, lad."

That touch of real sympathy beat down all Garton's stubbornness in a moment. His eyes glistened. The sullen look passed out of his face.

"I will tell you, Austin," he said eagerly; "but I will have nothing to do with any of his questions. If Robert chooses to insult me, he may take the consequences. I never went near Bryn at all till she sent for me." "Sent for you!" echoed the vicar in surprise.

Robert looked up then with gloomy eyes, but said nothing.

"Yes; she sent me a message by Rube. She had heard all about my going away.

and wanted to prevent it; you, who know so much about her generosity, Austin, can guess what she offered me. She was pressing it on me as innocently as though she were my sister, and I got up and flung her hand away. I don't think I quite knew what I was about, Austin, and then it all came out."

"Hush! don't say any more. Yes, I understand." He turned his back on Garton, and began to walk up and down the room as though some what agitated; understand—of course he did—he could see it all clearly. The frank offer of assistance and the abrupt refusal, the girl's innocent reproaches and the poor fellow's sudden burst of anguish; he could fancy the sternness with which Garton flung away the little hand and rose to depart. Perhaps she saw his look of despair, and—

"Yes, yes, I see how it was," muttered the vicar. He turned back and put his hands on Garton's shoulders, and looked up in the young man's face with kind wistful eyes:

"Do you think you are worthy of her, Gar? Oh, Gar, you are both so young for your age; are you sure that you know your own minds?"

Garton was silent a moment, and an expression almost of sadness crossed his face. "I shall try my best, Austin, and you may depend on that; but how can I ever hope to come up to her?"

The vicar smiled a little sadly; he seemed about to speak and then checked himself.

"You were going to say something Austin?"

"Yes, but I was afraid I might hurt you; the fact is the world will judge you somewhat harshly in this, Garton; it will say, and justly too I think, that a man has no right to owe everything to his wife."

"That is what I say," muttered Robert. Garton looked from one to the other rather doubtfully.

"Perhaps it might not do in some cases," he said at last very slowly. "Of course I should prefer it otherwise—any man would; but I shall not be such a fool as to let my pride stand in the way. I think it would be cowardly after what she said," and the dark face worked and softened as he remembered Rutha's words—"I was but a poor girl, Garton, without a friend but Meg in the world, till all these good things came to me; but what are they worth—what is anything worth—unless I may share them with those I love?" She had said this to him in her sweet humility; would he ever forget those words? He knew what she meant; with womanly generosity she was stripping herself of all adventitious distinctions; her wealth was to be apart from herself, a mere adjunct of circumstances. In these few words she would have him know that in her sight they were more than equals.

Rutha's unworldly nature was likely to be a great comfort to Garton; it gave him strength now to repel his brother's forcible argument; it was not well in some cases, perhaps, but to be daunted by such a bugbear as this would be unmanly, he told himself; but Austin's words were, nevertheless, very grievous to him.

He stood with a clouded face while Austin looked at his watch and exclaimed abruptly at the lateness of the hour.

"If you are going in next door I shall come with you," he said, with some decision, when the vicar seemed preparing for departure. Austin sighed wearily, but offered no objection to the lad's impatience; the conversation would keep, he thought, till to-morrow, but Garton was evidently not of his opinion. Robert watched them out with gloomy eyes; he sighed bitterly once or twice when he was left alone.

"Who would have thought the boy would have had such good taste?" he said, half aloud, as he dragged his chair nearer to the fire and stirred the decaying embers together. "Pshaw! if she be what they make out, how could such a woman care for him?" he continued, disdainfully. He struck the logs heavily with his boots—a shower of bright sparks flew hither and thither. "Gar has no pride," he muttered, leaning his elbows on his knees and staring at the flame. "If I had loved her ever so, I would have gone away without saying one word to her, if she looked at me forever with her soft, pitiful eyes; eyes—I never saw any woman's like them, they talk to you almost like a dumb animal's;" he shaded his eyes with his hand and looked steadily into the lurid cavern before him. What face was that that seemed to start up suddenly before him? Not Belle's, certainly; there is no halo of pale golden hair, no gray eyes brimful of unspoken fondness. This is a sweet, tired face, with brown hair blowing softly over the temples, the lips quiver sadly, the eyes are full of passionate brown fire. "I would rather walk till I dropped—till I died—before I touched your arm!" he wonders with a groan when these bitter words will cease to haunt him. Well, Garton has a strong arm, and she will lean on that—on that—a strange smile wreathes his pale lips as he follows out this thought—"Oh, Robert, Robert Ord, the time will soon come when you will wish that you had never been born than that you should see such a sight as that."

One can imagine what sort of kind, brotherly counsel the vicar gave when the study door had closed on him and Garton, and how he forgot his weariness, and patiently listened to the young man's eager outpourings. Garton got more than a glimpse of the great loving heart then; he listened with tender reverence when Austin touched gently on his failings and pointed out the path of duty that lay before him.

"You must go away, that you may be worthy of her," he said, not heeding how Garton winced at his words. "You must work bravely for her and yourself too before you can enjoy your reward. When you come back you will be in a far different position, Garton, from what you now occupy. Then you will have earned something toward your college expenses; your career will be open to you, and the good things will not come into empty hands as they do now."

"Enough, I will go," said the young man; he held out his hand to his brother, and the vicar was almost startled at his paleness. "I hope you will not have reason to repent of your advice, Austin," he added with a wistful smile, touching in his sadness; "but it shall never be said that I shirked my duty."

He went back into the next house and walked up straight to Robert, who was still sitting, brooding over the embers, with his elbows on his knees.

"Well," said Robert, not looking up at him, however, "you and Austin have found plenty to talk about."

"You are right," returned Garton, sadly. All the brightness had gone out of his face; he looked weary and dull. "Robert, you meant it for the best, and I will not say any longer that you were wrong. I will go by the 'Phoenix' on Wednesday." Robert looked up quickly, and then in a moment all his silliness melted, and his whole heart yearned over his brother.

"God bless you, lad, you have lifted a weight off my mind. I did give my word; and, Gar, I really thought I was doing it for your good."

"Don't let's say another word about it, Bob. I've got to do it, and that's all."

"Yes; but I must say something. Look here, dear boy, I did not mean half of all those hard things I have been saying."

"Did you not, Robert?"

"No, of course not; but I felt for the moment as though you had disgraced us all."

"I shall never do anything to disgrace you," returned Garton, quietly. "How can I when she cares for me? I am glad you have told me this, Bobus. It makes it easier for me to go away. If I never come back"—his voice faltered—"you will try to think the best of me, will you not, dear old Bobus?" And before his brother could answer he dashed his hand across his eyes and hurriedly left the room.

THE QUIET CORNER.

BY THE BISHOP OF EASTON.

XXI.

Our Lord, in describing the fate of the wasted seed, tells us, "That which fell among thorns are they which, when they have heard, go forth and are choked with care and riches and pleasures of this life, and bring no fruit to perfection." We are here taught that anxious care, no less than avarice and frivolity, mars the work of grace and stifles the religious life.

Let us think first, however, how wretched, as well as wasteful and sinful, is Anxious Care.

Our present happiness depends very largely upon tranquillity of spirit. For every day that dawns upon us brings its blessings, and before it passes away will afford opportunity for many quiet enjoyments. If the heart be not wrung with remorse, or agitated by disquiet, we can scarce help being happy. To-day, for instance, the gentle breath of morning comes to meet us, as we awake to consciousness. All day long we have the freedom of God's beautiful world; we have work to do adapted to our capacity, and in which it is not hard to be interested; as we have gone forth to our daily duties, we see leaves and flowers which bear witness that our Maker will feed the great multitude who depend upon Him; in the midst of labor we see some kind faces, and interchange some kindly words, and when we turn from it, few but have some to look for their coming, and to listen with interest to what they tell. And underneath all this may lie the ever-throbbing consciousness of the Christian heart. I am yet but in the ante-chamber of the universe, standing here with things inferior; presently the heavens shall open for me, and I shall see that full-orbed glory whose dim reflections make the earth so gay.

"What right," I ask, "has any man to be unhappy."

But listen to that sigh; mark that sad face, index of a heavy soul. See how indifferently this creature goes to his daily toil, and how joylessly he uses present mercies. What shall I eat? What shall I drink? Wherewith shall I be clothed? Things are well enough to-day, but that uncertain to-morrow, how shall it be provided for?

Such thoughts as these incapacitate men for any present happiness. Imagination, in its power of creating misfortunes, transcends even the ordinary course of nature. In the effort to wring from the reluctant future the secrets which it will not tell, to force into shape and being, events and accidents which as yet exist only in the mind of God; the soul is tossed about like a leaf in the wind, the sport of fears and doubts and of all absurd imaginings.

The world itself must admit, that he who could teach it to concern itself with its proper business and to leave the rest to God, who would deliver it from all the burden of sorrow which is merely in prospect and imagination, would almost half restore to us the paradise we have lost.

It is, then, in kind consideration for our happiness that the Master warns us against Anxious Care. For be it noted, that the "thought" forbidden in the Sermon on the Mount, is identical with the "cares" which choke the Word. The Greek word is the same.

There is a deep pathos in our Saviour's word, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." The inevitable trials of life are numerous enough without any exaggerations of fancy and unbelief. God knows well our need of humiliation, and to that end ordains the daily sorrow, and He knows also, the capacity we have to endure the chastening necessary to make us humble and stay His hand in time. In the natural order of things we must be vexed and wounded and disappointed. We endure pain and losses and bereavement and sickness. We must sometimes bow before the storm of trouble sent by Providence, and sometimes be stung with man's ingratitude and unkindness. Why should we then embitter life by troubling ourselves with that which doth not concern us, when we have real adversaries in the present, why wrestle with the phantoms of the future, shadowy and yet terrible?

There is, indeed, a certain prophetic skill taught by experience, and exercised by the thoughtful; a prudent forecast which serves to blunt the edge of misfortune. These we are bound to use. But when we have considered the course that things are likely to take, when we have made reasonable provision for the morrow, we have done all we know how to do. As for knowing certainly what is to be, as for controlling results, as for grasping in our minds the infinite combinations of events, the effort is preposterous.

For instance, men may engage in business with reasonable prospects of success, or invest their means upon reasonable security, or adopt such measures and habits as by experience are found to promote health and preserve life; but a business without danger, an investment without risk, absolute impunity from disease and death—these we may not find. Time and chance, as the wise man saith, happen unto all men, and we have nothing to reproach ourselves with if it often prove that we are not infallible.

All these fears of imagined evil, all this corroding, anxious, vexing care about the evil which to-morrow may bring or the good which to-morrow may defeat, is so much self-punishment, so much additional weight heaped on our shoulders and bowing us into the dust. We make ourselves miserable about contingencies which never happen, and are stricken down by a blow never suspected.

I have read of a good woman whose friends were amazed to see her perfectly cheerful and happy, though her physician had declared to her that she had an incurable cancer. Only a year or two before she had nursed a sister who had suffered excruciating agonies for many months from the same fearful disease. She died from fever or some acute disease before the cancer had ever given her a moment's pain. How much suffering had she been saved by not giving way to Anxious Care!

Men have been disturbed in considering how they should find means to educate their children. God has taken the little ones away, and then they saw that they had disquieted themselves for naught.

Alas! that we are so slow to learn the simple lesson that duties are ours, results are God's.

Touching our duty, we cannot be too thoughtful, but as for the result, the weal or woe of the morrow, we cannot leave that too confidently in the hands of God.

ISRAEL IN EGYPT.

"Troubled on Every Side."

Exodus xiii. 30-32; xiv. 1-15.

Verse 20. It is supposed that Raampses or Rameses was the starting point of the march, that at Succoth the gathering of the whole people took place, and Etham was where they entered on the wilderness and left Egypt. Etham is supposed to be at the southern end of the Bitter Lakes, Succoth on the western shore.

Verse 21. "Pillar of cloud by day, pillar of fire by night." These two signs were clearly supernatural, and at the same time those best fitted to furnish a clear and simple guide. It is undoubtedly that the same was dark by day and luminous by night, and this also shows that the march was by night, probably with a long halt and resting in the middle of the day. Also different parts of the same army would be on the march, some later and some earlier. Hence, if the van reached a halting place at sunset, the rear would have some time before coming up with it, even with the compactness of an Oriental march.

Verse 22. This sign continued during the whole of the forty years of the exodus.

Chap. xiv., verse 1. This is the first command given to the people on their journey.

Verse 2. "Turn." That is instead of going northward to the Isthmus of Suez, to go southward parallel to the Red Sea coast. "Encamp before Pi-hahiroth." This name is probably preserved in the Ajrud, now only a fort. Baal-zephon and Migdol are not to be identified. There is a plain ten miles long and about as many broad, which extends from Ajrud to the sea, and was probably the place of encampment for Israel. To reach this point from Etham would require a bend in their course. One difficulty in topography is that the Red Sea has receded.

Verse 3. This encampment was to give Pharaoh time to repent of his yielding, and to overtake the Hebrews. "Entangled." Their halt would imply that they were in a sort of cul de sac, unable to go on, caught between the sea and the mountains, in a plain too incapable of long supporting them.

Verse 4. This is for the purpose of bringing upon Pharaoh deserved punishment. "Harden Pharaoh's heart." Suffer it to grow hard. It was fear, not compassion or justice, which made him let the people go. Therefore to harden his heart would be to waken anew his resolution and obstinacy. The short-lived impression of the Paschal Night needed to be deepened. There was no doubt a religious apostasy going on at the same time with the change of policy toward Israel.

Verse 5. It was the flight of Israel, and not their position in the desert which led to the purpose to pursue. This was strengthened of course by the easy opportunity presented of reducing them again to slavery. The regret was for the loss of a profitable bond-people. And it was shared by the king's servants, probably by all the higher caste portion of the Egyptians.

Verse 6. "His chariot." His own especial war equipage. "Took his people." His own especial body-guard, the royal guard, who were to fight immediately under his eye.

Verse 7. "Six hundred chosen chariots." These were the élite of his forces. The strength of Egypt lay in these, which corresponded to modern artillery. Their purpose was to break the ranks of the foe, and also to form a sort of movable fortress, from which spears and arrows could be shot. "All the chariots of Egypt." That is, what others he could muster from the general force. The "six hundred" were a sort of "household troops," the picked brigade or division of the king. "Captains over every one of them." There seems to be a good deal of doubt over the meaning of this phrase, but if each chariot was a sort of nucleus of its own fighting force this would be clear enough. It would make the proportion between the two armies more nearly, as it probably was.

Verse 8. "Hardened the heart." Not necessarily made him more cruel and vindictive, but gave new resolution to pursue the flying. "Went out with an high hand." Rather, "the children of Israel were going out with an high hand." That is, the Lord's hand, which Pharaoh would not see to be on their side.

Verse 9. There is intimated here a three-fold force. The chariots and horses, the cavalry, and the infantry overlook them—that is, came in sight of them in their encampment. "Before Baal-zephon." This last is evidently a place consecrated to some heathen god (literally Place of Typhon). It was probably a mountain peak or range, and Migdol was on another height of the Atâkah. The particularity with which these names are given implies well-known localities.

Verse 10. The approach of Pharaoh was so imminent that the pursued were able to recognize the pursuers. This might be, while the space of some miles was between the armies. "They were sore afraid." They had not the least spirit of resistance, even if they had the means. Bishop Wordsworth doubts their possession of weapons.

Verse 11. Moses experiences the first of their many rebellions. "No graves in Egypt." It has been thought that the sight of the burial places in the sides of the mountains may have suggested this murmur, which is meant as a bitter sarcasm.

Verse 12. This refers to the complaints which they sent up when the exactions of Pharaoh were increased upon them. They laid the blame of their affliction upon Moses. They show the thoroughly slavish temper, which proves that this bondage was no thing of yesterday.

Verse 13. Moses tries to rally the people from their fears. "Stand still." That is, wait. "Make no effort for yourselves." The marginal reading of the next clause is, "for whereas ye have seen the Egyptians to-day, ye shall see them again no more forever." The purpose is to cheer them with hope.

Verse 14. "Hold your peace." That is, remain passive, the Lord should fight for them.

Verse 15. "Wherefore criest thou unto me?" It looks as if Moses, though confident before the people, had his own secret misgivings toward the Lord. "That they go forward." Order the people to resume their march.

MR. RUSKIN ON SAINTS.

The ordinary needs and labors of life, the ordinary laws of its continuance, (says Mr. Ruskin) require many states of temper and phases of character inconsistent with the perfectest types of Christianity. Pride, the desire of bodily pleasure, anger, ambition—at least, so far as the word implies a natural pleasure in governing—pugnacity, obstinacy, and the selfish family and personal affections, have all their necessary offices—for the most part wide and constant—in the economy of the world. The saintly virtues—humility, resignation, patience, obedience, meaning the love of obeying rather than of commanding, fortitude against all temptations of bodily pleasure and the full-flowing charity forbids a selfish love, are all conditions of mind possible to few, and manifestly meant to furnish forth those who are to be seen as fixed lights in the world; and by no means to be the native inheritance of fireflies. Wherever these virtues truly and naturally exist, the persons endowed with them become, without any doubt or difficulty, eminent in blessing to, and in rule over, the people around them, and are thankfully beloved and remembered as princes of God for evermore. Cuthbert of Melrose, Martin of Tours, Benedict of Monte Casinò, Hugo of Lincoln, Genevieve of Paris, Hilda of Whithy, Clara of Assisi, Joan of Orleans, have been beyond any denial, and without one diminishing or disgraceful fault or flaw, powers for good to all the healthy races, and in all the goodly spirits of the Christendom which honors them; and the candor of final history will show that their unknown, or known but to be slandered, servants and disciples, have been the ministers of vital energy in every beautiful art and holy state of its national life.

SELWYN HALL EVENING HYMN.

BY THE REV. GEO. H. NORTON.

O Saviour from Thy throne above,
Thy peace on us bestow!
That we encircled by Thy love
No fear or shame may know;
But as we raise our hymn of praise
In this our evening prayer,
With radiant light, may angels bright
Thy gracious blessing bear.

The gathering shades of eventide
Fall round us as we pray,
O Lord, be ever at our side,
Till darkness ends with day!
Be Thou a bright and glorious light
In darksome hours of pain;
With beams divine, O Saviour shine,
In hours when joy shall reign.
O Saviour, ere our steps depart
From this Thy service best,
May grace be poured in every heart,
That peaceful be our rest;
May thought and word by angel heard
Be stainless, pure and true,
That by thoud's hours and manhood's powers
Be crowned with courage new.

THE ALMIGHTINESS OF THE ALMIGHTY.

BY R. W. LOWRIE.

There can not be an act of creation without a creating Cause. Call it what you may, it is the Creator. We call this Creator, this first Cause, this Cause of causes, God, tho' had we said Dieu, or Deus, or Theos, it were all the same. God thus is; he exists essentially; nor could He have been the creator of this creation had he not been omnipotent. He has formed all out of nothing. He must have existed before what he formed, or he could not have created it; He thus had about Him nothing out of which to create; hence, He created all out of nought. Only Omnipotence could do this.

Admit the existence of a Creator, and that which thus follows from it—the almightiness of the Almighty—and you have admitted all, everything that the reasonable Christian can claim.

If the Almighty be almighty, there is no limit to Him. He is infinite. He has unlimited power, and therefore may do what He will; unlimited wisdom, and hence can make no mistake. He never blunders and then patches things up. He had no need: at all power, all time and all wisdom were (and are) at His august disposal.

When, then, we complain of evil, reflect that evil had to be, or it had never been. God would have done without it, had it been possible to an Almighty Being to have made the world otherwise than He has. Evil is only absence of good, as darkness is nothing positive, but only absence of light. An Almighty Being could make the world only in one way—the best way. He has made it; hence all is for the best. And so, with other matters about which many are troubled. We cannot see them as they are. Many things are largely as they appear to us. We see through a glass, darkly. We do not yet see face to face. The best that you and I can get of very many things is a view, often only a "birdseye view"; at the best generally a stereoscopic view. Hence, "views" are dangerous; hence, the Church has none. She is afraid of bits and patches; and is not willing to let these go as the whole canvas, or panorama. How little of a battle can any one private soldier see, and how little we trusted these eloquent Ciceros who gave us our first accounts of Bull Run and Manassas—at least how little we trusted them after we learned and realized that a battlefield was larger than a retinae. Well, so in these other matters. As there is nothing so unlike a battle as a review, so often is there nothing so unlike the full truth as our poor, ignorant views and opinions of it. With religious truths all this is the more so, since they are the most difficult to comprehend and apprehend.

But once admit, my dear friends, the simple fact of a Creator, and that which follows from it—that He is necessarily almighty—and you admit all. From this simple confession may be derived all the comfort you require, and on it may be built that dogmatic system which, laying aside all technical difficulties, your soul longs for, in common with the souls of many of your naturally religious temperament.

You say—only this—nothing more? I reply, Reason out in your own mind the comforting inferences which run in the train of the one fact, that our God is almighty. If He is (and He must be, in order to be) then He is love. Every attribute which He possesses is without limit. He cannot love unjustly. He cannot be unlovingly just. He can (and does) hate sin, yet endure the sinner. He cannot, for His truth is an element of His almightiness. Like the king in English law fiction, He can do no wrong; yet He is monarch of monarchs, and does right after an almighty fashion, on a plane of infinitude, and with all eternity as His work-day. We do not see all this, for we catch in the camera of thought only, at best, a stereoscopic view of the mighty and ever-moving scene.

Were it possible to confer them on any person, that person, having time enough and means enough, could move the Rockies into the Pacific. So I would define "omnipotence" to be simply means and time, each unlimited. These God possesses. Can such a Being, then—one so clothed with the essential conditions, or rather, as the Germans like to call Him, "the unconditioned"—can He err, cause evil unnecessarily, allow injustice to prosper for a time and merit to suffer till He shall say thus far and no farther? Death is necessary, or things had been arranged without it. Pain must be, or He would not have allowed it. Even sin had to be, or it had never been in this best plan—a plan which could not have been otherwise, or an Almighty Power would have had it so.

Excuse rambling, and possibly repetition. Excuse a public use, too, which I intend to make of a part of this letter to you. And if the editor will allow, perhaps you may see copies of other letters to you all, now and then, in print. Others may be comforted with the comfort wherewith you say you are comforted by some of these my hasty lines.

Grant, my friend, Deus est, and to this add omnipotens, and you grant all I want you to. Can perfection work imperfectly? Can an almighty person ever fall below His best? Is anything but His best possible to Him? Ask yourself these questions. And write me, as usual, when you please.

NUMBERS iv: 24-27.

BY F. V.

Through the hushed chambers of our listening hearts

Steals from afar a voice we know so well—
A loving Saviour's voice sweet peace imparts;
And like the melody of some cathedral bell,
In benediction falls.

The Lord bless thee with His love;

The Lord keep thee by His grace;

And grant thee, in the darkest hour,
Light from the shining of His face.

When the storms of life shall lower,

May His sweet presence give thee strength;

Then when at rest on His almighty power
You learn to trust Him perfectly at length,
God grant His peace.

MICHAEL FARADAY.

BY E. M. B.

All the world has heard of the great scientist—of his untiring investigations, his wonderful discoveries; how his whole life was devoted to science, and how glorious that life was from its beginning to its close. How few have heard of his great devotion to his God and his Church. In daily contact with the most eminent philosophers of his day, many of whom were materialists and many more unbelievers, still his faith, like the "house upon the rock," remained firm and unshaken. The son of a poor blacksmith, and obliged at thirteen years of age to earn his own living, yet through all the changes of an ever-expanding mental growth and an ever-widening fame, the influence of the teachings of that humble home in which he was taught the fear of God never left him. Brought up a Sandemanian, a sect both exclusive and seclusive, obliged to conform to restrictions, which to a man of his broad culture must have been at times irksome, he remained loyal to the Church of his fathers. He was never aggressive. We have no information that he ever tried to infuse a more liberal spirit into the Church, of which he was a devout member, elder, and teacher. It has been said of him that his reverence for God's Word was so great that he never wrote or allowed a quotation to pass his lips unless convinced of the sympathy of the person with whom he was holding intercourse.

His great kindness of disposition manifested itself in a variety of ways. In his great consideration for others, his cheerful willingness to assist the most humble inquirer, and in his great love for children, for whom he prepared a series of short lectures on chemistry, and was as happy and enthusiastic while delivering them as the children for whom they were intended. It is also told that a little boy of his acquaintance used to give lectures, and Faraday liked to join the family audience, and would listen attentively and applaud heartily. He retained this love for and interest in children to the very last. His great love of truth was the foundation upon which his magnificent character was built. A character so grand yet so simple; so noble yet so gentle; so profound yet so childlike in its faith; making the most searching investigations into nature, yet bowing with meekness and humility before nature's God, always trusting, never doubting, and at the last waiting patiently and fearlessly for the great change.

At the close of his life this very great man said: "I can not think that death has to the Christian anything in it that should make it other than a constant thought; out of the view of death comes the view of life beyond the grave; as out of the view of sin comes the glorious hope. My worldly faculties are slipping away day by day. Happy is it for all of us that the true good lies not in them." His release came quietly, almost imperceptibly; and, as his biographer says, "There was a philosopher less on earth, and a saint more in heaven."

WIKKEY—A SCRAP.

CHAPTER I.

Mr. Ruskin has it that we are all kings and queens, possessing realms and treasures. However this may be, it is certain that there are souls born to reign over the hearts of their fellows, kings walking about the world in broad-cloth and fustian, shooting-jackets, ulsters, and what not—awaying hearts at will, though it may be all unconscious of their power; and only the existence of some such psychological fact as this will account for the incident which I am about to relate.

Lawrence Granby was, beyond all doubt, one of these royal ones, his kingdom being co-extensive with the circle of his acquaintance—not that he was in the least aware of the power he exercised over all who came in contact with him, as he usually attributed the fact that he "got on" with people "like a house on fire" to the good qualities possessed by "other fellows." Even the comforts by which he was surrounded in his lodging by his landlady and former nurse, Mrs. Evans, he considered as the result of the dame's innate geniality, though the opinion entertained of her by her underlings and by those who met her in the way of business was scarcely as favorable. He was a handsome fellow too, this Lawrence, six feet three, with a curly brown head and the frankest blue eyes that ever looked pityingly, almost wonderingly, on the small and weak things of the earth. And the boy, Wikkey Whiston, was a crossing-sweeper. I am sorry for this, for I fancy people are becoming a little tired of the race, in story-books at least, but as he was a crossing-sweeper it cannot be helped. It would not mend matters much to invest him with some other profession, especially as it was while sitting, broom in hand, under the lamp-post at one end of his crossing that he first saw Lawrence Granby, and if he had never seen Lawrence Granby I should not be writing about him at all.

It was a winter's morning in 1860, bright as it is possible for such a morning to be in London, but piercingly cold, and Wikkey had brushed and re-brushed the pathway—which scarcely needed it, the east wind having already done half the work—just to put some feeling of warmth into his thin frame before seating himself in his usual place beneath the lamp-post. There were a good many passers-by for it was the time of day at which clerks and business men are on the way to their early occupation, and the boy scanned each face in the fashion that had become habitual to him in his life-long look out for coppers. Presently he saw approaching a peculiarly tall figure, and looked at it curiously, tracing its height upward from his own stunted point of view till he encountered the cheery glance of Lawrence Granby. Wikkey was strangely fascinated by the blue eyes looking down so far above him, and scarcely knowing what he did, he rose and went shambling on alongside of the young man, his eyes riveted on his face, Lawrence, however, being almost unconscious of the boy's presence till his attention was drawn to him by the friend with whom he was walking, who said, laughing and pointing to Wikkey, "Friend of yours, eh? Seems to know you." Then he looked down again and met the curious, intent stare fixed upon him.

"Well, small boy! I hope you'll know me again," he said.

To which Wikkey promptly returned, in the shrill, aggressively aggrieved voice of the London Arab: "I reckon it don't do you no harm, granver; a cat may look at a king."

Lawrence laughed, and threw him a copper, saying, "You are a cheeky little fellow," and went on his way.

Wikkey stood looking after him, and then picked up the penny, holding it between his cold hands, as though it possessed some warming properties, and muttering, "It seems fur to warm a chap to look at him," and then he sat down once more, still pondering over the apparition that had so fascinated him. Oddly enough, the imputation of cheekiness rankled in his mind in a most unusual fashion—not that Wikkey entertained the faintest objection to "cheek" in the abstract, and there were occasions on which any backwardness in its use would betray a certain meanness of spirit; for instance, to the natural enemy of the race—the Bobby—it was only right to exhibit as much of the article as was compatible with safety. Indeed, the inventor of a fresh sarcasm, biting in its nature, yet artfully shrouded in language which might be safely addressed to an arm of the law was considered by his fellows in the light of a public benefactor. The errand-boy also, who, because he carried a parcel or basket and happened to wear shoes, felt himself at liberty to cast obloquy on those whose profession was of a more desultory nature, and whose clothing was scantier—he must be held in check and his pride lowered by sarcasms yet more biting and far less veiled. These things were right and proper, but Wikkey felt uncomfortable under an imputation of "cheekiness" from the "big chap" who had so taken his fancy, and wondered at his own feeling. That evening, as Lawrence walked briskly homeward, after his day's work, he became aware of the pale, wizen face again looking up into his through the dusk, and of a shrill voice at his side.

"I say granver, you hadn't no call fur to call me cheeky; I didn't mean no cheek, only I likes the look of yer; it seems fur to warm a chap."

Lawrence stopped this time, and looked curiously at the boy, at the old, keen eyes gazing at him so hungrily.

"You are a strange lad if you are not a cheeky one," he said. "Why do you like the look of me?"

"I dunno," said Wikkey, and then he repeated his formula, "It seems to warm a chap."

"You must be preelous cold if that will do it, poor little lad. What's your name?"

"Wikkey."

"Wikkey? Is that all?"

"No, I've another name about me somewhere, but I can't just mind of it. They allus calls me Wikkey."

"Poor lad!" Lawrence said again, looking at the thin skeleton frame, sadly visible through the tattered clothing. "Poor little chap! it's sharp weather for such a mite as you. There! get something to warm you." And feeling in his pocket he drew out half-a-crown, which he slipped into Wikkey's hand, and then turned and walked away. Wikkey stood looking after him with two big tears rolling down his dirty face; it was so long since any one had called him a poor little chap, and he repeated the words over and over as he threaded his way in the darkness to the dreary lodging usually called "Skimmedges," and kept by a grim woman of that name.

"It seems fur to warm a chap," he said again, as he crept under the wretched blanket which Mrs. Skimmedge designated and charged for as a bed.

From that day forward Wikkey was possessed by one idea—that of watching for the approach of the "big chap," following his steps along the crossing, and then, if possible, getting a word or look on which to live until the next blissful moment should arrive. Nor was he often disappointed, for Lawrence having recently obtained employment in a certain government office, and Wikkey's crossing happening to lie on the shortest way from his own abode to the scene of his daily labor, he seldom varied his route, and truth to say, the strange little figure, always watching so eagerly for his appearance, began to have an attraction for him. He wondered what the boy meant by it, and at first, naturally connected the idea of coppers with Wikkey's devotion; but he soon came to see that it went deeper than that, for with a curious instinct of delicacy which the lad would probably have been quite unable to explain to himself, he would sometimes hang back as Lawrence reached the pavement, and nod his funny "Good night, guvner," from midway on his crossing, in a way that precluded any suspicion of mercenary motives.

But at last there came a season of desolation very nearly verging on despair. Day after day for a week—ten days—a fortnight—did Wikkey watch in vain for his hero. Poor lad, he could not know that Lawrence had been suddenly summoned to the country and had arranged for a substitute to take his duty for a fortnight; and the terrible thought haunted the child that the big chap had changed his route, perhaps even out of dislike to his—Wikkey's—attentions, and he should never see his face again. The idea was horrible—so horrible that as it became strengthened by each day's disappointment, and at last took possession of the boy's whole soul, it sapped away what little vitality there was in the small, fragile frame, leaving it an easy prey to the biting wind which caught his breath away as he crept shivering around the street corners, and to the frost which clutched the thinly-clad body. The cough, which Wikkey scarcely remembered ever being without, increased to such violence as to shake him from head to foot, and his breathing became hard and painful; yet still he clung to his crossing with the pertinacity of despair, scanning each figure that approached with eager, hungry eyes. He had laid out part of Lawrence's half-crown on a woollen muffler, which at first had seemed a marvel of comfort, but the keen north-easter soon found its way even through that, and the hot pies on which he expended the rest did not warm him for very long; there came a day, too, when he could only hold his pie between his frozen hands, dreamily wondering why he felt no wish to eat it, why the sight of it made him feel so sick. A dreadful day that was. Mechanically, Wikkey from time to time, swept his way slowly over the crossing, but the greater part of the time he spent sitting at the foot of the lamp-post at either end, coughing and shivering, and now and then dozing and starting up in terror lest the "big chap" should have passed by during his brief unconsciousness. Dusk came on and then lamp-light, and still Wikkey sat there. A policeman passing on his beat saw the haggard face and heard the choking cough. "You'd best be off home my lad," he said, pausing a moment; "you don't look fit to be out on a night like this;" and Wikkey taking the remark to be only another form of the oft-heard injunction to "move on," seized his broom and began sweeping as in an evil dream—then sank down exhausted on the other side. It was getting late, later than he usually stayed, but something seemed to warn him that this might be his last chance, and he remained crouching there, almost too-far gone to be conscious of the cold, till on a sudden there came, piercing through the dull mist of returning consciousness, a voice saying:

"Hullo, Wikkey! you are late to-night."

And starting upward with wild startled eyes the boy saw Lawrence Granby. He staggered to his feet and gasped out:

"You've come, have you? I've been a watching and a waiting of you, and I thought as you'd never come again."

Then the cough seized him, shaking him till he could only cling to the lamp-post for support till it was over, and then slip down in a helpless heap on the pavement.

"Wikkey, poor little chap, how bad you are," said Lawrence, looking sadly down on the huddled-up figure; you oughtn't to be out. You—'you haven't been watching for me like this!"

"I've been a watching and a watching," Wikkey answered, in faint, hoarse tones, "and I thought you'd taken to another crossing and I'd never see you again."

"Poor little chap! poor little lad!" was all the young man could find to say, while there rose up in his heart an impulse which his common sense tried hard to suppress, but in vain. "Wikkey" he said at last, "you must come home with me;" and he took one of the claw-like hands in his warmly-gloved one, and walked on slowly out of compassion for the child's feeble limbs; even then, however, they soon gave way, and Wikkey once more slid down crying on the pavement, there was nothing for it but for Lawrence to gather up the child in his strong arms, and stride on, wondering whether after all it were not too late to revive the frozen-out life. For one blissful moment Wikkey felt himself held close and warm, and his head nestled against the woolly ulster, and then all was blank.

To say that Lawrence enjoyed his position would be going too far. Whatever might be Wikkey's mental peculiarities, his exterior differed in no way from that of the ordinary street Arab, and such close contact could not fail to be trying to a young man more than usually sensitive in matters of cleanliness; but Lawrence strode manfully on with his strange burden, choosing out the least frequented streets and earnestly hoping he might meet none of his acquaintances, till at last he reached his lodgings and admitted himself into a small well-lighted hall, where, after calling "Mrs. Evans," he stood under the lamp awaiting her arrival, not without considerable trepidation, and becoming each moment more painfully conscious how extraordinary his behavior must appear in her eyes.

"Mrs. Evans," he began, as the good lady emerged from her own domain on the ground floor. "Mrs. Evans, I have brought this boy"—then he paused, not knowing how to enter upon the needful explanation under the chilling influence of Mrs. Evans's severe and respectful silence.

"I dare say you are surprised," he went on at last in desperation; "but the poor child is terribly ill, dying, I think, and if you could do anything."

"Of course, Mr. Lawrence, you do as you think proper," Mrs. Evans returned, preserving her severest manner, though she eyed Wikkey with some curiosity; "only if you had mentioned when you engaged my rooms that you intended turning them into a refuge for vagabonds, it would have been more satisfactory to all parties."

"I know all that. I know it very inconsiderate of me, and I am very sorry; but you see the little fellow is so bad—he looks just like little Robin, nurse."

Mrs. Evans sniffed at the comparison, but the allusion to the child she had so fondly tended, as he sank into an early grave, was all its effect; together with the seldom revived appellation of "nurse," and her mollified manner encouraged Lawrence to continue.

"If you wouldn't mind getting a hot bath ready in the kitchen, I will manage without troubling you."

"I hope, Mr. Lawrence, that I know my place better than that," was the reply, and forthwith Mrs. Evans, who, beneath a somewhat stern exterior, possessed a really good heart, took Wikkey under her wing, administered warmth and restoratives, washed the grimy little form, crooned and scrubbed the matted locks, and so on the boy, dreamily conscious and wondrously happy, was lying before a blazing fire, clean and fair to look on, enveloped in one of Mrs. Evans's own night-dresses. Then the question arose, where was Wikkey to pass the night, followed by a whispered dialogue and emphatic "Nothing will be safe" from the lady of the house. All of which the boy perfectly understood, he remarked:

"I ain't a prig; I'll not take nothin'."

There was a touch of injured innocence in the tone; it was simply the statement of a fact which might easily have been otherwise, and the entire matter-of-factness of the assertion inspired Lawrence with a good deal of confidence, together with the cough which returned on the slightest movement, and would effectually prevent a noiseless evasion on the part of poor Wikkey. So once more he was lifted up in the strong arms and carried to a sofa in Lawrence's own room, where snugly tucked up in blankets, he soon fell asleep. His benefactor, after prolonged meditation in his arm-chair, likewise betook himself to rest, having decided that a doctor must be the first consideration on the following morning, and that the next step would be to consult Reg—Reg would be able to advise him; it was his business to understand about such matters.

A terrible fit of coughing proceeding from the sofa awoke Lawrence next morning, startling him into sudden recollection of the evening's adventure; and when the shutters were opened Wikkey looked so fearfully and exhausted in the pale gray light, that he made all speed to summon Mrs. Evans, and to go himself for the doctor. The examination of the patient did not last long, and at its conclusion the doctor muttered something about the "workhouse—as of course, Mr. Granby, you are not prepared!" The look of imploring agony which flashed from the large, wide-open eyes made Lawrence sign to the doctor to follow him into another room, but before leaving Wikkey he gave him an encouraging nod, saying:

"All right, Wikkey. I'll come back. Well," he said, as they entered the sitting-room, "what do you think of him?"

"Think? There's not much thinking in the matter; the boy is dying, Mr. Granby, and if you wish to remove him you had better do so at once."

"How long will it be?"

"A week or so I should say, or it might be sooner, though these cases sometimes linger longer than one expects. The mischief is of long standing, and this is the end."

Lawrence remained for some time lost in thought.

"Poor little chap!" he said at last, sadly. "Well, thank you, doctor. Good-morning."

"Do you wish any steps taken with regard to the workhouse, Mr. Granby?" asked the doctor, preparing to depart.

Wikkey's beseeching eyes rose up before Lawrence, and he stammered out hastily:

"No—no thank you; not just at present. I'll think about it," and the doctor took his leave, wondering whether it could be possible that Mr. Granby intended to keep the boy; he was not much used to such Quixotic proceedings.

Lawrence stood debating with himself. "Should he send Wikkey to the workhouse? What should he do with a boy dying in the house? How should he decide?" Certainly not by going back to meet those wistful eyes.

The decision must be made before seeing the boy again, or, as the soft-hearted fellow well knew, it would be all up with his common sense. Calling Mrs. Evans, therefore, he bade her tell Wikkey that he would come back presently; and then he said, timidly:

"Should you mind it very much, nurse, if I were to keep the boy here? The doctor says he is dying, so that it would not be for long, and I would take all the trouble I could off your hands. I have not made up my mind about it yet, but of course I could not decide upon anything without first consulting you."

The answer, though a little stiff, was more encouraging than might have been expected from the icy severity of Mrs. Evans's manner. (Was she also making her protest on the side of common sense against a lurking desire to keep Wikkey?)

"If it's your wish, Mr. Lawrence, I'm not the one to turn out a homeless boy. It's not quite what I'm accustomed to, but he seems a quiet lad enough—poor child!" the words came out in a softer tone; "and as you say, sir, it can't be for long."

Much relieved Lawrence sped away; it was still early, and there would be time to get this matter settled before he went down to the office if he looked sharp; and so sharp did he look that in little more than ten minutes he had cleared the mile which lay between his lodgings and that of his cousin Reginald Trevor, senior curate of St. Bridget's East, and had burst in just as the latter was sitting down to his breakfast after morning service. And then Lawrence told his story, his voice shaking a little as he spoke of Wikkey's strange devotion to himself, and of the weary watch which had no doubt helped on the disease which was killing him, and he wound up with—

"And now, Reg, what is a fellow to do? I suppose I'm a fool, but I can't send the little chap away!"

The curate's voice was a little husky too. "If that is folly, commend me to a fool," he said; and then, after some moments of silent thought—"I don't see why you should not keep the boy, Lawrence; you have no one to think of except yourself, unless, indeed, Mrs. Evans—"

"Oh, she's all right!" broke in his cousin; "I believe she has taken a fancy to Wikkey."

"Then I do not see why you should not take your own way in the matter, provided always that the boy's belongings do not stand in the way. You must consider that, Lawrence; you may be bringing a swarm about you, and Wikkey's relations may not prove as disinterested as myself."

"But that is just the beauty of it, he hasn't any belongings, for I asked him; beyond paying a shilling for a bed to some hag he calls Skimmidge, he seems to have no tie to any living creature."

"That being so," said Reginald, slowly; "and if you do not feel alarmed about your spouse, I don't see why you should not make the little soul happy, and"—he added with a smile—"get a blessing too, old fellow, though I doubt you will bring a sad time on yourself, Lawrence."

Lawrence gave a sort of self-pitying little shrug, but did not look daunted, and his cousin went on—

"Meanwhile, I think the hag ought to be made aware of your intentions; she will be looking out for her rent."

"Rather! I forgot all about that," exclaimed Lawrence, "and I haven't a minute to spare; I must race back to set the boy's mind at rest, and its close upon nine now. What's to be done?"

"Look here, I'll come back with you now, and if you can get me Mrs. Skimmidge's address I'll go and settle matters with her and glean any information I can about the boy; she may possibly be more communicative to me than to you. I know the sort, you see."

As Lawrence encountered Wikkey's penetrating gaze he felt glad that his mind was made up, and when the question came in a low, gasping voice, "I say, gunner, are you going to send me away?" he sat down on the end of the sofa and answered,

"No, Wikkey, you are going to stay with me."

"Always?"

Lawrence hesitated, not knowing quite what to say.

"Always is a long time off; we needn't think about that; you are going to stay with me now," and then, feeling some compensation necessary for the weakness of his conduct, he added very gravely, "that is, Wikkey, if you promise to be a good boy and to mind what I and Mrs. Evans say to you, and always to speak the truth."

"I'll be as good as ever I know how," said Wikkey, meekly; "and I reckon I shan't have much call to tell lies. Yes, I'll be good, gunner, if you let me stop, and again the black eyes were raised to his in dog-like appeal, and fixed on his face with such intensity that Lawrence felt almost embarrassed, and glad to escape after eliciting the "hag's" address and promising to return in the evening.

"I will look in this evening and tell you what I have done," Reginald said, as they went out together; "and also to get a peep at Wikkey, about whom I am not a little curious."

"Yes, do, Reg; I shall want some help, you know, for I suppose I've got a young heathen to deal with, and if he's going to die and all that, one must teach him something, and I'm sure I can't do it."

"He has got the first element of religion in him at any rate. He has learned to look up."

Lawrence reddened and gave a short laugh, saying—

"I'm not so sure of that;" and the two men went on their respective ways.

The "hag" began by taking up the offensive line, uttering dark threats as to "police" and "rascals as made off without paying what they owed." Then she assumed the defensive, "lone widows as has to get their living and must look sharp after their honest earnings;" and finally became pathetic over the "motherless boy" on whom she had apparently lavished an almost parental affection, but she could give no account of Wikkey's antecedents beyond the fact that his mother had died there some years since, the only trace remaining of her being an old Bible, which Mrs. Skimmidge made a great merit of not having sold when she had been forced to take what "bits of things" were left by the dead woman in payment of back rent, omitting to mention that no one had been anxious to purchase it. Yes, she would part with it to his reverence for the sum of two shillings, and Mr. Trevor, after settling with Mrs. Skimmidge, pocketed the Book, on the fly-leaf of which was the inscription—

"SARAH WILKINS,

From her Sunday-school Teacher.
Cranbury, 18—.

Wilkins! might that not account for Wikkey's odd name? Wilkins, Wilky, Wikkey; it did not seem unlikely.

That evening, Reginald, entering his cousin's sitting-room, found Lawrence leaning back in his arm-chair on one side of the fire, and on the other his strange little guest lying propped up on the sofa, which had been drawn up within reach of the glow.

"Well," he said, "so this is Wikkey; how are you getting on Wikkey?"

The black eyes scanned his face narrowly for a moment, and then a high weak voice said in a tone of great disapprobation—

"It wouldn't warm a chap much fur to look at him; he ain't much to look at anyhow," and Wikkey turned away his head and studied the cretonne pattern on his sofa as if there were nothing more to be said on the subject.

Evidently, the fair, almost fragile face which possessed such attraction for Lawrence in his strength had none for the weakly boy; possibly he had seen too many pale, delicate faces to care much about them. But Lawrence, unreasonably nettled, broke out body—

"Wikkey, you mustn't talk like that!" while the curate laughed and said—

"All right, Wikkey, stick to Mr. Granby; but I hope you and I will be good friends yet;" then drawing another chair up to the fire he began to talk to his cousin.

Presently the high voice spoke again—

"Why mustn't I, gunner?"

"Why mustn't you what?"

"Talk like that of him?" pointing to Reginald.

"Because it's not civil. Mr. Trevor is my friend, and I am very fond of him."

"Must I like everything as you like?"

"Yes, of course," said Lawrence, rather amused.

"Then I will, gunner—but it's a rum start."

He lay still after that, while the two men talked, but Reginald noted how the boy's eyes were scarcely ever moved from Lawrence's face. As he took leave of his cousin in the hall he said—

"You will do more for him just now than I could, Lawrence; you will have to take him in hand."

"But I haven't the faintest notion what to do, Reg. I shall have to come to you and get my lesson up. What am I to begin with?"

"Time will show; let it come naturally. Of course I will give you any help I can, but you will tackle him far better than I could. You have plenty to work upon, for if ever a boy loved with his whole heart and soul, that boy loves you."

"Loves one—yes; but that won't do, you know."

"It will do a great deal; a soul that loves something better than itself is not far off loving the Best. Good-night, old fellow."

Lawrence went back to Wikkey and leant his back against the mantelpiece, looking thoughtfully down at the boy.

"What did the other chap call you?" inquired Wikkey.

"Granby, do you mean?" Wikkey nodded.

"Lawrence Granby, that is my name. But, Wikkey, you must not call him 'chap'; you must call him Mr. Trevor."

"Oh, my eye! he's a swell, is he? I never call you nothink only gunner; I shall call you Lawrence; it's a big name like you, and a deal nicer nor gunner."

Lawrence gave a little laugh. Was it his duty to inculcate a proper respect for his betters into this boy? If he were going to live it might be, but when he thought how soon all earthly distinctions would be over for Wikkey, it seemed hardly worth while.

"Very well," he said. "By the by, Wikkey, have you recollected your own other name?"

"Yes, I've minded on it. It's Whiston."

"Do you remember your father and mother?"

"I don't remember no father. Mother, she died after I took to the crossing."

"Do you know what her name was before she married?"

Wikkey shook his head. "Don't know nothink," he said. Lawrence showed him the old Bible, but it awoke no recollections in the boy's mind; he only repeated, "I don't know nothink."

"Wikkey," said Lawrence again, after a silence, "what made you take a fancy to me?"

"I dunno. I liked the looks of yer the very first time as ever you came over, and after that I thought a deal of yer. I thought that if you was King of England, I'd have listed and gone for a soldier. I don't think much of queens myself, but I'd have fought for you, and welcome. And I thought as I wouldn't have had you see me cheat Jim of his coppers. I dunno why;" and a look of real perplexity came into Wikkey's face as the problem presented itself to his mind.

"Did you often cheat Jim?"

"Scores 'o times," answered the boy composedly. "We'd play pitch-and-toss, and then I'd palm a ha'penny, and Jim he'd never twig." A quick turn of the boy's wrist showed how dexterously the trick had been done, and Wikkey went off into a shrill cackle at the recollection of his triumphs. "He's the biggest flat as ever I came across. Why, I've seen him look up and down the gutter for them browns till I thought I'd have killed myself with trying not to laugh out."

The puckers in the thin face were so irresistibly comical that Lawrence found it hard to preserve his own gravity; however, he contrived to compose his features, and to say, with a touch of severity—

"I can tell why you wouldn't have liked me to see you; it was because you knew you were doing wrong." Wikkey's face expressed no comprehension. "It was wicked to cheat Jim, and you were a bad boy when you did it."

"My stars! why, he could have got 'em from me in a juffy; it was twice my size. I only boned 'em cos he was such a soft."

The explanation appeared perfectly satisfactory to Wikkey, but Lawrence, feeling that this was an opportunity that should not be lost, made a desperate effort, and began again—

"It was wicked all the same; and though I did not see you do it, there was Someone Who did—Someone Who sees everything you do. Have you ever heard of God, Wikkey?"

"Yes, I've heard on Him. I've heard the Natun times about. ('How used?' wondered Lawrence.) Where is he?"

"He is everywhere, though you cannot see Him, and He sees everything you do."

"Is he good?"

"Very good."

"As good as you?"

"A great deal better." Poor Lawrence felt very uncomfortable, not quite knowing how to place his instructions on a less familiar footing.

"I don't want no one better nor you; you're good enough for me," said Wikkey, very decidedly; and then Lawrence gave it up in despair, and mentally resolving that Reg must help him, he carried Wikkey off to bed.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

OF NO USE.

BY MRS. E. B. SANFORD.

"Make use of me, my God!
Let me not be forgot;
Let not Thy child be cast aside,
One whom Thou needest not!"

Little Jenny Briggs sang these words, perched up in the kitchen window, near her mother's ironing table. It was almost dusk, and Jenny was darning away very busily, hoping to have the last pair of stockings in the basket finished before daylight was quite gone.

The basket had been heaped with stockings of all sizes, from the father's big blue socks down to little Watty's holey red ones, as Jenny called them. Jenny liked to begin upon it when it was filled up so, for she had learned to darn very nicely, and was rather proud of her accomplishment. Besides, it was so nice to show mother each pair as she finished it, and hear her say:

"Well done, girlie!" or "You're a real help, Jenny; that you are!"

Jenny was singing on:

"Thou usest all Thy works;
The weakest things that be
Each has a service of its own,
For all things wait on Thee!"

"There now," interrupted the mother, "you must come down from the window and set the table, little woman! The clock has struck six, and father and Ben will be here directly."

"Never mind about that last pair now. See what it is to be so useful that you're wanted for two things at once!"

Jenny laughed as she stuck her needle into the cushion and sprang down from her seat. At the same moment a boy who had been sitting near raised himself on a pair of crutches, and came up to his mother's side.

"Can't I help, mother?"

Perhaps the mother was too busy to notice the plaintive tone of the question, for she answered rather hastily:

"Not now, Hugh; I've nothing for you to do. And stand aside, my dear; I'm in a great hurry to finish these things."

"We haven't any beef to shave to-night, Hugh," said Jenny, merrily, "and of course I can fly around and get tea better than you could!" And the child hustled about like a busy bee.

Hugh turned and hopped away on his crutches to the farthest window, and a few bitter tears coursed down his cheeks.

"It's all well enough for Jenny to sing that hymn!" he said to himself; "but there's never anything that I can do!"

"Here we are! Bless your dear hearts! How've you all got on to-day!"

At the sound of his father's step outside, Hugh had slipped into a back room. The rest all turned eagerly to greet him, as he entered, followed by Ben, a stout lad of fourteen.

Just as her husband came in Mrs. Briggs hung up her last piece, and set aside the irons to cool, saying, "There, it's done!"

"It's too much for you, though, I'm afraid, mother," said the father, with a half sigh;

"you have hard work enough to do for all of us, without taking in any."

"Never mind," was the cheery answer; "we must all help pull over this tight place. And besides, you don't know how much Mary and Jenny help me, now that they are out of school."

"Mother won't have to do it long, will she, father? Not if I get that place, at least," said Ben, "for then I can pay my own way. Harrah!"

"Ah, there comes my Mary! Been doing mother's errands, my girl? But where is Hugh?" asked the father, looking about.

"Hughie in 'e sink-room, wiping he eyes!" said little Watty.

"Wiping his eyes? What's the matter?"

"Not much, I guess," said the mother in a low voice, "or nothing new, I mean. He gets fretty and moping some days, and no wonder, I suppose, poor boy!"

Ben directly made an errand into the sink-room.

"Hallo, Hugh, here you are!" said he, cheerily. Hold on a minute till I wash my hands, and then let's have a look at those grape-vines, and see if they are going to live!"

"Now, then, I'll be one crutch, you know!" said he; and, passing his strong young arm around his brother, he helped him down into the yard.

"They're going to do first-rate!" Ben went on, examining the vines. "But I say, Hughie, what's up? Is the pain say that. Who gets on faster than you do in school, I want to know! And, didn't teacher tell you what lots of things you'd be able to do one of these days, if you got on well with your learning!

"And then you do help at home, I'm sure! Don't you amuse Watty, and keep him out of mischief? And clean the knives, and black the shoes, and what not? Of no use, indeed!

"Come, now, cheer up, like a brave chap! There's mother calling. Come in to supper, and by and by I want to tell you something!"

The Briggs family were in a tight place this Spring, in truth. They had had a good deal of sickness through the winter, and then the father had only half work for some weeks. But the children learned from their parents' example to look on the bright side, and work on cheerfully and hopefully, and they were a happy household still, in spite of their poverty. Even poor Hugh was generally patient and contented.

After supper Ben beckoned his brother aside.

"I say, Hughie, do you think you could ride in the wheelbarrow, out beyond the factory, to-morrow morning, and get back by yourself?"

"If you could, I'd take you when I go to work. We might start early, you know. And I've a famous plan for you! I was out wandering around at noon—it was so warm and pleasant, to-bad to-day?" Hugh shook his head.

"THOSE ARE GENEROUS BUNCHES FOR THAT PRICE."

"It isn't that," said he.

"What then? You'll tell me, I'm sure, old fellow!"

"Oh, Ben, it's only that all the rest of you can work, and help on; and I'm just good for nothing! I'm of no use, and I never can be!"

"Now, Hughie Briggs, you mustn't day—and I discovered such a prime lot of trailing arbutus. I don't believe anybody knows of it! Noic, Hugh!"

"Oh, Ben, do you mean for me to pick it and sell it—the way the Ryan girls did? Oh, Ben, do you think I could?"

"Of course you can, old fellow! I'll fix you up! There's that big shallow basket; it wants a strap to go over your shoulders, and there's your tray. And if I wheel you out there, maybe you won't get too tired; but we must ask mother—if you'll like to try, that is."

"Yes, yes, I want to!" assented Hugh, though he trembled with excitement at the idea of undertaking the sale.

His mother demurred a good deal. She feared Hugh was too feeble to attempt it, but the father whispered, "Let him try, mother; if he succeeds it'll do him good."

So bright and early the next morning the boys set forth.

Hugh enjoyed his wheelbarrow ride, and went into ecstasies over the arbutus, which was very large and sweet. Ben helped him pick until the clanging bell called him to his work, and then left him, saying heartily:

"Now see what a fine salesman you can make, and keep up a stout heart, dear old fellow."

Hugh picked all the arbutus within his reach which was opened and tied it up in large bunches, then hanging his basket around his neck he made his way slowly into the town.

As his home was in the outskirts, Hugh had but seldom gone through the busier streets, where now he meant to offer his flowers, and his heart beat fast as he took his stand on a sunny corner.

He held out a bunch timidly to one and another of the busy people who pressed by, but though some looked at him curiously, and others pityingly, no one seemed disposed to buy.

Hugh was growing disheartened. "Nobody wants 'em, they're like me," he said to himself; but remembering Ben's cheery counsel, he resolved to cross into the next street and try again.

As he was hopping along a young girl came tripping by, but stopped at the sight of Hugh's basket.

"Oh, how lovely! Are you selling this?" she asked. "How much a bunch?"

"Ten cents, miss," said Hugh, very shyly.

"Ten cents? Those are generous bunches for that price. I'll take one gladly."

Then noticing Hugh more closely, she asked kindly:

"Have you ever sold any before? Where did you find this?"

Hugh told her how his brother had taken him out in a wheelbarrow to get it, and the girl seemed greatly interested.

"But you have made your bunches too large," she said. "You might make three or four out of each of these. See here, Mr. Dillon will let you sit down in his shop, if I ask him. I'll show you how to make them up, and then I know where you can sell them. Come in here."

The shopkeeper smilingly gave the desired permission, and Miss Loulie tied up a few tasteful little bunches of the usual size to show Hugh how.

"There," said she, "I must run, or I shall be out too long. Do you know where the young ladies' school is—up on the hill? Well, when you have made up your bunches, just bring them up there and ring the bell, will you?"

Loulie bought a paper of candies at the counter, poured half of them into Hugh's basket and away she ran. And the boy, greatly cheered and comforted, finished his pretty work, and then followed her as she had hidden him.

Poor fellow! He almost wished he had not ventured as he hobbled up the broad walk, and timidly pulled the bell at the door of that imposing building.

"She told me to," thought he; "but what will they say to me?"

But Loulie was not a girl to do things by halves. She had sought out the principal, and coaxingly told him of her protege, and when Hugh's ring was heard the door was quickly opened, and Loulie herself smilingly bade him enter.

It was Saturday morning, and therefore the young ladies were not a little astonished to hear the triangle sounded long before dinner.

"What's the matter?" said one and another, as they gathered from their rooms to obey the summons.

"Miss Royee is calling the classes in an absent-minded fit, I suspect," said one merry girl.

But down they all flocked, and when they saw the pale-faced cripple standing in the hall with his basket, they took it all in at once.

"Oh, what beauties!"

"I must have a bunch!"

"And I!"

"Oh, dear! I've spent my last dime! You'll lend me one till Monday, won't you, Helen? that's a dear!"

And so, in a very few minutes, the bunches were all sold. Hugh's eyes shone with grateful happiness as he glanced shyly up at Miss Loulie.

"I'm much obliged to you all," he said, simply.

"And we are much obliged to you for bringing us the arbutus," said one gentle little girl, very kindly.

"Yes indeed!" exclaimed several. "We haven't had any so sweet as this."

Hugh was too happy to feel tired as his crutches tap tapped along the sidewalk on the way home.

"Mother, Jenny, oh, see!" he cried. "I've sold my flowers, and here's all this money—a dollar and a half! Oh, mother!"

"Mother" understood fully now, from the tone in which this was uttered, what had so troubled her boy.

She stroked his hair very lovingly, as she said:

"You're done bravely, sonny, and the money will be a great help. But Hugh, dear, if you shouldn't have another such chance for a long time you mustn't fret about it again, do you hear? Give up your lame feet and your willing hands, and a loving heart with them, to serve the Lord just as He wants you to, and He can 'make use of you.' Hughie, as Jenny's hymn says; and He will.

"Yes, and He will make you a help and a comfort to father and mother too. You are that now, dear, most days!"

"Only when I fret, mother," said Hugh, smiling through tears. "I'll try not to feel bad that way again," he added.

Not long after Jenny was heard singing again:

"Thou useth tree and flower,
The river, vast and small,
The eagle great, the little bird
That sings upon the wall!"

"Yes, and even poor good-for-nothing me," whispered Hugh to himself.

ART.

At Manves, near Tournon, a triptych by Vandjke has been discovered.

Stora's "Cleopatra" as a work of sculpture is highly praised. The figure is represented as reclining on a couch, the head resting on the right hand, the left hand holding the drapery on the lower portion of the body. The face is said to be marvellous in expression, the brow arched and the hair is in curly matted plaits. The couch is covered with a tiger's skin, the head appearing on the front.

Raphael's "Ardside Madonna" was probably sketched while he was still under his master Perugino, but when painted he had visited Florence. It is on a thick panel of white poplar, nine and a half feet high by five thick. The Virgin sits on a high narrow throne, holding the Child nude upon her knee. On the right is St. John Baptist, and on the left St. Nicholas of Bari in mitre and green cope. On the Virgin's left knee rests a book, kept open by two fingers of her left hand.

In these days everybody admires, and rightly, the Gainsborough portraits. In 1750 they were criticised as follows: "There is a fellow down here just now who has painted a considerable number of portraits. His heads look more like signboards than anything else, for he has no idea whatever of painting, though he has a certain knack of catching likenesses. His name is Gainsborough." One might suppose the writer was some amiable brother of the easel.

An alleged Raphael, valued at $50,000 and kept in a vault, is owned by a Mr. Kieffer in the West. It is ascribed to 1503, when Raphael was nineteen years old. It is called "The Virgin of the Brook," and is supposed to have been "conveyed" from the Vatican in 1850, but not by the present owner. Many certificates attest its origin; but certificates can be manufactured with as much facility as old masters. A good many Raphaels are found in these days, and there will soon be as many as there are pieces of the true Cross.

The dispersion of extensive art collections goes on, seemingly gaining in importance from season to season. The enthusiasm of the collector has grown into a mania. It is no longer the beautifying of a home by a lavish illustration of individual taste and culture. It is rather the transformation of a house into a lazar choked with an inconvenient plethora of all conceivable costly odds and ends of art, past and present. It is a frenzy of unreasoning accumulation. Commonly it is well shut in from the studios and interested, until some day an auctioneer's red flag lets out the secret, and lets in the public.

It is not hazardous to assume that in the number, magnitude, and costliness of collections made by individuals, destined to dispersion at the contingency of broken fortunes or decay, our country stands unique, far ahead of all precedent.

Only the other day the death of Mrs. Mary J. Morgan was announced, and shortly afterward it came to light that this estimable and accomplished lady had managed to invest nearly $2,000,000 in pictures, bric-a-brac, and costly orchids, which she gathered in a modest residence in East Twenty-sixth street. The particulars of this astonishing collection read like the dazzling prophecies of a fairy or orientalist. First, there was a conservatory, fringing on Madison avenue, stocked with perhaps the costliest private collection of orchids in existence; probably more than $300,000 are invested in this one family. Rarest plants of other species crowded other divisions of this extensive plant house. An accomplished connoisseur, familiar with the great collections here and elsewhere, said in substance, "I have never thoroughly examined Mrs. Morgan's collection, but I know that the treasures are amazing." The pictures are about 225 in number—indeed works of several of the most renowned artists, chiefly modern. Of course these could not be seen to advantage, as the main portion were hung in corridors, on stairways, under insufficient lights, and they are crowded as to be hardly intelligible. Only the fourth floor, which is filled with pictures, is favorable for observation and study. Among them is an exceptionally admirable Promentini.

To one dealer alone in this city Mrs. Morgan has paid more than $700,000 for pictures, and her purchases have by no means been confined to a single firm. The collection of silver-work and ware is quite unique in cost and extent. There is a pair of solid candlesticks, made by Tiffany, for which $40,000 were paid. The size, form, elaboration, and number of these objects is actually bewildering. A few years ago this lady submitted to the Tiffany a design—a group of Indians mounted on Mustangs, pursuing with lassos a herd of buffaloes. It is about three feet in height, wrought in solid silver.

There are modern and antique pieces in this collection, although the modern prevail. There is also a fine collection of enamels and ivory carvings of the most precious character.

A large number of articles of Welsh glass were noticed—from six to a dozen, which must have cost at least from $2,000 to $5,000 each.

Mrs. Morgan was also a collector of antique ornaments. Among them was a pair of Chinese green-shell lanterns of extraordinary quality, which M. Sichel of Paris once had for sale at $40,000 francs, and also a very beautiful small Chinese vase in peach bloom, most exquisite in quality and color, which cost fully $15,000.

Among the pictures are characteristic and exceptionally excellent examples of Alma Tadema's "Spring," Jules Breton's "Communicants," Theo. Rousseau, Diaz, Meissonier, Millet, Corot, Schreyer, Bouguereau, and Gérôme.

Among other names may be noted are Jules Dupré, Conrad, Detalle, Verboeckhoven, Henner, Van Marcke, Passini, Knaus, De La Croix, Daubigny, Troyon, Decamps, ("Walk to Emmaus,") Escouas, Meyer Von Bremen, Vibert, and scores of others of equal distinction.

The final distribution, by the auctioneer, of this marvelous gathering of aesthetic "goods" will be made in due season at the American Art Galleries, Broadway and Twenty-third street, under Mr. Kirby's direction, and a catalogue is promised of superlative interest to the annalist of modern and contemporary art.

Perhaps this periodical dispersion, disappearance, and reappearance of celebrated art work is not altogether deplorable, but it is a matter of grave concern that no thoroughly appointed public or municipal gallery stands in readiness to select the choicest things from such melancholy disarrangements.

The Churchman.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 8, 1885.

THE French Republic not only desires to separate the Church from the State, but it seems to have a malignant hatred against Christianity and its symbols. It is the heir to the bitterness of Voltaire. It recently secularized the Pantheon and made it the burial place of Victor Hugo, and it has now ordered the gilded cross that surmounts it to be taken down and replaced by the tricolor. But it must go further still if it would remove the vestiges of Christianity from an edifice whose very form suggests the cross, and the piety of the fathers thus testifies against the impiety of the sons.

A GOOD many persons would seem really to believe that the Church of England only goes back to the times of the Reformation, and that it was founded by Henry VIII. Doctors of Divinity, Heaven save the mark! sometimes affirm it. One might suppose that a lease belonging to the Church of England, which was given nine hundred years ago, and which has just now fallen in, would stagger such credulity. But no—neither facts nor reasons make any impression upon it, and it still goes on in sublime unconsciousness—with an obtuse ignorance that is stalwart.

THOSE who have lived a generation and more can easily recall the day when New England Congregationalism waked up to find itself Unitarian. There was, and especially around Boston, a stampede in that direction, Harvard College, with its orthodox endowments, leading the way. The trend would seem now to be in the same direction; but the defection is becoming more widespread. Says the Presbyterian Banner: "Andover, Yale, and the Pacific Theological Seminars join hands in departing from the scriptural and historical faith of Congregationalism." The polluted fountain necessarily sends forth a turbid stream, and where can the Congregationalists look for truth if not in their schools of the prophets, and if their teachers no longer "hold fast the form of sound words," where shall those who are taught find the deposit of faith?

It would be a shame if the reform movement in Rome should fail for the want of means to carry it on. Such men as the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of Manchester, etc., testify to its great importance. The movement is following the lines of the English Reformation, and only needs to be kept alive to, perhaps, become national. At a meeting recently held in St. James' Square, Dr. Nevin stated that five Sicilian priests had made application to Savarese to join him with their congregations. The Bishop of Minnesota declares that the one thing that had most touched him while in Rome was the spectacle of these men who had given up all for Christ. It goes without saying that these reformers who have conscientiously broken with the Papal Church, have everything to contend with in hostile influences proceeding from the Vatican. There is the less reason, therefore, why they should contend with poverty and debt, and the thousand pounds which Dr. Nevin said they would require to carry on the work the coming year ought to be easily and speedily forthcoming.

THE VALUE OF GREAT EXAMPLES.

Illustrious examples of greatness, magnanimity, and courage, are to be cherished for what they are in themselves, and still more for what they are by way of incentive and inspiration. The possession of these virtues is vouchsafed to few, and still less the opportunity to make the most of them. The majority of men, if not commonplace in themselves, must be content to do common things and in a very ordinary way. It is only now and then that a great example stands out so marked and conspicuous as to attract the gaze of a whole nation, and in a way to give it a certain character and shaping in noble aims and qualities.

Of such examples no country has had a greater number than England, and no nation has turned them to better account. The greatness of England really dates from the time of King Alfred, "whose virtue, like the virtue of Washington," in the words of Freeman, "consisted in no marvellous displays of superhuman genius, but in the simple straightforward discharge of the duty of the moment." This writer says of him again that he was "a saint without superstition, a warrior all whose wars were fought in defence of his country, a conqueror whose laurels were never stained by cruelty, a prince never cast down by adversity, never lifted up to insolence in the hour of triumph." The matter of sainthood excepted, it must be confessed that every sentence in the above truly characterizes that great commander whose body is now being committed to its final resting place. Now, the English nation owes everything to examples like that of Alfred; examples which have often enough been departed from, but which in one form or another have been cherished and honored in every way of which the English were capable. It has been a handing down of that immortality which some of the skeptics make so much of who have lost faith in futurity, and which has done so much to give greatness and perpetuity to the English nation.

Of those examples to which England, France and our own country owe so much, Freeman speaks especially of Alfred, Saint Louis and Washington. Saint Louis, he says, comes nearest to Alfred in the union of a more than monastic piety with the highest civil, military and domestic virtues. Washington, soldier, statesman and patriot as he was, and so like to Alfred in other respects, has no claim, Freeman thinks, to Alfred's two other characteristics of saint and scholar. There was in Washington, however, no absence of saintship or scholarship which essentially mars his fame or makes him to have been other than one of the noblest characters in history.

It is a priceless heritage that from time to time such great names are being added to. They keep up in some sort the ideal of noble and right living. They teach a nation to be generous and not selfish, magnanimous and not mean. They rebuke under the most trying circumstances cowardice and despair. They teach the great lessons of fortitude, humility and patience. They show by noble and heroic deeds that a nation should not be sacrificed, whoever is sacrificed to save it.

It is probable that Freeman would say of General Grant as of Washington, that though soldier, statesman, and patriot, he has no claim to Alfred's two other characteristics of saint and scholar. This may be true enough, and yet with all his saintship, the great English prince and law-giver did not, and could not better, show to the world how to die well. This of itself has consecrated General Grant's memory and has made his example to be a heritage forever. As for scholarship, it is neither recorded of Alfred or Saint Louis, or any other historic character, that he deliberately set himself to write a book when, as he knew, the shadows of the grave were slowly but surely gathering about him. Caesar—and what reflections are started up at the bare mention of the name of that heartless conqueror—writes his cold-blooded commentaries in the fullness of health. But General Grant, with nothing to be ashamed of as a warrior, and nothing, we may be sure, which the world will be ashamed of either, summons to the task his remaining and ever-failing strength. gives to the world his book—and dies. It is a story so touching and sublime in its simplicity, that the generations to come will fondly dwell upon it as one of the most remarkable things in history.

THE Testimony of Adversaries is thought to possess unusual cogency. It is a witness borne against natural bias or prejudice, and is, as it were, compelled by the force of truth. The principle was recognized as long ago as Moses, for he says: "Their rock is not as our Rock, our enemies themselves being judges." It is this thought that gives importance to words like these, coming from Mr. Spurgeon, an eminent dissenter. He says: "I am not so unjust as to conceal my belief that I see in the Episcopal Church at this time less of unbelief than among certain dissenters. In fact, nonconformity in certain quarters is eaten through and through with a covert Unitarianism less tolerable than Unitarianism itself." If we may credit some of the denominational papers, we need not cross the sea to find the same state of things.

WHOEVER is interested in the work of gathering up boys and girls and teaching them the various trades and industries whereby to get a living, should look into the way of doing things in the famous Bernardo Homes in England. Dr. Bernardo, who originally purposed being a missionary, has been carrying on this work for twenty years. At a meeting recently held on the occasion of the departure of one hundred and twenty-four boys for Canada, he said that the institution now embraced fourteen hundred children, and was growing rapidly. In the last four months a hundred boys and girls had been admitted each month. In 1886, when the institution would have attained its majority, he expected the homes would contain not less than two thousand boys and girls. Dr. Bernardo's plan is to fit each of the members of his great household for some employment, and to see that they are provided with situations. As he has had the largest experience, and has been the most successful in this kind of work of any man in England, his admirable system deserves the most careful study by any who are moved to a like work of charity.

FATHER HYACINTHE.

One can't read M. Rénan's "Recollections" without reason to feel the mission of Father Hyacinthe is the most important movement of the times (as an experiment and a test) with reference to the perpetuation of Christianity in France. The Bishop of Minnesota has lately said a good word for the "McCall Mission," and doubtless his loving heart has found something genuine about it to admire and to commend. But for one I must adhere to the opinion that, as Catholics, we must give our primary, perhaps our exclusive, sympathies and aid to catholic forms of reformation.

Such is not merely our true policy, it is our "bounden duty," and a most sacred one. If anything is manifest as a lesson of historical philosophy, it is this (as to the possibilities in France), viz.: That "Protestantism" is a thing of the past, and is impotent to awaken the mind of France again or to touch its conscience. Not less is it apparent that the triumph of Vaticanism over the remainder of Gallican catholicity has been not less fatal to the stinger than to the stung. The thing which Rénan supposes to be "catholicism" and "orthodoxy" is the thing which Gladstone has exposed as hopelessly at war with free constitutions, with learning, with intelligence, with schools, with laws, and, in short, with morals. France will not endure it; but, unfortunately, as France has been taught that this hateful thing is "Christianity" itself, the outcry of 1796 is once more growing frantic and formulating itself as the vox populi. "Down with Christianity!" "Crush the wretch!"

M. Loysen, in his late eloquent appeal to his countrymen in behalf of "the cross" which the government has removed from the Pantheon, made himself a spectacle to the Christian world, which, if it fails to inspire interest and to command respect, proves Christians themselves degenerate and deplorably insensible to duty. What a grand figure that isolated witness for truth presents to the reflecting Christian! Without any Christian support, he confronts popular fanaticism in behalf of a symbol of Christianity which is detested because it is popularly associated with a system from which he receives nothing but obloquy and cruel persecution. M. Loysen is an Antipap in Paris, a faithful witness to Christ and to Christianity, the Abdiel of Gallican orthodoxy. There he stands alone—look at him. He bears his testimony that there is an "orthodoxy" and that there is a "catholicity" of which France has not been permitted to hear which alone can save her from anarchy—an "orthodoxy" wholly consistent with humanity and its progress, a "catholicity" which is the inspiration of all that humanity requires for its emancipation from outward superstitions, and for its investiture with that freedom with which "truth makes us free."

I have little sympathy with the cant of those who invoke reactionary favors for French Romanism, because, forsooth, the atheistic republic is equally hostile to its truths and to its fables. Romanism has poisoned the whole loaf of dogma, and it is vain to protest that there is wheat in it as well as venom. Rome owes it all to herself that the faith of the Trinity is dismissed with the figment of "Infallibility," as part and parcel of the same "orthodoxy" which Rénan pronounces a "bar of iron"—one solid block that "shuts the gates of reason on mankind." Oh, is there nobody to expound to such a mind as his what is meant by "orthodoxy" and "catholicity," in all the writings of the Nicene Fathers, and in their apostolic and sub-apostolic forerunners! Yes, there is Dollinger; but France will not listen to a German. There, then, is Loysen—look at him! But Catholic England yields him no support, and "Catholics" in America are not less heartless and unsympathizing. In the name of the Cross, I ask, will nobody stand by him while he maintains that his position is demonstrated by the history of Anglican catholicity, alike in England and America, yielding as it does a firm and all-sufficient support to institutions the most free, the most enlightened, the most stable, and the most progressive which the world has ever seen? A. CLEVELAND COX.

THE BOOKS OF THE BIBLE.

Numbers.

The English title of this book is due to the Latin Numeri, a translation of the Septuagint Ἀριθμοί; in the Hebrew Bible it begins the thirty-fourth section of the Pentateuch, and is known from the first distinctive words as Bemidbar Sinai, "in the wilderness of Sinai"; also from its first word as Vayelaber, "and he spake." The Greek, Latin, and English names of the book are well chosen both on account of the double census of the people recorded in ch. i. iv., and ch. xxvi., and of the numerical details furnished in its pages. In the Hebrew Bible it consists of ten sections, viz., ch. i. l, iv. 21, viii. 1, xiii. 1, xvi. 1, xix. 1, xxii. 2, xxv. 10, xxx. 2, xxxiii. 1.

The contents of the book are chiefly historical, interspersed with legislative portions, and may be arranged as follows:

18. Further legislation concerning heireesses, arising out of the case mentioned in ch. xxxvii., ch. xxxvi. 1-12.

19. The conclusion, v. 13.

The book embraces the time from, "the first day of the second month of the second year after they were come out of Egypt," ch. i. 1, to the death of Aaron on the first day of the fifth month of the fortieth year, ch. xxviii. 38, that is, a period of thirty-eight years and three months (see Deut. ii. 14). The parting address of Moses was begun on the first day of the eleventh month of the fortieth year, or exactly six months after the death of Aaron. The incidents recorded in ch. xx.-xxxvi. belong, therefore, to those six months; the first month was spent at the foot of Mount Hor (see xx. 29), and, perhaps, in the encounter with the Canaanites, xxi. 1-3; in the second month the Israelites marched from Mount Hor to the brook Zered, a distance of two hundred and twenty miles; the defeat of the hosts of Sihon and Og may be referred to the first half of the third month. Two months more are an ample allowance for the incidents connected with Balaam's appearance in Moab. The remaining events may be easily adjusted to the space of six weeks. The statements in xxxi. 2, 8, agree with this arrangement.

It has been stated in the section on the Pentateuch* that "the genuineness and authenticity of these five books do not exclude the existence of prior documents which Moses may have found and used, nor its authoritative revision by Ezra, . . . "to whom are due, by general consent, certain parenthetical insertions, as well as the substitution of relatively modern language for more archaic forms." In the case of the Book of Numbers, moreover, it must be remembered that it covers the history of about forty years, and that many, perhaps all, the incidents recorded were penned at the time of their occurrence, and subsequently collected; how far the collection and arrangement of so many various memoranda is due to Moses, a contemporary scribe, or to Ezra, we have no means to determine; but these peculiarities are sufficient to account for the displacement of certain portions of the book, and for the difference in style and expression, which have been noticed in others.

The style and expression of a writer are not only influenced by the subject-matter he has in hand, but modified by time and occupation; his record of the dry details of a census would be different from that of a military operation, and the draught of a law from that of a liturgical composition; the literary character of a work written by him at one period of his life in comparative quiet would probably be very different from another composed in the hurry and bustle of engrossing activity. Applying these remarks to the case of the authorship of this book, it is difficult, perhaps impossible, to escape the conclusion that it is the work of Moses.

To illustrate: the parenthetic verse, ch. xii. 1, may have been added by a later hand,* but if Moses wrote it under the direction of the Divine Spirit (ch. xi. 17), as doubtless under the same influence he recorded his faults (ch. xix. 19 sqq.; Ex. iv. 22 sqq.; Deut. i. 37), the matter is sufficiently explained.

The introduction of three poetical citations,† taken apparently from the same source, "The Book of Wars of Jehovah," in ch. xxi. (vv. 14, 17, 27) does not in any way affect the Mosiac authorship of the Book of Numbers, for Moses expressly indicates their origin; had he suppressed it, there might have been room for doubt, but the explicit

vv. 14, 15:

"Valch in Suphah and the torrent-beds; Arnon and the slope of the torrent-beds Which turneth to where Ar dieth, And which leaseth upon the border of Moab."

vv. 17, 18:

"Spring up, O well! sing ye to it: Well which the princes dug. With the nobles of the people bored With the sceptre-of-office, with their staves."

vv. 27-30:

"Come ye to Heeshbon, Let the city of Sihon be built and established: For fire went out from Heeshbon, A flame out of the stronghold of Sihon Which devoured Ar of Moab. The lords of the high places of Arnon. We to thee, Moab! Thou art undone, O people of Chemosh: He (i. e., Chemosh, thy God) hath given up his sons as fugitives. And his daughters into captivity Unto Mo'abim. Then we cast them down; Heeshbon perished even unto Dibon. And we laid it waste unto Nophah, which (reacheth) unto Mo'abim."

authentication of these verses as the composition of others, increases the authenticity of his own work. The antiquity of the Song of the Well, and of the Martial Ode is as well established as that of the chapters concerning Balaam, and the fact that he was judiciously executed* by the victorious Israelites, explains the circumstantial fulness of the incident.

It is not improbable, on the other hand, that ch. xiii., xiv., xv. contain supplementary matter introduced by a contemporary of Joshua, and that the subject-matter in ch. xxxii. is either displaced or redundant (compare vv. 9-13 with xiv. 6-10, v. 30, and xxxii. 25-27 with vv. 31, 32). The exceptions taken against ch. xvi. have no weight, for the most that can be said is that the account is obscure.

An unbiased reader of this book can hardly fail to be impressed that he is perusing the work of Moses, the legislator, leader, and historian of the people during their long wanderings in the wilderness. Ch. xxxiii. 3 he reads: "And Moses wrote their goings out according to their journeys by the commandment of the Lord: and these are their journeys according to their goings out." The list is very accurate, and the brief notes added to certain localities show the annalist's design of connecting them with memorable historical events (see vv. 9, 14, 37 sqq.). The hand of Moses may be discerned in such a topographical statement as that "Arnon is the border of Moab, between Moab and the Amorites," ch. xxi. 13, in the designated territory of the two and a half tribes, ch. xxxii. 34, compared with Josh. xiii. 13, and in the account of the boundaries of the promised land, ch. xxxiv., for a later writer would have accommodated the details to the changes which subsequently took place. The statement that "Hebron was built seven years before Zoan in Egypt," ch. xiii. 22, clearly shows that the author was familiar with the history of Egypt. That familiarity is also manifest from the adoption of Egyptian customs, such as the rites of the purification of the Levites, ch. viii. 6 sqq., the trial of jealousy, ch. v. 11 sqq.; the ordinance of the red heifer, ch. xix. 3 sqq.

The legislative enactments interspersed with the narrative portions of this book are generally connected with the incidents to which they are due; they were recorded at the time of their occurrence. A subsequent chronicler would have adopted a more methodical and artificial arrangement. The law of the second Passover, ch. ix., for instance, was occasioned by the inquiry of Miahel and Elizaphan, who had contracted defilement by the burial of their cousins (Lev. x. 4); the law, "when a man dieth in a tent," ch. xiv. 14, must have been enacted while the people were in the desert; and the law, that heireesses must marry in their own tribe, ch. xxxv., was clearly occasioned by the enactment made on the suit of the daughters of Zelophehad, ch. xviii. 6 seq. Take such a passage as ch. xi. 5, 6, when the mixed multitude (or as Tyndale renders, "the rascal people")* clamored, "Who shall give us flesh meat? We remember the fish, which we did eat in Egypt freely; and the cucumbers, and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlic. But now our soul is dried away; there is nothing at all, beside this manna, before our eyes." Can any one of common sense believe that these words were put into the mouth of the people by a writer in Palestine, when the people were settled there, and had all these dainties in abundance? They are a genuine product of the wilderness and afford a lively picture of the temper of the people, and of the trials of Moses. The same applies to the religious solemnity with which Moses superintended the removal and resting of the Ark, ch. x. 35, 36, and to the minute regulations for the transport of the Tabernacle, ch. iii. iv.

* The Septuagintal rendering of ch. xxi. 8, states this very clearly: Kai tou Basileos Moabos Anthonos tou rhy tpanostatos stroy . . . en ty Balaam vly Being Anthonos ty joshaba. "And they executed the kings of Midian in addition to those who fell in battle . . . and they executed Balaam, the son of Beor, with the sword."

† In "The Romance of Setnan," translated by Brugsch, which belongs to the time of Ramses the Great, "Pishneferka takes a leaf of papyrus, and on it copies out every word of a certain magical formula. He then dissolves the writing in water, drinks the decoction, and knows, in consequence, all that it contained." Smith, "Pentat.," I., 397, 298, cited in the "Speaker's Commentary," ad loc.

The formulas of legal enactments, ch. iv.-vi., xv., xviii., xix., etc., carry the impress of genuine documents; and the remarkable intercessory prayer of Moses, ch. xiv., bears on its face indubitable evidence of being a true record of the very words of Moses, just as those words in their impassioned earnestness are a faithful transcript of the mingled emotions which agitated his soul.

The result of the foregoing considerations, drawn from only a small number of passages, which might be almost indefinitely multiplied, is unmistakable; it demonstrates that the bulk of the Book of Numbers was written in the wilderness at different intervals, the last chapters near the close of the fortieth year after the departure, and that Moses wrote it.

The instances named have been chosen to answer objections which skeptical writers are in the habit of advancing; they have been put in the form of exposition and positive statement, because they require neither apology nor special pleading. The burden of proof belongs to the objector.

The objections, however, are for the most part too whimsical and ridiculous to be seriously considered.† I may mention one as a specimen. The word "prophet" (Heb. nabhi) occurs several times in this book: in I. Sam. ix. 9 it is said: "He that is now called a Prophet was beforetime called a Seer"; I. Samuel being of later date than that claimed for the Book of Numbers, it is argued that the latter must have been composed at a time when the term "prophet" had displaced the word "seer."

The passage in Samuel is generally considered a marginal gloss inserted by a later writer in explanation of the word "seer" used in vv. 11, 18, 19 of that chapter. Now if that later writer meant to say that the word "prophet" was of recent origin, then he, like many of his successors, down to some of the very latest writers, labored under the delusion that assertion is fact, for the word "prophet" (nabhi) is much older than "seer" (roah), see Gen. xx. 7, Ex. vii. 1; it is, however, very probable that he did not mean to make such an assertion, but to say that the official designation of his contemporary, the seer, was formerly, that is, in the days anterior to Samuel, the prophet. Nor is this all; the Seventy translate the passage: "'The people called beforetime the prophet' 'the seer.'"* and must have read hagan (people) for hayim (this day, to-day, now). In other words, the prophetic office had ceased since the days of Deborah, that is, about a hundred and fifty years before the composition of I. Samuel, but was restored with Samuel, and perpetuated through the schools of the prophets. So old a writer as Clericus gives the facts concerning the word prophet in a nutshell: "This word was current in the days of Moses, obsolete under the Judges, and then again revived."† Half an hour's use of a Concordance and a Hebrew Bible disposes of this objection, which certainly does not exalt our opinion of the learning, sense, and penetration of those who make it. ENGLAND.

CONVOCACTION OF CANTERBURY.—In the Upper House on Friday, July 10th, an interesting report of the Committee on Divorce was presented and read by the Bishop of London. The substance of the report is as follows:

1. That "divorce and separation a thoro et mensa" is allowed by the Church of England (Canon 107) on the condition that the parties applying for such separation shall engage to live chastely and continently, and shall not, during each other's life, contract matrimony with any other person.

2. That sentence of divorce a vinculo matrimonii has never been pronounced by the courts of the Church of England, and that her canons are silent on the subject.

3. That, in regard of divorce a vinculo matrimonii in the case of adultery, the judgments of the early councils which have enacted canons on this subject have not been unanimous, some permitting the remarriage of the innocent party, though advising against it, and some prohibiting it.

4. That the judgment of the early Catholic Fathers has varied on this subject, some allowing the remarriage of the innocent party, and some prohibiting it.

5. That the judgment of learned members of the Church of England has not always been the same; in the Reformatio Legum it was recommended that divorce a thoro et mensa should be abolished, and that remarriage of the innocent party should be permitted in the case of adultery.

6. That the Council of Trent, whilst distinctly prohibiting the remarriage of the innocent party, yet pronounces its anathema not directly against those who permit such remarriage but against those who affirm that the Church of Rome errs in declaring it to be unlawful.

7. That the Greek Church recognizes divorce a vinculo matrimonii, and allows, but discourages, the remarriage of the innocent party.

8. That the testimony of Holy Scripture has been adduced on both sides, but it appears that the majority of expositors have held that our Lord's words (St. Matthew v. 32, xix. 9) are to be understood as permitting divorce a vinculo matrimonii in the one case of adultery. In regard of the question of remarriage, the teaching of Holy Scripture cannot be pronounced to be perfectly clear. It would however appear certain, that in the case of putting away for any cause other than adultery, neither party may marry again during the lifetime of the other; and at least highly probable that, in the case of adultery and divorce consequent thereon, the remarriage of the innocent party is not absolutely prohibited.

Having due regard to these considerations, we advise this House to make the following declaration:

1. That, in the case where the sin of adultery shall have been fully proved before a competent court, and a decree of divorce shall have been obtained, the innocent party, so set free ought to be advised not to remarry during the lifetime of the guilty party.

2. That if, however, the innocent party shall remarry, the charity of the Church requires that the ministrations of the Church should not be withheld from the person so remarried, or from the person with whom the marriage shall have been contracted.

3. That in the case of the remarriage of the guilty person, the ministrations of the Church ought not to be granted; saving, however, to the bishop the power after personal investigation to give such directions in any case of penitence as he shall consider most consonant with the teaching of Holy Scripture and the mind and practice of the primitive Church.

In the Lower House a resolution was adopted for the appointment of a committee to consider and report on the work of the Church in Wales, and on the spiritual needs of the Welsh-speaking people in England.

Convocation stands prorogued until August 6th.

THE ROMAN REFORM MOVEMENT.—A meet was held at the house of the Marquis of Bristol in London, on Thursday, July 9th, for the purpose of making known the position of the reform movement in Rome, and of obtaining aid for the work now being carried on by Monsignor Savarese and Count Henri di Campello. The Archbishop of Canterbury presided, and there was a large attendance.

Addresses were made by the archbishop, the Bishops of Carlisle and Winchester, the Rev. Dr. J. W. Nevin of the American church in Rome, the Rev. Dr. C. R. Hale of Baltimore, Mr. Boreford Hope and others. Dr. Nevin's address was particularly interesting. He said that the principles of the Old Catholics were the same as those of the Anglican Church. It was a mistake to regard Pope Leo as a liberal pope. His violence against Protestants had been greater, and his support of such fables as Loretto had been warmer than Pius IX.'s. His present strife with some of the higher ecclesiastics only meant that he was asserting his position as lord of the Church in accordance with the Vatican decree. Turning to the little band of reformers, he said that they consisted of Savarese, Campello, Cichetti, and a fourth, who subsisted on the pittance of £2 a month. There had been another, Paolo Panzani, who, if any man did, had died the death of a martyr. These clergy had revised their liturgy, and were about to bring out a revised version of the Yesper service; till that was done they used the Anglican Evensong in Italian. It was asked why had not the movement extended wider? One chief reason of this was the want of funds. Quite lately five Sicilian priests had made application to Savarese to join him with their congregations. The deputy of the place to which they belonged had vouched for the seriousness of their application; but they could not starve, and £3 or £4 per month for their support was not forthcoming. A similar application had been made by a priest and professor in the north of Italy. Another reason was that the whole force of the papacy was exerted against those few men, and not only of the papacy, but of unbelievers also. In Old Catholicism was the only hope of keeping alive Christianity in Italy, for Italians had rejected and could not be made to accept again the corrupt faith of Rome. The question was, could these men hold out for a little while? If they could, there was a great future before them. The Bishop of Minnesota, before he left Rome, said that one thing that had touched him most in Italy was the spectacle of these men who had given up all for Christ.

MR. SPURGEON AND THE MODERN NON CONFORMIST PULPIT.—Mr. Spurgeon, in the course of a recent sermon which attracted great attention, spoke very strongly with regard to modern thought and the modern pulpit. "The modern pulpit," he said, "has taught men to be infidels." In the course of his remarks he said, "Think not that I am aiming at the Church of England. With all my objection to a State Church, I am not so unjust as to conceal my belief that I see in the Episcopal Church at this time less of unbelief than among certain dissenters; in fact, Non-conformity in certain quarters is eaten through and through with a covert Unitarianism, less tolerable than Unitarianism itself. So frequently are the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel assailed that it becomes needless before you cross the threshold of many a chapel to ask the question, 'Shall I hear the Gospel here to-day, or shall I come out hardly knowing whether the Bible is inspired or not? Shall I not be made to doubt the atonement, the work of the Holy Ghost, the immortality of the soul, the punishment of the wicked, or the deity of Christ?'"

The Rev. William Lefroy, Canon of Liverpool, in preaching to his congregation subsequently, alluded to this avowal of Mr. Spurgeon. He said it was lamentable, coming as it did from Mr. Spurgeon, and perhaps the most lamentable part of it was its truth. They would all deplore it, but they might rest assured that the reason of this disastrous moral declension was political strife, exhausted energies, which in bygone years were concentrated upon religion. Mr. Spurgeon's deplorable avowal furnished another reason for the maintenance of the Church of England, with her articles and her homilies. With these she was God's organic institution in this land to resist Romanism on the one hand and unbelief upon the other.

DEATH OF THE REV. MR. MOSSMAN.—The Rev. Thomas Wymerly Mossman, rector of East Torrington and vicar of West Torrington, whose perversion to Rome was announced a few weeks ago, died on Sunday, June 28th. Mr. Mossman some years ago became prominent as an original member, if not the founder, of the Society for Corporate Reunion, and procuring consecration, it is said, on the high seas, from a bishop of one of the Oriental communions, he assumed the title of Bishop of Selby. He undertook to ordain a young man named Army Green to the priesthood, and for this was called to account by his bishop, the late Bishop Wordsworth. Mr. Mossman promised not to offend again, and the matter was passed over with, we believe, a private reprimand. Mr. Mossman made himself conspicuous last year by some letters addressed to the pope. He recently resigned the livings he had held since 1839, in order to enter the Church of Rome, but, as the legal formalities in connection with the relinquishment of his trust required several weeks for their completion, he really died a benefited clergyman of the establishment.

A NEW CONGREGATION FOR MR. GREEN.—On Saturday, July 11th, there was a gathering of the late communicants of St. John's church, Miles Platting. There were about two hundred and fifty present. It is stated that the late communicants are forming themselves into a St. John's Church Society, and that the Rev. Sidney F. Green has accepted the episcopacy. There are already about three hundred members.

IRELAND.

THE ROMISH BISHOPS AND THE CHURCH OF IRELAND.—The Dublin Evening Mail says: "The Roman Catholic bishops in this country, it seems, have suddenly discovered a new grievance and a standing insult. It would appear from the London correspondent of the Freeman's Journal, to whom we are indebted for the intelligence, that the prelates were at Rome when this sad state of affairs burst upon them. The remarkable part of the thing is, that while this intolerable wrong has been going on for eleven years, not a single protest was ever before made about it, a fact which, considering how eagerly even the ghosts of grievances have been hunted up, does not display much activity on the part of the hierarchy. To come to the point, however, this shocking insult to "the vast majority of the Irish nation" is nothing less than the assumption by the Protestant Episcopal Church in this country of the title bestowed upon it at the disestablishment—namely, Church of Ireland. This weighty matter has now been assigned by the bishops to the championship of Mr. Parnell, who will probably not be slow to bring it before Parliament. "We, the Bishops of Ireland" (says the resolution, which was forwarded from Rome by Dr. Carr, Bishop of Galway), "having learned that the question of the future official designation of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Ireland is now under the consideration of her Majesty's government, beg leave to represent to the Government that the assumption of the title 'The Church of Ireland' by the disestablished Church has hitherto given deep offence to our Catholic people, and that its official recognition would be justly regarded as a standing insult to the vast majority of the Irish nation." We should be glad to be informed where or when, upon any single occasion since the Act of Disestablishment was passed, have the Roman Catholic people of this country given the slightest indication of considering this title an insult to them, or that it offended them in the least. Surely, if such deep offence existed, opportunity would have been found for giving voice to it before now. It is certainly somewhat late in the day to take exception, and we think the bishops might have been much better employed than in hunting up an excuse for reviving sectarian strife."

The Evening Mail might have added that as the Church of Ireland, with a native episcopate, has borne her name since the days of St. Patrick, it is rather late for bishops of entirely foreign ordination to complain about it.

JAPAN.

DEATH OF THE ENGLISH BISHOP.—The Right Rev. Arthur William Poole, D.D., English Bishop of Japan, died at Shrewsbury, England, on Tuesday July 14th. Bishop Poole was ordained in 1876, and in 1877 was appointed missionary of the Church Missionary Society to Masulipatam, South India. His health failing him, he returned to England in 1880. In 1883 the attention of the Archbishop of Canterbury having been attracted by a speech Mr. Poole made at the annual meeting of the Church Missionary Society, he was nominated to the new bishopric to be established in Japan. He accepted with much misgiving as to his health, and was consecrated on St. Luke's Day, 1883. He immediately sailed for his place of work, and was cordially welcomed by both the American and English missionaries. After a few months his health again gave way, and he was obliged to spend the winter of 1884-5 in California. He returned to England a few weeks before his death.

MAINE.

BAR HARBOR.—St. Saviour's Church.—At St. Saviour's church, Bar Harbor, the number of worshippers obliges the rector to appoint services for the hours of 7:30 A.M. (early communion), 9:30 A.M. (Morning Prayer), 11 A.M. (full morning service), 5 P.M. (Evening Prayer), and 8 P.M. (full evening service), the result being, with the Sunday-school service, a series of six services a day, which are quite sufficient for one rector. The additions to this church, which will be made under the supervision of Messrs. Botch & Tilden, the Boston architects, will be begun in the coming fall, it is hoped. Dr. Robert Amory of Brookline, Mass., the treasurer of the Building Fund, reports finances as being in a condition to warrant speedy commencement of work.

SACO.—Trinity Church.—Quite extensive repairs are being made, in Trinity church, Saco. A new belfry is being erected, the church is to be shingled and painted, and the ceiling of the interior is to be newly plastered.

St. John's by the Sea, at Old Orchard, has been advancing toward completion. Owing to the efforts of visitors last year, money has been provided for finishing the chancel, robing-room, and organ-love, and for the purchase of a new altar made of ash. The chancel arch and sides are sheathed with ash, shelled, and oiled. The robing-room and organ-chamber are plastered and finished in ash. The chancel furniture is all made of ash. Only the finishing of nave and the procuring seats and carpets remain to make this chapel one of the prettiest churches on our sea-coast. The chapel was opened for the season on Sunday, July 12th. The Rev. William Hatch, from St. Joseph, Mo., officiated in the morning, and the Rev. Canon Norman of Montreal in the evening. About a hundred persons were in the congregation.—Northeast.

MASSACHUSETTS.

BROOKLINE.—St. Paul's Church.—This parish (the Rev. L. K. Storr, rector), is to rejoice in the possession of a new rectory. For the proposed edifice the lot has been purchased, plans procured and estimates made. It is to be built near the church, and is the gift of a generous friend of the parish. This parish numbers 300 communicants, and has enjoyed the wise and prudent oversight of the present rector for now some eight years.

RHODE ISLAND.

WICKFORD.—St. Paul's Church.—This church (the Rev. W. W. Ayres, rector) was reopened on Wednesday, July 29th, after having been repaired and put in as thorough order as its advanced age would permit. There were present, besides the bishop of the diocese and the rector of the parish, the Rev. Dr. Daniel Henshaw, and the Rev. Messrs. G. J. Magill, P. Durjee, and Daniel Goodwin, while the Rev. Dr. G. H. Greer, and the Rev. Messrs. H. Bassett and W. F. Tucker were in the congregation. The service was read by the bishop and clergy, and the sermon preached by the Rev. Daniel Goodwin, from Exodus xii. 26. After the sermon a brief address was made by the bishop, who said that he hoped that the suggestion that the church should in the future be preserved in as favorable a condition as possible be rightly taken by the congregation, and that their contributions to the fund to be set apart for the care of the building would be correspondingly large. The last time it was his pleasure to sit in the old church it was necessary, before the services could be held, to drive out the birds that had made it their habitation. At that time the old church cloths, or what remained of them, were hanging in dust-covered tatters, and certainly he never expected to see the building in its present chaste condition. The edifice certainly should be preserved, for it was the oldest church in the country, north of Virginia, used exclusively by the Episcopal denomination. There were older church buildings in Pennsylvania, but these had formerly been used by the Swedish Church.

After the services the clergy and laity were entertained at the chapel of the new church. St. Paul's stands on a short street or lane a few hundred feet from the main thoroughfare of the place, and is reached by a winding pathway. For years the church has been the subject of a tradition, told so many times in print, and by the family friends, that it has come to be set down as a part of the indisputable history of the town. Years ago, in 1800, the narrators of this legend have it, the old church was removed surreptitiously by some of the residents of Wickford, who, on a quiet night, by means of ox-teams, drew it from McSparran Hill to Wickford and located it there, to the utter discomfort of the people in the southern part of the town. For years this tradition was repeated and believed, but now the historian has stepped in and by the church records disproves the truth of the legend. It does not need the word of the historian to convince the intelligent that the tradition was made up of whole cloth. The size and form of the structure would forbid its removal in the manner as alleged.

Externally the church is in a very fair state of preservation. Unlike the religious edifices of the present day, the entrance is in the centre of the side, facing the lane. The building is painted a deep brown shade, and the scars caused by the blowing down of the steeple in 1805 have been obliterated by modern clapboards. Over the entrance is a small, black tablet, with the inscription in letters of gilt: "Built A.D. 1707. Removed A.D. 1800." Entering the double doorway, through which so many generations, long since crumbled to dust, have passed; through which the smiling, tear-bedimmed eyed bride, happy as a lark, has passed to begin the real duties of life; through which sorrowing hearts, heavily laden with grief and mourning for dear ones, have passed; through which solemn-voiced squires and prim matrons have passed—all gone, never to return—one finds himself in a square audience room, on three sides of which is a low gallery. Time has dealt gently with the interior of the building, far more so than mischievous boys and the reckless youth. Some of the old brass trimmings are gone, having been removed by the boys; but, as the door to the lower floor has been kept closed as much as possible, there is a singular and a pleasing absence of the usual jack-knife carvings with which the destructively-inclined are wont to leave evidences of their visits.

The pews were formerly all of the high-backed, box pattern, but those in the centre were removed several years ago, and sixteen slips built in their places. There now remain of the old box pews just fifteen, and these, with the slips, are painted in a pearl tint. Originally, too, the chancel was on the east side, and a small round pulpit, quite high and reached by a single flight of stairs, stood where the present one does. The chancel was removed early in the present century, and gave way to several box pews. The present pulpit is far from modern, yet there are a few of the oldest inhabitants who can remember when it was built. It is high, square, without a graceful line, as stern and stiff as the old Narragansett fathers who sat within its shadow. The wood is of pine, but an artist of long ago grained it in an impossible imitation of chestnut. The solid framework of the old pile is discerned every where, perfect in every way, seeming to defy the ravages of time.

The gallery, which is supported by six pillars, is reached by a stairway on the western exterior of the building. The floor is pitched, and gives one a feeling that without constant care one would be precipitated to the floor below. The old, unpainted benches still remain, and in the centre, facing the pulpit, is the space set apart for the singers. The building was formerly heated by two large stoves, burning wood, one of which was placed in the western gallery and the other in the centre of the lower floor. The place is lighted by two arched windows in the rear of the pulpit, one round window in the east gable, and by nineteen other windows.

ALBANY.

BLUE MOUNTAIN LAKE—Consecration of the Church of the Transfiguration.—On Sunday, July 19th, the bishop of the diocese consecrated this church (the Rev. S. N. Griswold in charge). There was an early celebration, preceded by the benediction of the new altar. At 10:30 the Consecration Service was held, the bishop being assisted by the Rev. Dr. Joseph Carey and the minister in charge. The church was filled with a large congregation from the various hotels, and during the service the bishop baptised the infant daughter of the proprietor of the Blue Mountain Lake House. The consecration sermon was preached by the bishop from Psalm cxxxii, 6.

The church is built of logs and lined with spruce boards; it will accommodate one hundred and fifty people. The builder was Mr. Wallace, of Luzerne, and the architect, Mr. M. N. Cutter, of New York. The church was erected mainly through the liberality of Mr. and Mrs. T. A. Gurney, of Germantown, Pa. Its cost was $1,500. The situation was chosen with a view to its being equally accessible to the three hotels.

In the afternoon the bishop proceeded to the Church of the Good Shepherd, Raquette Lake, where he held service and preached.

SARATOGA SPRINGS—Bethesda Church.—On Sunday, July 26th, this church (the Rev. Dr. Joseph Carey, rector.) was handsomely draped in mourning for General Grant. The congregation filled all the available space in the church, and great solemnity pervaded the assembly. It was noticed that nearly all the people were dressed in black.

The rector was assisted in the service by the Rev. Dr. G. H. McKnight and the Rev. Messrs. S. S. Searing and J. K. Mendenhall, and preached an appropriate sermon on the character of General Grant, taking as his text St. Matthew xx., 26-29.

NEW YORK.

NEW YORK—Acceptance of the Rev. Dr. W. S. Langford.—The following are the letters addressed to the Presiding Bishop and the special committee, in which the Rev. Dr. W. S. Langford accepts the office of General Secretary of the Board of Managers of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society:

BY REV. ALFRED LEE, D.D., LL.D., R. REV. SIR, MY DEAR BISHOP: I have the honor to inform you as President of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society that I have to-day communicated to the Board of Managers my acceptance of the position of General Secretary, to which they elected me on the 16th of June last.

In conveying this information to you I take the opportunity to crave from you and from your right reverend brethren in the episcopate the sanction of your and their fullest confidence and support in the earnest endeavors of the board to extend the interest in the missions of our Church. The Church cannot fulfil her duty or prove her power till all her members feel the force of the great commission and contribute systematically for missions both at home and abroad. It will fill the measure of my desire to bear a humble part in promoting that great end for the glory of God and the extension of His Church.

I remain, right reverend sir, with very great respect, your servant in the Church.

WM. S. LANGFORD.
Elizabeth, N. J., July 27th, 1885.

ELIZABETH, N. J., July 27th, 1885.
MY DEAR BRETHREN: I have carefully considered the subject of my election to be General Secretary of the Board of Managers, and have decided to accept the office. The Church has a right to claim the services of her clergy for positions where she judges they may be most useful, and personal considerations must yield to the call of duty. Nothing less than the imperative nature of the call could induce me to leave the most agreeable of parochial relations to enter upon this wider sphere of service and, I sincerely hope, of usefulness. The deep and strong interest which, as I am witness, is evinced by the members of the board in the progress of our missionary work is gratifying assurance of the hearty support which I may expect from them, and I trust it is the promise of an earnest purpose on the part of our brethren, the clergy and laity throughout the Church, to sustain and advance by every means in their power the great and good work of the Board of Managers.

In communicating my acceptance to the Board of Managers be kind enough to express my high sense of the honor they have done me in choosing me for an office of so great responsibility.

I remain, dear brethren, with grateful appreciation of your courtesy, faithfully yours,
W. S. LANGFORD.

REV. W. R. HUNTINGTON, D.D., } Special
LEWEL COFFIN, Esq. } Committee.

NEW YORK—St. Thomas's Church.—This parish, (the Rev. Dr. W. F. Morgan, rector,) according to its old custom, but seldom violated, maintains its fall services through the summer, except that in August the Evening Prayer on Sunday is omitted. The summer congregations would fill a church of moderate size, showing that, in the absence of parishioners from the city, strangers appreciate the privileges offered them.

St. Thomas's House, on East Fifty-ninth street, near Second Avenue, is the scene of much beneficial work among the sick and poor during the summer. Among other activities, it is the rendezvous of large parties of children and infants with their mothers, who, to the number of many hundreds, are sent off to the mountains and the sea for periods extending from a week to a fortnight. One large party of boys, under the charge of the German assistant-minister, has just returned from the Catskills. These children are collected by careful house-to-house visitation by the parish visitor. Both the church and the mission buildings are open every day to the public, except when undergoing repairs.

LONG ISLAND.

BROOKLYN—St. John's Church.—On Sunday, July 26th, services were held by the rector (the Rev. T. S. Pycott) for the last time, previous to the beginning of alterations and extensive enlargement of the house of worship. Ground has since been broken for this improvement. The plans propose an entire change in the building. It is now a simple chapel, extending from south to north. This will form the transept of the new church, and a nave, forty-three feet in width by fifty-five feet in length, will extend from east to west, and on the western extremity of the edifice, next to the rectory, a fine chancel will be constructed. The church will have an entrance at the southeast angle in addition to the present entrance. The windows will be set with stained glass, and cut stone similar to that of which the present walls are formed will be used in the new portion. The chancel, choir, and robing-rooms will be a large addition on the western end.

These improvements will about double the capacity of the building, and the effect will be to convert it into a substantial, large, and beautiful church. St. John's is the second church in the age of its organization in the city and county. This enlargement has been greatly needed to give it scope and chance for growth and activity. The present rector has been seven years in charge of the parish. The location is in the midst of a section of the city growing more rapidly than any other, and attracting a very desirable population by its proximity to Prospect Park and its otherwise attractive location.

BROOKLYN—Christ Church.—This parish, (the Rev. Dr. L. W. Bancroft, rector,) which celebrated its half-centenary last spring, is having its church building refitted. The interior is in process of redecoration, at a cost of $12,000. The rector is now in Europe, but is expected to return soon, when he will bring with him a stained glass window, that has been especially made for the church by Holiday of London. It cost $2,500.

BROOKLYN—Death of the Rev. Dr. Cornell.—The Rev. Dr. T. F. Cornell, rector of St. Stephen's church, died at his residence on Friday, July 31st. Dr. Cornell came to Brooklyn in 1859, when he was connected with St. Mark's church. In 1869 he became rector of the Church of the Mediator, and in 1873 became rector of St. Stephen's church. Dr. Cornell was born in 1830, was graduated at the New York University, and the College of Physicians and Surgeons, and subsequently from the General Theological Seminary.

ASTORIA—Church of the Redeemer.—A beautiful window has been placed in the nave of this church (the Rev. Dr. E. D. Cooper, rector,) by the present and former officers of the church, as a memorial to the late Edward W. Hewitt, for sometime warden of the parish and member of the vestry, and treasurer of the church from its organization to the day of his death.

It is a worthy tribute to their late associate, beautiful in design and exquisite in its workmanship. It was made in Munich, under the direction of Messrs. Spence & Son's of Montreal.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

BUFFALO—Death of the Rev. J. M. Henderson.—The Rev. J. M. Henderson, for twenty-five years rector of the Church of the Ascension, died on Saturday, August 1st, on his fifty-first birthday. Mr. Henderson was born in Springfield, N. J., in 1834. He was ordained in New Jersey, and served for a brief space as assistant in Christ church, Elizabeth, N. J., from which post he was chosen to the rectorship of the Church of the Ascension, Buffalo, in 1861. He was at his death, and had been for some years, president of the Standing Committee of the diocese.

NEW JERSEY.

BORDENTOWN—Death of the Rev. Mr. Pettit.—The Rev. N. Pettit, the rector of Christ church, who was also senior presbyter of the diocese and president of the Standing Committee, died on Monday, July 27th, in the rectory of Christ church, which had been his home for more than sixteen years.

The funeral took place in the church at noon on the following Thursday, and his body was laid at rest in the adjoining churchyard, the bishop, thirty presbyters, a vested choir, and a great congregation of sorrowful parishioners participating in the services. Mr. Pettit enjoyed in an unusual degree the deep respect and tender affection of his clerical brethren, and many of them gave touching expressions of love and sorrow when assembled after the funeral. A brief minute was adopted for publication, and a memorial service appointed for a day in the Octave of All Saints', when, at the united request of the vestry and the clergy, the Rev. Dr. G. M. Hills, dean of the convocation, will deliver an appropriate discourse.

NORTHERN NEW JERSEY.

BLOOMFIELD—Christ Church.—On the Eighth Sunday after Trinity, July 26th, in this church, (the Rev. W. G. Farrington, D. D., rector,) the bishop of the diocese admitted Mr. Henry Kiersted Bicker to the restricted diaconate. Mr. Bicker will serve in the parish as assistant to the rector.

PENNSYLVANIA.

PHILADELPHIA—Points in the New Convocational System.—At a late meeting of the North-West Convocation the president, the Rev. D. S. Miller, D. D., called attention to two points in the working of the new convocational system.

First, That all missionary gifts for the work in this diocese from the members of parishes for the present year would be included in the apportionment.

Second, That the clergy and lay-delegates to this body from each parish would form a standing committee having in hand the raising of the sum expected from each parish.

And also presented the following schedule of the amounts hoped for as the result of careful inquiry and investigation:

St. James', $300; Epiphany and chapel, $250; St. Matthias', $200; St. Clement's, $300; St. James the Less, $150; Atonement, $100; Covenant, $100; St. Matthew's, $100; Redemption, $75; Beloved Disciple, $50; St. George's, $50; St. Chrysostom's, $25; extra parochial, $10.

PHILADELPHIA—St. Timothy's Church, Roxborough.—On Tuesday, July 14th, ground was broken for very considerable improvements to this church, (the Rev. R. E. Dennison, rector.) This church, with its 340 communicants and but 310 sittings, has long been too small for its congregation. It is open from sunrise to sunset, when any one may enter and pass through all the buildings, without ever meeting one on the watch.

The improvements will be both of church and parish building. It is intended to remove the western wall of the church, and extend the nave 41 feet; the aisles will be also extended 30 feet. A low tower or stone lantern, 23 feet square, raised on four granite columns, carrying heavy iron beams, will be built to break the lines of the building, which, without the chancel, will be 109 feet long. Instead of the window at the western end of the church there will be six windows in the lantern, by which more light and better ventilation will be secured. By this 212 more sittings will be gained. An addition 61 feet long and 28 feet wide will be made to the present parish building, which, though very complete, is much too small for the needs of the parish work. In the addition there will be clergy and choir-rooms, Bible class and infant school-rooms, as well as cloak, toilet rooms, etc. Connecting this with the church there will be a covered passage way. Nearly all the money needed for these improvements has already been given or subscribed by the congregation. The church is dependent entirely upon the offerings of the worshippers for its support. All expenses are promptly met, and liberal offerings are given to missionary and other purposes.

PHILADELPHIA—Church of the Evangelists.—The old structure of this church, (the Rev. H.

R. Percival, rector,) except the tower, has been taken down; this will form a campanile for the new church which is to be built in the form of an old Basilicon of the Lombardy or Romanesque style of architecture. It will consist of a nave 30 feet wide, and two aisles, each 10 feet wide. The entire length will be 110 feet, of which 85 feet will form the choir and chancel. The walls will be of rough hard brick with open joints. The roof will be a plain open truss, with a plastered clerestory resting on arches of English red and Caen stone upon brick columns. Supporting a stone porch, which forms the entrance, are polished granite columns, the bases of which are coaching lions. It is intended at some future time to erect immediately west of the church a parish building, and also three neat dwellings in the rear of the lot.

PHILADELPHIA—St. James's Church, Kingsesing.—At this church (the Rev. Dr. Charles A. Mason, rector,) a workmen's club has just been started in this parish for the benefit of the many young men who had no places of social enjoyment save the street corner or the saloon. At the opening of the rooms, which are supplied with newspapers, periodicals and games, addresses were made by the rector, Mr. Francis Wells and others. The rooms, which are in one of the school buildings, are open every evening until 10 o'clock, except Sundays, Good Friday and Easter Even. The rector of the parish is ex-officio president, and the management of the club is in the hands of Churchmen, by a provision of the constitution. Its privileges are open to all who wish to avail themselves thereof.

PHILADELPHIA—Christ Church, Franklinville.—At this parish (the Rev. Thomas Z. Taylor, rector,) there has lately been organized a guild for the older boys and young men. A library and reading room are included in the plan, where they may spend their evenings free from the evil influences into which they are liable to be drawn. It is intended by the rector soon to establish a similar guild for the girls and women of the parish.

PHILADELPHIA—Church of the Ascension.—Contracts have been signed whereby work will be begun at once on the new church and parish buildings for this parish (the Rev. G. Woolsley Hodge, rector.) The church will be one hundred feet by sixty, will be built of stone lined with brick, having nave and aisles. The clerestory, resting on stone columns, will support an open-timbered roof. The chancel will be twenty-four by twenty-seven feet. The parish building, which is evidently intended to be a hive for earnest work, will have lower and upper stories. On the first there will be a hall, with stairway leading to the second floor, guild, choir, and vestry rooms, with the rector's office and a large work-room, with closets, etc. The entire upper room will be used as a Sunday-school room or chapel, as occasion may demand. The erection of these will hasten the improvement of this wide avenue at a part which has not grown as rapidly as it will in the next few years.

ARDMORE—A New Parish.—Between one and two acres of ground, centrally located, have been purchased here for Church purposes. It is expected that a parish will be organized at this point.

CENTRAL PENNSYLVANIA.

SAYRE—The Robert Packer Hospital.—The warden of this institution (the Rev. W. E. Morrow) in a letter dated July 27th says:

"In the account of the opening of the Robert Packer Hospital, situated at Sayre, Diocese of Central Pennsylvania, which appeared in your last week's issue, one mistake—a very natural one—occurs, which should be corrected, viz.: That the hospital property 'is the gift of the late Robert A. Packer.' Most people who know this open-handed and kindly gentleman personally, or by the quiet deeds of his generous life, would be apt to infer that it came to us by his own bequest. As a fact, however, this is not the case. And yet I do not feel at liberty to name publicly the person from whom the noble gift did proceed. Mr. Robert Ass Packer died without issue; hence it may not be amiss to say this much, that the people of this territory are indebted for the new institution to a surviving member of the family in which he was the eldest son."

HAILETON—Ordination.—The Rev. Louis C. Washburn, minister in charge of St. Peter's church, was advanced to the priesthood on Thursday, July 3d, by the assistant-bishop of the diocese. The sermon was preached by the assistant-bishop, and the candidate was presented by the Rev. M. A. Tolman. The Rev. Messrs. C. K. Nelson, J. B. Buxton and B. F. Thompson also joined in the imposition of hands.

A beautiful recess chancel has just been added to this church, and other notable changes made.

PITTSBURGH.

UNIONTOWN—St. Peter's Church.—This parish (the Rev. R. S. Smith, rector), has almost completed, and expects to occupy in the early fall, a handsome buff freestone church and parish building. The church is capable of seating about 300 persons. It consists of a nave 50x40 feet, and a chancel 20x18 feet, which is flanked on the right by a battlemented tower, the lower portion of which will serve as an organ-chamber. The room on the left of the chancel will be fitted up for the use of the rector. The chancel is apsidal. The roof is lofty and open-timbered. The walls are finished in rough plaster. In the upper part of the tower, which is a prominent landmark in this country, where there are large coking interests, and where not a few of the old-time log cabins may be seen, will be placed a chime of bells. The style of architecture is early English. All the windows are memorial, the scheme of which is events in the life of St. Peter. The furniture is of oak. The floors of the tower, chancel, and church have been laid in tiles, the gift of a Philadelphian. Abutting the church, and forming part of the structure, is a two-story school building, 15x45 feet, appropriately divided for parish work. The opening of this church and school building will be an event in Uniontown.

DELAWARE.

SUMMARY OF STATISTICS.—From the Journal of the Ninety-fifth Annual Convention we take the following statistics: Clergy, including the bishop, 30; parishes, 27; churches and chapels, 37; ordinations, 3; baptisms, 267; confirmations, 104; communicants, 2,206; Sunday-school scholars, 2,220; marriages, 59; burials, 182; contributions, $38,574.94. The address of the bishop dwells mainly upon topics of diocesan interest.

WILMINGTON—St. John's Church.—A group of parish buildings is about to be erected for this parish, (the Rev. Dr. T. Gardiner Littell, rector.) It will consist of three divisions. The first will contain rooms for clergy, choir, Bible-classes, a public reading-room and halls; the second will be a Sunday-school building, with porch; the third, a rectory. Ground has been broken for the first. They will be built of blue granite like the church. Covered ways will connect them. The plans have been furnished by Mr. Emlen T. Littell of New York, and are very complete in all the details.

The vested choir of thirty-five men and boys, trained by Mr. William J. Fisher, has been a complete success.

Three guilds are doing excellent work. The organ will soon be enlarged. Extensive improvements have recently been made to the church building. The congregation has been steadily increasing for several years.

MARYLAND.

GAITHERSBURG—Ascension Church.—This church (the Rev. R. T. Brown, rector,) was consecrated on Friday, July 17th, by the bishop of the diocese. The bishop preached, and confirmed three persons.

This church, in Prince George's parish, was begun in 1881, and completed in 1883, and cost about $2,000. It is a frame building, of gothic style. The Rev. R. T. Brown ministers here and at the parish church to some five hundred souls.

PRINCE FREDERICK—St. Paul's Church.—This parish (the Rev. Dr. L. De Lew, rector,) has received a legacy by the will of the late Mr. Parran, who was for many years rector, and the vestry are now building a bell-tower, to be paid for out of the same, and other parishioners are to provide the bell, as a memorial to this friend of the parish. The church accommodates some two hundred persons, while there are about thirty-three communicants in the parish. The parsonage, including a glebe of eighty acres, is valued at $2,000, the church at $3,000, while a handsome endowment of $6,000 is possessed by this parish.

PETERSVILLE—St. Mark's Church.—It is to be noted of this parish (the Rev. E. Wall, rector,) that, although it supports two missions, it receives no aid for either of them from the Missions' Committee. The parish has raised over $600 toward necessary expenses, and has a church (seating 450) and two chapels of the joint value of $6,000, and a parsonage and land of that of $3,000, with a list of communicants numbering 127—individuals in the cure, 250.

PORT TOBACCO PARISH—Christ Church, Port Tobacco.—Nearly by its own efforts this parish (the Rev. G. F. Williams, rector,) has built one of the most churchly and beautiful churches in this portion of the diocese. The church seats 700, and is valued at $14,000, the chapel appertaining included; parsonage and twenty-four acres, $3,000. Both church and rectory are insured. The parish here consists of 450 individuals, of whom some 340 are communicants, and only a few persons beyond the limits of the parish were appealed to for aid in the construction of the new and handsome church.

PORT TOBACCO PARISH—Christ Church, Port Tobacco.—On Wednesday and Thursday, July 1st and 2d, the bishop of the diocese made his first visitation of this parish (the Rev. G. F. Williams, rector). He officiated in both the church and the chapel. Thirty-one persons were confirmed. The bishop commended the splendid condition of the two consecrated buildings, and pronounced the services "grand and most hearty, and the attendance larger than he had seen in any parish he had visited outside of the cities of the diocese."

EASTON.

SPRING HILL PARISH—Convocation.—The southern convocation of the diocese met in St. Paul's church, Spring Hill parish (the Rev. F. B. Adkins, rector,) on Tuesday, July 21st. Evening Prayer having been said, there was a discussion on the Parable of the Leaven. The Rev. A. Batte discussed "The Spirit Given to the Apostles and the First Believers, and through them Permeating the World—the Church, the Leaven of the World." The Rev. J. R. Joyner discussed "The Personal Leaven—the Spirit touching the mind, the heart, or the conscience in some one point, and thence permeating the whole nature—the origin and growth of Christian character."

On Wednesday the Holy Eucharist was celebrated by the dean, the Rev. F. W. Hilliard, assisted by the Rev. A. Batte and the rector of the parish. The dean preached the sermon.

In the afternoon an instructive address on missions was delivered by the Rev. A. Batte.

On Thursday, after Morning Prayer, the Rev. A. Batte preached on "The Debt which all Christians owe to their God and the Church."

In the afternoon a stirring address was made by the dean on St. James, the first apostolic martyr.

St. Paul's, Spring Hill parish, is a country church, and, with the exception of a very few years, was presided over by Bishop Stone, of Maryland, from his early ministry until his death. It was built in 1765 as a chapel of ease to "Old Green Hill Church," in Stepeny parish, on the Wicomico River, which was built in 1733 and is now being restored.

WESTERN MICHIGAN.

GRAND RAPIDS—St. Mark's Church.—On Saturday, July 25th, St. James's Day, the annual reunion of the Sunday-schools and members of this parish, (the Rev. E. S. Burford, rector,) was held at Reed's Lake, three and a half miles from the city. The children and their teachers or guardians assembled at St. Mark's chapel at 9 o'clock A. M., when a short service was held by the rector, who then made a few brief remarks as to the proper observance of the order of the day. The distribution of tickets, &c., then took place, when all formed in line, marched to the cars in waiting, and were soon borne to the scene of the day's festivities. A bountiful collation was served at half past twelve by a committee of ladies, after which all gave themselves up to the enjoyment of the various amusements the scene afforded. Late in the afternoon the remainder of the feast was distributed to the hungry, and at five o'clock a happy festival ended with the homeward trip.

WISCONSIN.

MILWAUKEE—St. John's Home.—In the seventeenth report of this institution, the trustees reiterate the satisfaction previously expressed. The Home continues to find new friends who are kindly disposed to aid in its support, and the past year has been one of prosperity.

The present Board of Managers number twenty-eight. Three have been added and five have resigned; number of inmates, including matron and two servants, is twenty-five. Two have died and two have been admitted. The faithful chaplain, the Rev. Mr. St. George, still conducts the religious services at the Home. The matron (Mrs. Bordoe) performs her duties faithfully and well, and through her unwearied exertion and devotion the inmates have been made unusually happy and comfortable.

Through the thoughtful generosity of friends a number of books have been given to the Home, which have added greatly to the profit and pleasure of the inmates. Like donations from others would be gladly welcomed.

The Home has lost a valued friend and liberal donor in the death of Mrs. Dr. Wright, of Waukesha, who while living was ever active in showing her interest in the welfare and support of the Home. Her loss will be greatly deplored.

It is with feelings of regret that they record the resignation of their most worthy treasurer, Mrs. James Smith, who has served us so faithfully and acceptably, and who in leaving will carry with her the best wishes and esteem of all.

RACINE.—St. Luke's Hospital.—In their annual report the trustees of this institution give the following statistics: patients admitted, 18; patients readmitted, 1; infants born in the hospital, 22; died, 3 (2 adults and 1 infant). The nationality of the inmates was Irish, 4; German, 4; Danish, 3; Norwegian, 1; Swede, 1; English, 1; Canadian, 1; American, 3. The religious connection of the inmates was, Lutheran, 6; Roman Catholic, 5; Episcopal, 3; Methodist, 1; Universalist, 1; not ascertained, 2. Balance on hand at beginning of year, $7,50; cash received, $857.06; total, $944.56; expenditures, $860.76; leaving balance in hand, $83.80. The property is in good order, and there is no indebtedness.

CRITTEWA FALLS.—St. Luke's Hospital.—The annual report of this institution shows patients treated, 93 (men, 21; women, 7; children, 4). Receipts, $740.50; disbursements, $917.30; estimated debts, $900; the estimated value of the property is $1,900; of the building, $5,500.

During the year the hospital has been supplied by the various societies in the diocese which form part of the Woman's Auxiliary, with many needed articles. From outside the diocese a similar line of articles has been contributed, besides contributions of money. A complete set of amputating and trephining instruments were presented through Mrs. M. C. Durand, by Mrs. Bryson of New York.

ARKANSAS.

MORRILLTON.—St. Agnes's Church.—On Thursday, July 16th, the Rev. W. A. Tarnes, dean of Trinity cathedral, Little Rock, visited the few Churchmen of this rising and enterprising place, and on the following evening began a very successful mission, in which he is trusted great and abiding good was done. The mission resulted in the organization of St. Agnes's church, the formation of a ladies' guild, the offer of a good lot for church and rectory buildings, and the return of several who had wandered elsewhere. Dr. W. N. Scarborough was appointed senior warden, and Mr. H. Coblenz junior warden. A vestry, secretary, and treasurer were also chosen.

On Sunday, July 19th, the dean baptized four adults, and in the afternoon he baptized ten children.

The bishop arrived on Wednesday and conferred nine persons.

The services and visitation closed on Thursday evening, July 23d, after a sermon from the bishop, who has made arrangements for a supply of clerical ministrations by the cathedral clergy.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

AMONG THE INDIANS.—Extracts from a Letter of the Missionary Bishop.—The following, from a letter of Bishop Hare, has been furnished us for publication:

Tuesday, May 12th.—Last evening Mr. Swift and I pitched our tents near the Chapel of the Advent, a rude structure of which I wrote in the following words when I made my first visit to it last fall. We slept in the bushes that night. Next morning we travelled on, and after several hours described a figure on a hilltop some distance off. One of the Indians made for him. He turned out to be the native catechist from White Wolf's camp who was out seeking lost horses. He guided us to camp, where a sight met our gaze which was a full reward for our night's discomfiture—in a vast wilderness a new essay at a farming settlement, and at a central point a dozen Indians busy erecting a log chapel! I had sent them money with which to buy flooring, doors and window sash. They had themselves cut and hauled and hewn the logs, had put them in place and were doing all the work. The sight provoked the exclamation, "In the wilderness shall the waters break out and streams in the desert." The people's joy that I had come to see them, and my joy at seeing them were alike unbounded.

These people are just coming in from wildness and heathenism. They had been notified of our intended visit, and gathered from all directions, some in wagons, some on pony back, and some on foot. They had learned a few of the hymns and some of the responses by heart, and their first essays at a responsive service were very interesting. I write these notes while sitting underneath our wagon, seeking there shelter from the glare, and while three Indians are computing the value of a lot of beadwork, scabbards, moccasins, etc., which the Indian women have made in order to raise money to buy a bell for their chapel. The whole sum proves to be $17.70.

FORT KEOGH.—Divine service is held at this post on all Sundays except the first Sunday of each month. The choir, under the charge of Lient. Partillo, the organist, is composed of children, whom he has trained to sing in quite a Churchly manner. The Sunday-school, Lient. Chatfield, superintendent, has an average attendance of thirty-five, an increase of 50 per cent. during the past year. The Church people and their friends at this station have furnished the chance of the post chapel with lectern, prayer desk, desk books, frontals for the altar, etc.; and besides contributing liberally to the support of the services, have rendered substantial aid in paying off the debt against the Mission property at Miles City.—Diocesan Paper.

MILES CITY.—The Estey organ purchased for the Ladies' Guild by Mr. Joseph Leighton has been received and placed in the chapel, and gives great satisfaction. The organist, Mr. Ross, an expert in such matters, thinks it the best instrument in the city.

The Ladies' Guild has elected as officers for the present year Mrs. M. R. Maples, president; Mrs. Horsfall, vice-president; Mrs. W. H. Middleton, secretary; Mrs. S. Gordon, treasurer. This guild was organized December, 1882, and has continued up to this time under the presidency of Mrs. Maples. Regular meetings are held in the parish school-room on the first and third Wednesdays in each month, when, among the business transacted, the matter of collecting the rector's salary (checking off the subscription list and appointing lady collectors for the month) forms an important part. The guild during the past two years and a half has raised, exclusive of salary, over $1,500 for Church purposes.

Services are held in the chapel on all Sundays at half-past 9 A. M. and 8 P. M., and on all holy days at 11 A. M.; also, during the session of the parish school, on all week days (except Saturdays) at half-past 9 A. M. and half-past 3 P. M.

The parish school ended its Easter term on Friday, June 12th, with the full number of pupils, all in regular attendance except one. The closing exercises concluded with a lawn festival in the evening at the rectory, the grounds being illuminated with Chinese lanterns suspended from the trees. The interesting part of the entertainment was the presentation of the school medals by the rector, the awards having been previously made by Washington Berry, Esq., U. S. Land Office. Ada Davis received the gold medal for the best record, and Florence McFarlane the silver medal for the greatest general improvement. In the rector's address honorable mention was made of the names of Marion Gordon, Rena Vaughan, and Sally Jacobs, as standing next in order of merit. The Advent term of the school begins on the first Monday in September.—Diocesan Paper.

IDAHO.

THE BISHOP'S ANNUAL VISIT.—The missionary bishop is now making his annual round of visits in this Territory. Leaving home immediately after the close of the Church schools in Salt Lake City, he arrived in Boise City, Idaho, on the 19th of June. On Sunday, the 21st, he preached both morning and evening to large congregations in St. Michael's church, being assisted in the services by the rector and the Rev. Messrs. C. G. Davis, of Ogden, and F. W. Crook, of Boise City.

Leaving Boise City, he visited the various mission stations in Ada and Boise counties under the pastoral care of the Rev. Mr. Crook, and again, on July 5th, officiated in St. Michael's church, preaching both morning and evening, and confirming an interesting class at the morning service. The interest of the Sunday-school service in the afternoon was heightened by the baptism of four children. After the Sunday-school the bishop administered the rite of confirmation in private.

During his visit the bishop, as is his custom, called from house to house throughout the parish, speaking a word of comfort to the sick and suffering, of encouragement to the unfortunate and destitute, and of counsel to the inquiring. We venture nothing in affirming that in all Idaho there is not a man who knows personally so many of the men, women and children of the Territory, and so much of their heart history, as does this man whose home is five hundred miles away. The miner, the stage-driver, the merchant, the baker, the workman in the home and the child on the street, all have a warm welcome for him.

Leaving Boise City on July 10th, accompanied by the Rev. G. H. Davis, the bishop went to Silver City. On Sunday morning he preached, baptized one infant, confirmed four adults and celebrated the Holy Communion. The evening congregation, when the bishop again preached, was not so large as usual, many being drawn away by a circus performance.

Monday was occupied with visiting the people in their homes, the bishop calling on almost every white family in the camp, and baptizing two children.

Tuesday morning found him again bumping over a rough stage-road, and your readers may picture him, from this time until the 1st of November, travelling by stage and on horseback over mountains and through valleys and gulches, visiting villages and mining camps, literally seeking the sheep lost in the wilderness.

CONNECTICUT.

MIDDLETOWN—Commemoration of the First Ordination in the United States.—August 3d was the centenary of the first ordination held in this country by Bishop Seabury. The clergy of Connecticut met the bishop at Middletown on the 2d day of August, 1785; and on the following day, after a formal recognition and acknowledgment of their bishop on the part of the clergy, he held an ordination of three candidates from Connecticut (Messrs. Philo Shelton, Ashbel Baldwin and Henry Van Dyck), and one from Maryland, Mr. Colin Ferguson. A special service was held on the hundredth anniversary of this ordination, in the Church of the Holy Trinity, Middletown. The bishop and clergy entered the church in procession at 11 o'clock, preceded by the choir. Bishop Williams began the Communion service, the epistle (from Ephesians iv., 7), being read by the Rev. Dr. Hat of Trinity College, and the Gospel (from St. Matthew xi., 35), by the Rev. S. Clarke of Bridgeport. After the creed, Bishop Williams delivered an address.

The bishop said that the third day of August, 1785, was a memorable day for the diocese and for the whole Church in this country, as being the day of the first ordination held by an American bishop and in the United States. It was well, he said, to commemorate it in the place in which it occurred, thus fittingly ending the series of centenary observances which was begun in Woodbury in the springtime of 1783. The place was the small wooden building known as Christ church, which stood on the south green in Middletown. Foremost among those who came together was the newly-consecrated bishop, in the full maturity of his manhood, as we see him in the picture with which we are all familiar, painted while he was in London. The presbyters present included Jeremiah Leaming, who had for his advanced age and his infirmities what he had stood in Seabury's place, and who preached the "well-adapted" sermon at the first ordination; Abraham Jarvis, the rector of Middletown and secretary of the convention, the writer of most, if not all, of the excellent papers and letters which were written about that time on behalf of the Connecticut clergy; nine others of the clergy of the State; the Rev. Benjamin Moore, of New York, and the Rev. Samuel Parker, of Massachusetts. The bishop passed on to speak of the admirable address of the clergy to Bishop Seabury and of his reply, of the ordination service and of the convocation of the clergy which followed. He said that we can scarcely now imagine the mingled joy and doubt, hope and fear, that filled the minds and agitated the hearts of those who came together in Middletown a hundred years ago. No man could answer then the questions which then arose to their minds; God has answered them since. He closed with a quotation from Bishop Coxe's lines on the mitre of Bishop Seabury, which is preserved in the library of Trinity College.

After the bishop's address the Rev. Dr. Beardsley, of New Haven, read an extended biographical sketch of the life and clerical work of each of the persons ordained on August 3d, 1785. Bishop Williams then proceeded with the services of the Holy Communion, being assisted in the administration by the Rev. Dr. Beardsley, and the Rev. Messrs. Seymour and Goodwin of Hartford. After the service, the clergy and other visitors were entertained at the Berkeley Divinity school.

The service was the last of three special centenary commemoration services of the Diocese of Connecticut. The hundredth anniversary of the election of Bishop Seabury was commemorated at St. Paul's church, Woodbury, March 27th, 1883 (two days after the actual anniversary); the hundredth anniversary of Bishop Seabury's consecration at Aberdeen, in Scotland, was commemorated at Christ church, Hartford, November 14th, 1884; and yesterday's service at the Church of the Holy Trinity, Middletown, marked the hundredth anniversary of the first ordination held in this country. The three events have also been marked by historical discourses delivered by Bishop Williams before the diocesan convocations of 1883, 1884, and 1885. These discourses will probably be published in a volume with accounts of the several centenary services in the diocese.—Hartford Courant.

SPRINGFIELD.

EPISCOPAL LETTER.—The bishop of the diocese has issued the following pastoral, under date of July 29th:

Dear Brethren of the Clergy and Laity of the Diocese of Springfield:—The death of General Grant justifies me in addressing you.

The events which brought him to the front, and ultimately placed him first in the field, and first in the hearts of his countrymen, are not likely to occur again. He proved himself equal to the occasion, and suggested by his capability and heroism in the discharge of his inferior duties the prominence, which was soon universally accorded him, as "the man for the times."

As Washington is the central and loftiest figure of our Revolutionary struggle, so Grant is of our civil war.

As the first conflict gave us our birth as a nation, so the last has given us our manhood in growth and matured strength.

Honors great, multiplied, and varied have, since peace was restored, waited upon General Grant at home and abroad. His protracted and painful illness, under the relentless grasp of a disease which can afford to bide its time, because its prey cannot escape, and the fatal result, however long delayed, is, humanly speaking, inevitable, drew to him in his last days the eyes and thoughts of all our people, and hence his death comes home to us with a touch of nearness which is seldom the case beyond the limits of the sick room and the domestic circle.

In view of these facts, dear brethren, it is our duty to unite with our fellow-citizens in paying honor to the memory of the illustrious deceased, and to ponder the lessons which his death so obviously and impressively teaches.

I would therefore recommend that, as far as practicable, in all our parishes and missions commemorative services be held, as nearly as possible, coincident with the time of actual interment, on Saturday, the eighth day of August next, and I would further suggest the following order of service, as suitable to be observed on the occasion:

1. Introductory sentences from the Burial Office. 2. Psalms from the same office. 8. Lesson, 1 Cor. xv. 20. 4. Anthem or Hymn. 5. Sermon or Address, if there be any. 6. Hymn. 7. The Discretionary Portion of the Litany and appropriate Collects. 8. Benediction.

Commending you to God's grace, and praying that He would sanctify this national affliction to our welfare, I remain, dear brethren, faithfully and affectionately yours,

GEORGE F. SEYMOUR, Bishop of Springfield.

ART.

The symbolism of grief has a legitimate relation with aestheticism, deriving a pathos or significance, or even eloquence, as occasion affords. The roughest funeral weed of the hovel or tenement mourner pleads with irresistible tenderness for even a passing recognition, in the busiest thoroughfares or the most sordid throng.

It is verily that one touch of nature that binds us all more or less nearly in the world-wide kinship of sorrow. It is easy enough, perhaps, to pick flaws in the presumable selfishness and ostentation that now and then crops up in demonstrations of private bereavement, for in the hour of supremest joy or grief the heart, in its singular loneliness, challenges cheer or sympathy.

But all such chilly considerations pass out of thought when a national grief sweeps silently and swiftly as a solar eclipse across the wide land, from ocean to ocean. A patient, long-wearied hero, in the unbragging seclusion of a modest cottage on Mt. McGregor, breaths that one last sigh, which all the world has awaited in tender solicitude, and the click of the telegraph, quick as thought, echoes and distributes that sigh throughout the ends of the earth and in the far off islands of the sea.

Now comes the expressive symbolism of loss and lament. The miner in the Sierras, the ranchman on the plains, the plodder in the fields, the craftsmen in the humming factory, the toiler above ground, below ground, on the sea, on the railroad, in commerce, on 'change, here, everywhere, puts out some signal of gloom and distress. It develops all at once, quietly, gently, as if an atmosphere of common grief had suddenly shut down upon us.

There is something touching and that gives us pause in this spontaneous expression of human heartedness. It dignifies, and, for the hour ennobles, the meanest home and the meanest industry where hang the tokens of the gravest grief. It is noticed, indeed, that the people's resorts, the shop, the public hall, the market, the wayside booth of the huckster and news-stand are quickest to hang up the necrotic strip of black, or the grim-visaged portrait of the hero, with its sable border. Simple natures and unconventional lives take no time for consideration at such a time. There is a short cut from the sorrow to the expression of it. Quick as thought the same hand seemed to have dropped every flag on land and sea to half-mast. Then the interminable streets of the great city unroll their costly and elaborate garniture of mourning. And the decorous, well-ordered work moves on, hushing the din of business, touching every countenance with a kindlier, soberer cast, until the whole people, of all tongues, and races, and conditions, seem within reach of one another.

The Government edifices put on stately and eloquent decorations, in which even the artist and upholsterer are kept well in the background. The national colors, heavily draped, hang from the halliards. The great buildings of the leading journals vie with the Government in the significance and abundance of outlay.

The palace-hotels, the houses of amusement, the splendid marts of trade, everywhere show the black, white, and purple trappings of mourning. Designs of rare refinement, here and there, catch and hold the eye; designs well worth the photographer as mementoes of the nation's funeral.

It is noticeable, as an illustration of the sensitive relations of art to popular recreation, that the great orchestras at the seaside resorts are tempering their programmes, in deference to the prevailing disposition, with an intelligent selection of religious and elegiac music.

Much will be wanting along the route through which the august cortege will move on its way to the Riverside tomb. For the Fifth avenue palace-dwellers are long since scattered beyond reach of this demonstration, so that where, at another time, art might have made ready a funeral demonstration meet for the darkest day, now will be found only empty houses and naked walls of brownstone.

PARAGRAPHC.

MR. HENRY F. WATERS, a graduate of Harvard, has been making researches into the history of John Harvard, the founder of the college, which has been most obscure. He has found the record of his baptism in 1607, graduation at Magdalen College, Cambridge, in 1631, and of his marriage to the daughter of an English clergyman. Harvard was much elated at the discoveries, and has conferred upon Mr. Waters the degree of Master in Arts as a just reward.

NEAR Astoria, Oregon, may be seen a deposit of clam shells, which covers an area of four acres, and in places they are piled ten feet deep. A thousand loads taken away seemed to make no impression on the heap. A clam opener made of the tooth of a whale was recently found among them. Over these shells there are sixteen inches of soil, in which fir trees 400 years old are growing. Rhode Island can show nothing like this, and in the matter of clams must yield the palm.

ASHFORD Hill Retreat, in full view of the Palisades on the Hudson, is an institution belonging to the Church of the Holy Communion in this city, intended as a summer's retreat for its poor. During four years it has furnished an outing for 1,665 women and children. Besides these of its own flock, the Retreat receives beneficiaries from other parishes and from individuals, at a charge of $2.50 per week for children and $3 for adults. We are glad to see such practical and practicable charities springing up around us. Inasmuch as you have done it to one of the best of these.

THE thirty-ninth annual report of the American Bible Society shows that its receipts for the last year, applicable to its disbursements, were $567,914.84, the legacies being $138,591.10, and in both items there was a falling off from the preceding year. The disbursements were $619,892.58, a discrepancy between receipts and expenditures that causes the managers anxiety. The total issues of Bibles and Testaments for the year were 1,348,175 copies. During the existence of the society its issues have been 45,440,306. The report is full of interesting facts in regard to the circulation of the Scriptures.

The rector having announced to the vestry the death of the Hon. JOHN C. BEHNSWORTH, the senior warden of the parish, the vestry put on record these words of respect and affection.

IN MEMORIAM.

Through all the years he has been among us, the vestry have recognized the constant devotion with which he has been ready to spend and to spend for the parish.

We record his faithfulness as senior warden for twenty years, in the watchful care he has had over our church and parochial property, as secretary and treasurer, his untiring effort in behalf of the parishes; as brother pastorator, his hearty and foremost aid in all endeavors to further the property and advancement of the parish.

We record his personal example as an affectionate and generous man, of a refined and unassuming nature, as well as devout and earnest Christian and a warm and faithful Churchman.

And so while we know that our parish has met in his loss a bereavement irreparable, we still thank Him who has so ordered His own way, for the life of the past and for the hope that His spirit is our ever abiding possession.

"Think upon him, O my God, for good according to all that he has done for this people."

He was a man of spotless character, a generous citizen, a devout and humble Christian. We mourn his loss with deep sympathy and with all the wisdom and judgment and wise counsel, but in our profound sorrow that we shall see his face no more on earth, we have departed this life in the confidence of a certain faith, in the comfort of a reasonable religious and holy hope, in favor with God, and in the love and companionship and of His sons.

We offer to the widow and relations of our departed friend and brother our sincerest sympathy in their bereavement.

THE ADVENT MISSION IN NEW YORK.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

It is with great anxiety and the profound interest that the members of the Church in America have read of the proposed "new departure" from the historic routine of Church work in New York. It is a novel, new, and as I can learn and am able to judge, an anxiety that has any element of alarm in it, or that would discourage it. In the hands and under the control of the type of Churchmanship we know it to be, we can see nothing to occasion any fear that there will be any sacrifice of the principle of conservatism, or any concession of the clamorous emotionalism and fanaticism which so often characterize the "popular revivals" of the times.

The means and methods to be adopted will, I am sure, be eagerly looked for and closely studied, not with the view of criticizing them, but to ascertain to what extent they may be appropriate in other localities; because the "twenty reasons" given why this mission should be attempted in New York find a large and painful application elsewhere—everywhere. Men and women are sinning, suffering, and dying all around us, within our sight, and almost within our touch, but the ordinary methods do not actually reach them, and accordingly cannot save them. And if there should come to us any suggestion of practical and efficient methods of reaching these souls from the effort in New York, many a heart will thank God that it was undertaken. And as to the results of the Advent Mission work, they will be looked for with most hopeful and prayerful solicitude.

It seems to me that nothing less than the direct and gracious moving of the Holy Ghost on the hearts of the Church, the throbbings of which are felt so distinctly in its arteries in New York, can account for this extraordinary venture of faith and trust, and coming, as it does near the centenary of the American Church, it suggests a serious retrospection, and makes us at least think what "might have been," and what now might be, had not a frightened or offended formalism or a traditional and efete ecclesiasticism laid its dead hand on a living movement, which drove it away, and out of all directions leading to the Church's altar. John Wesley's motives and methods of a century ago stand to-day more than vindicated, both in England and America, while, as I think, the Church has largely atoned for her mistake, and is now striving to retrieve her lost advantage.

And, what is at least a pleasing coincidence, the mission movement, in its plans, seems to have reached its culmination about Whitsuntide, when the Church herself was "Born of the Spirit," and when the "Power from on high" supplemented the authority and commission of the apostles, and prepared them for their work.

With "authority" in their hands, they might have been very stately, methodical, and dignified in all they did; but it would still have left means and methods to their own poor wits; and these poor wits would never have suggested to Peter to take his stand on the temple steps, or near them, and preach that sermon to the heterogeneous mass of staring, astonished, and incredulous people. Fresh that sermon! His own wits could never have framed it as it was framed, and under the circumstances. It came from the "Power from on high," filtering its mighty and magnificent thoughts, its convicting and converting energy, through his brain and heart, and issuing in that strange way, that even he must have been astonished at its effects and its results. The Holy Ghost, helping the infirmities of his natural wits, made him quick to see, and prompt to act, on the means and methods which had been prearranged by the ascended Master.

I cannot expel the thought from the Church he tried, and relied on, her "authority" to convert men to God quite long enough. It is a good thing, a blessed—I was going to say—an essential thing to have. But is it? But, be it what it may, it is not the only thing needed.

While we as a Church have been working with authority to do God's work, what has been done by others to whom no such authority is conceded? The fact is patent that they have succeeded most wonderfully. What have they that we have not? It reminds us of two incidents of Scripture history. A man of Jesus did not authorize nor send out could not cast out devils in His name; but not one of the twelve whom He did authorize could cast out the devil from a demonized child brought to them for that purpose. Why? What had he that they had not? They had the authority, without the power. He had the power, without the authority! Further than this I do not attempt a solution. I simply throw it out as a suggestion, which others can handle better than I can. But it does seem as if tolerated work (for this man's work was tolerated by Christ, under certain conditions, may be more successful in certain directions than that which is not simply tolerated, but positively authorized. Of this we have many modern illustrations.

The fact seems to be that the Church has been afraid to employ unusual and, seemingly, "unchurchly" methods to reach those whom her "Churchly" routine has certainly thus far failed to reach and save. We have seemed to rest under the impression that fanaticism, such as is invariably associated with popular revivals, is a radical element which cannot be eliminated. To cling to such an impression is itself of the very essence of fanaticism. The stirring, and, as I believe, the God-moved, appeal of the Assistant-Bishop of New York is (a) the concession of the Church's failure in her established methods to reach certain classes and cases of souls dying in sin, and (b) that efforts on a line of popular revivals may be made effective in saving these souls, and free from the emotionalism which makes them so misleading and dangerous.

Therefore is it that we bid this "mission" God speed. And it seems to me that the Church in this contented to pulsate with sympathetic throbs, and every throbb a prayer, in behalf of its success, that through it branch "missions" may be established in many other places, through which the spiritual life of the Church may be quickened everywhere, and thousands of hitherto unreached sinning and suffering men may be brought to share practically in the saving mercy of God in Christ.

RESTORATION BY A STANDING COMMITTEE.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

The action of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of So. Ohio in restoring a deposed presbyter, has been questioned by three bishops of the Church, so far as heard from. A succinct statement of the case seems at once called for.

The ecclesiastical authority never doubted its competency. No doubt was suggested by the bishop of the diocese, nor almost, nor by any one of the five bishops who have given their approval.

Title III, Can. 2, § iii, says: "When there is no Bishop, the Standing Committee is the Ecclesiastical Authority for all purposes declared in these Canons." Title I, Can. 15, § xiii, after stating how a bishop may "under his hand and seal" constitute the Standing Committee the Ecclesiastical Authority during his absence, says: "The . . . Standing Committee, so authorized, shall thereupon become the Ecclesiastical Authority . . . to all intents and purposes," etc. Now what is there a bishop can do which his Standing Committee thus hand authorized, may not do? Can it ordain? Certainly not. The Constitution and Canons of the Church do not give such power. They recognize the power and limit its exercise. Can it depose? No. Article VI of the Constitution says: "none but a Bishop shall pronounce such sentence;" and Title II, Can. 2, § i, directs, in the case of such a case, that the Standing Committee is the Ecclesiastical Authority, that a Bishop "requested by the Standing Committee" and consenting to act, shall "depose such person." May this Ecclesiastical Authority remit and terminate a sentence? Yes; for, constituted under the Canon, it is "the Ecclesiastical Authority for all purposes declared in these Canons."—Title III, Can. 2, § iii—unless the Canons limit the exercise of authority in this direction. It is not pretended that they do not. Perhaps they ought, but they do not.

The Standing Committee of the Diocese of Southern Ohio, in the case here, has no claim that the remitting and terminating a sentence was within its competency when the bishop constituted it the Ecclesiastical Authority "to all intents and purposes."

This is the first case probably, of a restoration by such an Ecclesiastical Authority. Whether it be right and proper, or whether the Canon should be amended, are questions for the General Convention to determine.

But for the information of the Church, the facts in this case may as well be stated:—Some months ago, application for restoration was made, and referred by the bishop to the Standing Committee. It was not favorably received, and action was delayed till after the bishop left. The application gained in force, and when the matter was taken from the table, it failed of "unanimous advice and consent" on the ground that regard for the views and the feelings of the bishop who deposed the applicant required that so important a matter should be considered in the presence of the assembly. In the meantime the application seemed to gain more force, and in the minds of several members of the committee justified an intrusion of the subject upon the bishop. The bishop in reply stated, that if the Standing Committee gave unanimous "advice and consent," he should be pleased, and he requested the Ecclesiastical Authority in such case to take steps for his restoration.

When the committee next met, "unanimous advice and consent was given,"—Title II, Can. 11, § iii [1]; next the reasons were submitted to the judgment of the five bishops, and their unanimous approval was received, and on July 19, 1885, the case was reported already been more than satisfied. The Standing Committee then proceeded to remit and terminate the sentence and pronounce the restoration complete.

This statement of the facts of the case may forestall any further adverse criticism of the action of the Ecclesiastical Authority of Southern Ohio, and hence are given. But even without them, we maintain that such act of restoration was not only not beyond the Standing Committee's powers, but strictly within its canonical duty.

TRANSLATION OF THE CHINESE PRAYER BOOK.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

IN THE CHURCHMAN of June 27th, in the obituary notice of the Rev. Augustus C. Hoehling, signed T., it is stated that "the Chinese Prayer Book now in use was of his (Mr. Hoehling's) translation."

To the Editor, I have to my certain knowledge and never published any translation of the Prayer Book or of portions of the Prayer Book. If the writer of the obituary notice refers to the Chinese Prayer Book now in use in our mission in China, that was translated by myself in the years 1879 and 1880, in the modern easy literary style, as I felt that the Prayer Book—in the style which would be acceptable to the educated classes, and could be used all over China, even in those parts where the people speak dialects of their own. If the writer refers to the small service book published by the Episcopal Committee in promoting Christian work among the Chinese in Philadelphia—a copy of which has only recently come into my hands—this has been compiled from the translation of the Prayer Book above spoken of. The only change that has been made in the term for God, that used by myself being changed for another, and one which I regard as being objectionable in every way. It is hardly necessary to say that this change was made without my knowledge.

When Mr. Hoehling labored in Hankow as a missionary, the Prayer Book used by him and other missionaries at that station and by our missionaries at Wuchang (a city on the other side of the Yangtsi river, opposite Hankow) was a compilation from a translation of the Prayer Book, made in Peking some seventeen (17) years ago, by the present Bishop of Victoria, Hong Kong (Dr. Burdon), and myself. This version of the Prayer Book was made in the Mandarin or Queen's War, the language spoken by the officials and all educated people in China, and is the vernacular, with more or less modification, of Northern and Western China. The writer of this obituary notice of Mr. Hoehing also mentions that "he has left Esop's Fables ready for publication." These Fables were ably translated and published about forty (40) years ago, by a Mr. Thom, at that time one of the English consuls in China.

As regards Mr. Hoehing's Chinese scholarship, he was but two years in China (see Spirit of Missions for July), and while he had made good progress for the length of time that he had been there, it would not have been possible either for him or any other missionary to attain the proficiency in that most difficult language accorded him by the writer of the obituary.

NEW BOOKS.

PRIMITIVE CONSECRATION OF THE EUCHARISTIC OBLATION: with an Earnest Appeal for its Revival. By the Rev. Edmund S. Foulkes, B. D., Vicar of St. Mary the Virgin, Oxford. [London: J. T. Hayes, New York: James Pott & Co., 8vo., pp. 64. Price, $5.50.]

[SECOND NOTICE.]

It was impossible to do justice to Mr. Foulkes's important and (as we said) startling arguments without giving a somewhat full outline of them. It would require much time and great learning to enter into a full examination of what he has written. The few suggestions which will be offered can have no pretensions to be exhaustive in either their scope or their treatment.

There can be no doubt as to the force of the great truth upon which the author dwells in the former part of the volume. The Church of the early centuries did not forget or ignore the work and office of the Spirit of God, and it did not believe that the Christian life could be maintained without His aid, or that the sacraments had any validity except as they were the channels of His operation. There can be no doubt that the early Christians considered that it was by invocation of the Holy Ghost in solemn prayer that the oblations offered to God the Father in the Eucharist were made, in sacramental sense, the Body and the Blood of Christ. If they recited the words of the Lord and copied His actions—Mr. Foulkes (in the "Dictionary") will say no more than that "just possibly" they did—it was not with the idea that man could do that which it was the prerogative of the Spirit of God to do. The invocation was certainly considered an essential—perhaps the only essential—part of the service for the "consecration of the Eucharistic Oblation."

But in using this phrase, which is in fact taken from the title of the volume before us, we can hardly fail to see that it suggests a most important oversight in the argument of the learned author. He treats of the consecration of an oblation; but throughout the work he fails to tell us how and when the Oblation is to be made.* In regard to the Eastern liturgies, his arguments present no difficulty; for in them an express Oblation is followed by an express Invocation of the Holy Ghost, so express that they bear "splendid witness" to the ancient truth, though the introduction of the words of Institution before them instead of, as a form of administration, after them, may be due to pseudo-Clementine influence. But, granting that the prayer in the Roman service, "We humbly beseech Thee, Almighty God, command that these [holy gifts] may be carried by the hands of Thy holy angel to Thy altar on high, in the sight of Thy Divine Majesty, in order that all we who, from the participation of this altar receive the holy Body and Blood of Thy Son, may be filled with all heavenly benediction and grace," granting that this is an Invocation of the Holy Spirit, and that its proper place is earlier in the service, where the paragraph "Quam oblationem" now stands, we should have no consecration of the Eucharistic Oblation; for that Oblation is most certainly not made till after the recital of the words of Institution and in the clause beginning "Unde et memores." The same thing may be said, only more strongly, of the office in the first book of the reign of King Edward VI., for there too the Invocation precedes the words of Institution, and the Oblation follows them. Certainly Mr. Foulkes would not, we think, call the "oblatio primitiva," such as that in our "Prayer for the Whole State of Christ's Church," "the Eucharistic Oblation." What is needed in the service of 1549 is a re-arrangement of its parts, as in our American Prayer Book, and the Roman service needs an express Invocation in the place of "Supplices te rogamus," and then it will certainly appear, as the Eastern liturgies show, that the true doctrine is not obscured, and it may be acknowledged to be matter of indifference, as Archbishop Freeman suggested, whether the words of Institution precede the Oblation or follow the Invocation, so long as the Holy Ghost is invoked to consecrate that which is offered to the Father.

The testimony of the Mozarabic Liturgy certainly seems to be different from that which Mr. Foulkes draws from it. As it stands the canon begins with a prayer to Christ that He will be present and sanctify the oblation "that we may receive the things sanctified in it by the hands of Thy holy angel." Then follows the recital of the words of institution in the third person—not the second, as would be expected; and then comes the prayer, "Past Prædicte," a variable prayer, which in some cases has express words of both Oblation and Invocation. Now it is almost certain that Dr. Neale was right in rejecting the opening words addressed to Christ as an interpolation by Cardinal Ximenes (they seem to be taken from the Roman use), especially as the variable prayer which precedes always ends with the words "the Lord and eternal Redeemer," leading naturally, and without a break in the sentence, to the recital of the Institution.

Dr. Neale, besides, was decidedly of the opinion that the "Past Prædicte" prayer originally always contained the Oblation and Invocation, and it is to this prayer and not to the invariable words beginning "Adesto, adesto," that St. Isidore refers when, enumerating the seven variable prayers of the Mozarabic Office, he says of the sixth that it is the "conformatio [or confirmatio] sacramenti," "that the oblation which is presented to God, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost, may be conformed to the Body and Blood of Christ." In fact the teaching of the uncorrupted Mozarabic Liturgy seems to be exactly the same as that of the liturgies of the East.

But it is worth while to go back in the argument and ask if it is necessary to consider the so-called Clementine Liturgy, an Arian and Macedonian production, as, in Mr. Foulkes's words, containing "blasphemy" and "a flagrant insult to the Holy Ghost," having "no claim whatever to be considered a Christian composition," and being "a studied insult to the Redeemer and the Sanctifier of mankind throughout." These tremendously strong words do not seem to be justified by the liturgy or by our author's comments upon it. Of course, it is necessary to remember the subtlety of the Arians and their use of all manner of logical quibbles; but the long preface of the Clementine Liturgy does not read like an artificially framed and carefully guarded composition. It has rather the appearance of something written in early times before theological language had become stereotyped, and before it was necessary to guard every expression and every word against misunderstanding. Certainly the paragraph at the end of the great Intercession is sufficiently explicit, one would think, to show what the writer believed as to the Son and the Holy Ghost. It calls Christ "the God of everything in nature perceived by the senses or the reason," and ends thus: "For to Thee, the Father, and the Son and the Holy Ghost, is all glory, majesty and thanksgiving, honor and worship, both now and ever and unto the un-failing and unending ages of the ages."

Mr. Foulkes finds many minor blemishes in the liturgy, as that its anaphora "commences with 'the grace,' not of our Lord Jesus Christ, but of the Almighty God," which looks like Scripture deliberately misquoted to derogate from the Son as not being a true fountain of grace. But it is not quite fair to omit to add that the clause which follows is "and the love of our Lord Jesus Christ," when that is attributed to the Son which the Scripture attributes to the Father.

We cannot imagine why Mr. Foulkes should completely ignore every liturgy in the English language in which the Holy Ghost is invoked, except that of 1549 and the one drawn up by Bishop Jeremy Taylor when it was forbidden to use the forms of the Prayer Book. He ought to know that probably ever since the year 1700 some such liturgy has been in use; that the Non-jurors adopted one in 1718, the Scottish Church in 1755, and the American Church in 1789, with forms based upon those of the Primitive and the Eastern Church, and all teaching that the "consecration of the Eucharistic Oblation" is by the operation of the Holy Ghost, and in answer to the prayer of invocation which is offered by the Church. And these offices—two of them belonging to National Churches—have avoided the error of order which the office of 1549 inherited from Rome, and which perhaps led to some dissatisfaction with it. They have maintained the ancient doctrine of the Scriptures and the Church, and they have done not a little we may confidently believe to advance the great end of the unity of Christendom.

While many of us in the United States would be glad to have certain things from the book of 1549 incorporated into our office, we must maintain that the order of the parts of the Prayer of Consecration, which we received from Scotland and for which Scotland was indebted to the East, is that which truly represents the Catholic doctrine and enables us to offer acceptable worship to God.

Mr. Foulkes has done much to disentangle the knots of history, and his book, spiteful of its defects of form and arrangement, will be of use to scholars. And it is most sincerely to be hoped that it may do much to promote that reunion of the Church which the author has so much at heart. But it leaves some questions unanswered, it advances some very doubtful theories of interpretation and of fact, and it has not fully explained the complicated history of the eucharistic office of the Roman Church, so as to account for its present state of confusion or to show how that confusion can be readily corrected.

*It almost seems to be assumed (on p. 20) that the Oblation consists in the recital of the words of Institution. In this passage Mr. Foulkes objects to an invocation following the Oblation; yet, considering what he says of the Eastern liturgies, he cannot but see that it is a fundamentally serious objection; and it is difficult to see how an oblation can be consecrated before it is made an oblation.

TEACHING OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES. Recently discovered and Published by Philothéos Bryennios, Metropolitan of Nicomedia. Edited with a Translation, Introduction and Notes by Rowell D. Hitchcock and Francis Brown, Professors in Union Theological Seminary, New York. A new edition, revised and greatly enlarged. (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons.) pp. cv., 85.

In 1873 Bryennios, Metropolitan of Nicomedia discovered a manuscript at Constantinople in the library of the Monastery of the Most Holy Sepulchre, and he called it the Jerusalem Codex. It contained one hundred and twenty leaves of vellum in small octavo, was evidently written by one hand, and bears the date of 1056 A. D. The codex contained copies of a number of documents, such as epistles of S. S. Barnabas, Clement and Ignatius, and among them the teaching of the Apostles, which was last year published, and whose genuineness, authenticity and value has been freely and largely discussed in our columns, in which we published a translation of it. There is, therefore, the less reason to go into the subject anew, and to decide between the doctors, as to whether the teaching was written by a Jewish Christian and no Ebionite, and between 120-160 A. D., or whether it was a forgery of a later date and of but little value. Already a very considerable literature has gathered round it, of which in this volume Dr. Schaff gives a catalogue, and our readers in the multitude of opinions can take their choice. Immediately upon the publication of the Teaching, Profs. Hitchcock and Brown issued a translation with a few necessary notes. That translation is here revised by both of them, and to Prof. Hitchcock has appended notes critical, explanatory and historical, and Prof. Brown has prefixed an elaborate introduction, in which he discusses the history, purpose and scope and doctrine of the Teaching with great fullness and candor. It goes without saying that the work is very able and learned, and it might well become a text book in our theological schools, for, whether a genuine work or a forgery, and even at the latest date ascribed to it, it throws light upon the early Church. The Teaching for the most part is of a practical nature. Canon Farrar says, "the instruction here offered to the catechumens is exclusively on the way of life and the way of death, and it is probably assumed that before embracing the Christian religion at all they had been thoroughly instructed in the theological truths of the Gospel to which in this part of the book there is no allusion." The suggestion is acute, and a writer in the Lutheran Church Quarterly conjectures that the Teaching is the second part of a work of which the first part was the work now known as the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, in which was taught Doctrine while the Teaching taught Duty. They were intended to supplement each other. If the former work has always been reckoned among the pseudographs, it might throw some light, if the conjecture should prove a truth, upon the genuineness of the latter. But we have exceeded our space, and can only add that this volume is admirably printed upon fine paper, and is a luxury to lovers of good books.

DOWN THE RAVERS. By Charles Egbert Craddock. (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.) pp. 190. Price $1.

One might almost call this simple and pretty story an "Idyl of the Tennessee Mountains." It does not go outside the narrowest range of scenery, it is concerned with very few personages, but its effects are on the scale of the highest literary art. Unlike as can well be in all the surroundings, there is something that reminds us of Hawthorne's treatment of his characters in his "Twice-told Tales." There is the same concentration of interest in a single mental picture. Everything is subordinated to the working of the mind of the young mountaineer, who thinks he has found a gold mine, and is defrauded of his secret by a more cunning associate. While it is less elaborate than some of her other works, we think the authoress (the nom de plume is an open secret) has shown as great evidence of real power in this simple story as in anything which has yet appeared from her pen. She is manifesting not a little of the same peculiar genius which achieved such triumphs for the name of George Eliot.

LETTERS ON DAILY LIFE. By Elizabeth M. Sewall. (New York: E. & J. B. Young & Co.) pp. 352. Price 82.

Miss Sewall ought to be well known to most of our readers. If anything can increase their liking it will be an admirable work like this. They are letters addressed to imaginary pupils, but they are the results of actual experience. They impress us as being a wonderful union of clear common-sense with a high religious principle. They are writings primarily for young girls who have left school; but they are full of valuable thoughts for older readers. Even the clergy may get some useful points for sermons from more than one passage. They are what their title purports, "On Daily Life," and take account of the things which come into the ordinary experience of most young ladies in a household. While they are meant for English girls, they have plenty of application to this side of the water.

MADAM HOW AND LADY WHY. OF FIRST LESSONS IN EARLY LIPS FOR CHILDREN. Globe Readings from Standard Authors. By Charles Kingsley. Illustrated. (New York and London: Macmillan & Co.) pp. 321. Price 50c.

We have but one doubt concerning this charming book, and that is whether it be not over the heads of the average juveniles. There is no telling what kind of book the ordinary boy will fancy, unless he be one of the omnivorous sort, who must read whether or no. The taste for reading often wakes up suddenly and in a very unexpected direction. But if a boy's fancy turns in the direction of the things described in "Madam How and Lady Why," we cannot conceive of a more delightful volume for him. Canon Kingsley was a master in description of nature, wonderful alike in his power of seizing all salient points, and also in his reserve, which kept him from over-statement.

KAMERAMBA, THE CONQUERING KING. The Mystery of his Birth, Loves, and Conquests. A Romance of Hawaii. By C. M. Newell, Knight Companion of the Royal Order of Kapitiari, Author of "Kalani'ouahu," "Pepe Nui's," etc. (New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.) pp. 396.

In compliance with our duty as reviewers we have read this volume through from beginning to end. That same duty bids us to refrain from advising any one else to do the like, unless especially interested in Sandwich Island history. It seems to us to bear about the same relation to legitimate history as Miss Porter's "Scottish Chiefs" to the real story of Wallace and Bruce. Nor do we think that the exigencies of romance require the unmitigated paganism of certain passages.

MCCALLA & STAVELY issue a pamphlet of extracts from the reports of the Faculty of the Divinity School, Philadelphia, which gives a good account of the condition and prospects of the institution.

THE British Quarterly for July (Leonard, Scott & Co.), has three papers which will interest our readers, "The Coptic Churches in Egypt," "Titles Ordinary and Extraordinary," and "The Revised Old Testament."

ST. GILES Printing Company, Edinburgh, have published as tracts, "Whatever Made you Join the English Church?" and the "Position of the Episcopal Church," the latter a sermon by the Rev. Geo. T. S. Farquhar.

THE Apostolic Ministry, by the Rev. I. M. Atwood, D.D. (Universalist) and the Rev. William A. Rich, is the title of a new work upon the ministry. It seems a pity that Mr. Rich, who seems thoroughly equipped, had not had a focman worthy of his steel. It was difficult to deal with a man and call him learned, who believes the English Church was founded by Henry VIII. We can only say of Mr. Rich that "thrice he slew the slain." The pamphlet is published by James Post & Co.

In the August Art Amateur there are seven plates of supplement designs, and the frontispiece reproduces some of the pictures of the recent Paris Salon. The note-book gives an account of the Royal Academy, and Gallery and Studio is devoted to Gerome, Jewish artists and Christian subjects, and Victor Hugo as an artist, with illustrations. Decoration and Furniture shows some full page decorative figure designs by L. Penet, Annibale Carracci, and a flower study by J. Von Hussen, from a painting in the Louvre. There are in the number reproductions of two paintings by Frank Moss in the Cathedral at Philadelphia, "Christ in the Temple" and "The Resurrection of Jairus' Daughter," and also of "Christ before the People," a marble statue by Autokolaki.

MY BROOK.

Oh, the music that's in my waterfall !
I wish you could hear it, it gathers it all
In its way from the hills.

It begins the sweet song
Away back in the woods, and it ripples along Where trees bending low with their burden of green

Hang lovingly over the clear mountain stream,
And columbines lean thro' the tasselled grass
To whisper soft words as the brown waters pass ;

And the tender wild things of the wood are there—

Soft mosses and daintiest maiden-hair,
Trailing arbutos, with strawberry-vine—
All nestling close by this brook of mine ;
All the mysteries subtle, and sweet, and rare,
Of the summer woods and the summer air,
All the secrets of cunningly-folded ferns
And of downy willow-buds it learns ;
All the forest-music that haunts the night,
All the voices of birds that wake with the light.

All the sights, and the sounds, and the odors of spring,
All the joy and the gladness of everything,
With the glory and light of heaven above—
All these my brook brings me—my brook that I love !

The pines and the hemlocks, the beeches and firs,

All talk to my brook till it murmurs and purrs
With a gentle content, like a happy child
That saunters through glade and forest wild,
And croons, as she goes, some tender strain
That tells all the tale of the woods again.
So my brook ripples and wanders away,
Singing forever a simple lay

Of worn old rocks, all gray and brown,
With the clinging lichen about them grown ;
Of mossy banks where blue violets hide,
And bright holly hails for Christmas-tide ;
Of noisy babble, of murmurings sweet,
Of shaded nooks where young lovers meet ;
Of the children's laughter and children's woes,
Of all sweet, wild songs no poet knows.
So, giving the love it was meant to give,
And living the life it was meant to live,
With its song growing sweeter day by day,
The pretty brook runs from the hills away,
Till it comes to the brink of the river, where
A leap it must make thro' the quivering air.

The free life is over, its loveliness past,
The gay brook must go to the ocean at last !
But think you she falters or lingers in fear !
Ah, no, tho' she perish, the duty is here !
With a quick splash of love for the wild woodland home,
It trembles far back on the white, rushing foam !

Oh, brave little brook ! she gains a new strength,
And with full organ-peal, that goes back all the length
Of her bright, loving life, with its gatherings sweet,
All joys, all gleaming, she springs forth to meet
The swift rush of the river that flows at our feet !

But no river of Death—it's the true Life at last—
For the day's duty's done, the day's ministry past.

That's the brook's story. I heard it all
In the music that's in my waterfall !

ROBERT ORD'S ATONEMENT.

BY ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY.

CHAPTER XXX.

A Woman's Reason:—"I Love Him Because I Love Him."

"Dear soul, not so!
That time doth keep for us some happy years,
That God has portioned out our smiles and tears,
Thou knowest and I know.

"Therefore I bear
This winter-tide as bravely as I may,
Patiently waiting for the bright spring day
That cometh with thee, Dear."—Arnold.

The bright beams of a December sun awoke Rotha the next morning, and a pleasant conviction that things were not quite as they were yesterday, and that something very wonderful had befallen her, was the first sensation that stole upon her.

How different everything was from yesterday !

Then she had wakened to a sense of weariness and discomfort, a cold sea-fog had enveloped everything ; Meg had come shivering into her room, bringing a gust of raw dampness with her. But to-day, when Rotha opened her eyes, all was glitter and light : a fresh wind swept over the lawn, stirring the shining rainpools ; the drops were still glistening on the evergreens, a robin chirped busily in the ivy. Out beyond in the morning sun lay the chain of low grass hillocks, long stretches of yellow sands, and then the blue curve of the bay—Weyburn sloping in the distance like a breath of dun-colored cloud. Everywhere, as far as the eye could reach, were sail-ponds, trails of black sea-weed, purple rocks uncovered in the sun, and masses of hum-mocky sand. Rotha looked almost as bright as the morning itself as she sat opposite Meg at the sunny breakfast-table ;
upstairs Prue and Catherine were singing over their work ; the open windows and clanging doors bore witness to the fresh sea-breezes. Hannah Farebrothers, in her snowy sun-bonnet, was pulling cabbages in the kitchen-garden. Peter came in at the green door on the lawn with Jock and Jasper barking at his heels ; Fidgets flew down the lawn, his every hair bristling, to repel the intruders ; and Garton's black cat, Cinders, who was taking a constitutional on her neighbor's wall, stepped gingerly among the broken bottles, looking down at them all in sooty disdain.

"What a beautiful day ! Oh, how happy
I am !" thought Rotha as, breakfast over, she stood by the open glass door feeding the robins ; she broke off to wave a smiling good-by to Meg, who went down the garden with her music-books under her arm.
"I am going to the organ first, and then to the school," Meg had said to her. Rotha looked after her with curious, wistful eyes.
"How strange it must feel to have lived one's life and to have been disappointed with it !" thought the girl sadly. "Meg cares only for her children and her music ;
she has no world of her own at all ; she only lives in other people's lives—in mine and in little Stacy Maurice's, for example.

I fancy, by the way she talks about her, that Stacy is her favorite. She spends her whole life in doing good and praying for that good-for-nothing husband of hers ; and yet, I suppose, when she married him she expected to be happy as I am," moralized Rotha, with the unconscious superiority of one who feels that her own life will be so different.

She was rather absent when Hannah came in with a hudget of domestic news.
She gave all sorts of contradictory orders to the astonished woman, and then laughed and scolded herself in a breath. While Hannah talked about the miller and the price of flour, and the reasons why the last batch of bread had been so slack-baked, and how Prue's grandmother would find them in new-laid eggs all the year round at a cheaper rate than Gammer Stokes would, Rotha was wondering when Garton would be round, and how he would look, and what she would say to him, and whether he had told the vicar—which latter point was speedily settled for her by the entrance of the vicar himself.

Rotha had not expected him, and his visit took her quite by surprise, and for once in her life she felt decidedly nervous ; she colored and stood quite still by the window till he came up to her.

"Well, Rotha?" he said. He waited till Mrs. Farebrothers had curtsied and withdrawn, and then he held out his two hands to the girl almost fondly. How pretty she looked as she stood there before him with downcast eyes, with her dark lashes sweeping her cheek ! The gray dress and soft blue ribbons seemed to lend her color.

"Is it really so, my child?" he said earnestly. "Have you quite made up your mind?" And Rotha's happy blush was sufficient answer.

What a long talk they had waking up and down the sunny old garden ! How wisely, and with what gentleness he talked to her ! Rotha lost her shyness now as she listened to him.

He told her in grave uncompromising words how the world would look upon her choice. "If she wished to marry Garton," he said, "and had made up her mind that it was for her happiness, it was not for them to interfere. But he would have her consider the thing in all its bearings, and not gloss over its difficulties."

He touched very tenderly, too, on Garton's failings, taking care to do justice to his nobler qualities. "He is very humbly-minded—singularly so," the vicar added,
"and his faith is almost childlike. He will love you dearly, Rotha," he continued ; "it is in his nature to be faithful." And then he hinted more than once at that want of ballast which was Garton's most serious defect.

"Gar is such a lovable fellow, and is so full of grand impulses," he said regretfully ;
"but, Rotha, I am half afraid that you are cleverer than he ; a woman ought not to be cleverer than her husband."

"Goodness is better than cleverness," returned Rotha, blushing. She claved with a faith that was almost touching to her belief in Garton's goodness, and then she added naively, "I do not like to be called clever."

"Goodness is not everything," returned the vicar gravely. "In marrying, a woman ought to be able to look up to her husband—to lean on him, so to speak. Do you think you could depend on Garton? that you could go to him for advice in all your difficulties and troubles? Be assured, that the happiest woman in the world needs such help daily. And then if he could not give it, think, Rotha, how grievous it would be to be disappointed in him after all."

"I shall not be disappointed. He is sure to be good to me," replied the girl innocently. "I suppose, as he is not much older, that we shall help each other; and then we can always come to you for advice, as I do now," she added timidly.

"When you have a husband you will go to him. Mary tells me everything." He smiled a little over the girl's refreshing naïveté, though it made him rather grave inwardly. He was afraid, as Mrs. Carruthers was, that Rotha was a little misled by her imagination in her estimate of Garton's character.

Rotha in reality was a good deal puzzled by the vicar's questions; his solemnity disturbed her. The sun was shining; the birds were twittering around her. She was happy; the world was beautiful.

"Oh, why will everybody be so grave about it? Was no one ever engaged before?" thought Rotha indignantly. "What does it matter, if he be not clever, if I love him?" She put on a provoking little face as she turned to the vicar. "I shall tell Garton that I shall always come to you for advice," she said, nodding at him. She had taken her handkerchief in her old way and had tied it gipsy-like over her brown hair. Her eyes were full of shy happiness.

"Well, well," he said, smiling; "if it must be so, it must be, I suppose. If I were Gar, I would not have you with such a proviso." He patted her hand thoughtfully, and then relapsed into gravity.

"Yes, it was a good thing," he said, "for both their sakes, that Garton was going away; it would test the reality of their affection for each other, and would make a man of Gar by teaching him to depend on his own resources; he would come back worthier of her than he was now."

Rotha looked up in some alarm at this. "Going away—Garton going away!" she said. And just then the vicar espied Garton himself coming through the trees to meet them.

Another time Rotha would have been rather bashful at thus meeting her lover for the first time under the vicar's eye; but consternation at this sudden piece of news overbore this feeling, and as Garton came up to them—rather sheepishly, it must be confessed, at the sight of his brother—she put out her hand to him with a little impatience at his delay.

"What is this?" she said, rather peremptorily. "What does it all mean? The vicar says you are going away." She looked up at him with wide-open eyes full of distress, with a fall of the lip like a child's; she actually believed that Garton was going to New Zealand after all.

Garton took the little hand tenderly; he looked from one to the other rather doubtfully. The vicar was grieved to see how worn and haggard Garton's face still was; strong agitation, sleeplessness, and the alternation from despair to sudden joy, and now the reluctance with which he viewed his enforced absence for so many months, made sad ravages in the young man's appearance; the radiant look of last night had almost disappeared.

"What have you told her, Anstin?" he said, addressing his brother. "Robert has detained me, Rotha; I meant to have told you myself." He held her hand in a grip that was almost painful.

"Don't—you are hurting me; you are always hurting me, Garton," said the girl in a droll voice.

After the vicar had left them she showed the red mark to Garton, who looked grave over it.

"My great hands are enough to crush those little fingers," he said, stroking them remorsefully. "What a little hand you have, Rotha—such a small thin hand!"

"Never mind, it is not a pretty one," returned Rotha hastily, drawing it away. "Garton, am I to understand that you are going to New Zealand, after all?"

"To New Zealand!" laughed Gar. "No; not unless you have a fancy for going there too. I can't say that I have any desire just now to pitch my tent among wigwams."

"Are there wigwams in New Zealand? How funny!" exclaimed Rotha. "I thought by the vicar's laughing that I must be wrong, after all; but he certainly said that you were going away; and when—and where?" demanded Rotha, somewhat puzzled.

"Rotha, dear, I will tell you. Yes, I am going away," he returned in a troubled voice. He began to explain to her as well as he could how it had all come about, but at the first mention of Robert's name she stopped him.

"Robert thinks it necessary! What right has he to interfere between you and me? If he hates me, is that any reason why he should send you away?" she exclaimed indignantly.

"Hush, dear; no one sends me away. I am going because it is right for me to go," returned Gar, with a touch of starchy independence. "Sweetheart"—the young man used the word in its Saxon sense, which rendered it infinitely touching—"sweetheart, do you think I should be worthy of you if I shirked my duty?"

"No," returned Rotha in a choked voice. "If you wish to leave me, you must do so, I suppose."

"If I wish to leave you? Oh, Rotha, how can you say such things," burst out the poor fellow, "when you know I worship the ground you walk on?" How eloquent he could be—this great clumsy Garton! "Don't make it too hard for me," pleaded Gar; "it is bad enough to have to go away without leaving you sorry and caring for it."

"Would you have me not care? How cold it is out here!" shivered the girl. Her kerchief had become untied, and her brown hair blew softly over her neck; the pretty color had faded out of her cheeks; she looked pale and wistful.

"Perhaps we had better go in. I thought that red cloak would have kept you warm," he returned; "but these winds are so treacherous." He followed her through the open glass doors; the robins were still chattering and twittering in the ivy. Rotha said nothing as Garton placed her favorite chair by the fire and brought her a footstool; she sat with the red cloak dropping off from her shoulders, and her hands folded wearily in her lap. Garton stood and watched her with that strange new heart-ache of his till he saw the tears in her eyes, and then he could bear it no longer; he was standing beside her "mountains high," as she phrased it in her droll way, but now he suddenly got on one knee and put his arm around her. "Don't, Rotha; don't, my dear girl," he said—"just as though he had been used to comfort me every day of my life," Rotha said afterwards.

"What were they after all but boy and girl in spite of their years? No one but Rotha would have thought much of Garton's eloquence or of his clumsy attempts to cheer her, and yet she was as honestly comforted by it all as though he had used the most persuasive arguments.

They got up a figurative tableau of Millais's "Huguenots" after that, which was very striking and characteristic in its way. Rotha was for tying the white scarf round her lover's arm, but Garton would not hear of it for a moment. Perhaps in her secret heart she was only trying him—very young women like to test their power sometimes; it did not offend Rotha one bit that he preferred his independence and his duty. Garton's firmness and loyalty to his brothers satisfied that duty-loving nature of hers. "How can they say he wants bal-last?" she thought indignantly, as she remembered the vicar's grave warning.

She said something of this to Garton afterwards when their little scene had been enacted; they were sitting now side by side, like sensible people, and Rotha looked as grave as a judge.

"I should not have cared for you half so much, after all, if you had not been firm in this," she said to him. She looked at the young man with sweet serious eyes, in which there was more approval than pain. Garton, in spite of his heavy heart, thrilled at her praise.

"I thought you would feel so; I was certain of it," he replied in a low voice.

"And you must not go and talk about it as though it were six years," continued Rotha cheerfully, who did nothing by halves, and was determined now to think the best of it. She was getting quite brave and matter-of-fact over it all; but such is the perversity of human nature that Garton, though he came out so strong in the character of consoler, relapsed dismally at this juncture.

"I don't know about years; I think it will be an eternity to me," he rejoined lugubriously. "It does seem so hard just when we were going to be so happy, and Wednesday will be here in no time."

"Why, it is Friday now. Oh," gasped Rotha—a sudden cold water damped her resolution and chilled it thoroughly—"Wednesday, how dreadfully near! Could they not spare us another day?"

"It would not do; besides, what is the good of prolonging one's misery? Of course every hour is worth its weight in gold," returned Gar, somewhat contradictorily, feeling all at once like a condemned criminal waiting for a reprieve.

"No; it would not do," returned Rotha, decisively; "we had better make the most of our time and not spoil the little that remains to us. Perhaps it will be better for us both when you are once gone; six months is not such a long time after all, and then, you know, I shall expect plenty of letters."

"I am not a good hand at that, I am afraid," said Gar, with a rueful smile. "Robert is the letter-writer of the family. After all, Rotha, I am afraid that you will find out that you are cleverer than I."

The vicar's very words. Another dash of cold water to Rotha.

"Never mind if I am," she returned, impatiently. "I do not think that sort of thing has anything to do with us two. You can write and tell me, I suppose, what you do on board ship, and what friends you make, and all that; and I daresay you will contrive a short message or two to Rube," she added, mischievously.

"Oh, I daresay I shall manage as much as that, and perhaps a little more. I can tell you, for instance——"

But it is useless repeating all Gar's words. Love-making was a novelty to him as well as to Rotha, and most likely he said and did a hundred extravagant things. Robert's cool, quiet style would not have suited Gar's passionate nature at all.

Rotha thought it all very beautiful; and then they set themselves to plan out the few days that remained to them. The vicar had made Garton promise that he would bring Rotha round to the vicarage in the course of the morning, and he further stipulated that she should remain there the rest of the day. This they both considered charming. The next morning Garton was under an engagement to accompany Robert to Stretton, where he was to talk over business and receive final orders from Mr. Ramsay. Robert was to stay at Stretton over Sunday, but Garton promised to take an early train that he might spend at least an hour or two at Bryn. "This day was as good as lost," Garton observed, regretfully; but Rotha consoled him by telling him that they would be together all Sunday, and that he was to bring Rube up to tea. Likewise she yielded to his entreaties that Meg and she should do a morning's shopping in Thornborough on Monday, where Garton would be most of the day getting together necessaries for his voyage. Robert had agreed to do the greater share of the business, and was hard at work already in Garton's service, as, indeed, were Mary and old Sarah; and, though they did not know it, he was at that very moment planning how he could stint himself to lay out a few more pounds on his brother's poor outfit.

"Yes; but we shall have to be back pretty early," observed Rotha, who was very brisk and businesslike over these details; "you have not forgotten the party at the Rudelsheims'?"

Now the Rudelsheims were among the naturalized strangers appertaining to Blackscar and its environs. They were worthy folk of German extraction, and were rather favorites with the vicarage people; but they followed Mrs. Stephen Knowles's example in setting at defiance all Blackscar tradition, and in utterly abhorring the very name of tea-parties.

The tide of popular disfavor had indeed been too strong for that latter lady, who had succumbed so far as to tolerate kettle-drums and to allow tea and thin bread-and-butter to be handed round at an unwholesome hour of the afternoon; and Mrs. Rudelsheim, or Madame Rudelsheim, as she dearly loved to be called, would have nothing to say to such weak sophistries. She took every opportunity of laughing at Mrs. Stephen Knowles's "slop dawdles," as she called them.

"When I entertain my friends, I will entertain them properly," she would say. "Dancing is good for young people, and I do not see why they should not have it." And, in accordance with this peremptory benevolence, the Rudelsheims issued invitations for a party.

Rotha was going, but not Mary. Mrs. Ord had scruples about dancing—theoretical, but not practical ones; but the vicar had promised to look in during the evening, and Aunt Eliza had engaged to chaperone both Rotha and Nettie. Robert had an invitation, and so had Garton, and Rotha was exulting from the latter a reluctant promise to be there.

He was not in the mood for dancing, he said; and then there were other objections. Madame Rudelsheim's parties were rather grand affairs—at least in Gar's eyes. He could not tell Rotha very well that his dress-coat was so shabby that he was ashamed of it; neither could he explain that even gloves and boots were a consideration to him. Gar never felt his poverty quite so bitterly as he did at this moment. If Rotha had been as poor as himself he would have confessed his difficulties without hesitation; but their hours together were numbered, and she had alleged all sorts of pretty arguments why he should be there, and Gar felt that in this point he was completely to yield.

"And the next day—what shall we do on the next day?" exclaimed Rotha, when this was settled. She looked just a little grave and fearful when Garton told her what they should do.

"It will be my last day," said Gar, sadly, and I must spend it with you and Rube. There will be packing and all manner of things to settle, I suppose; but I think we could manage to go over for a few hours to Burnley, you, and I, and Rube. I think that was the happiest day I ever spent in my life, and I want to see the dear old spot once more."

"Yes, we will go," returned Rotha, dreamily. What strange fancies she had had in those dim old woods! She thought it was very nice of Garton to propose it. By this time it was growing late, and Rotha reminded him that Mary would be expecting them.

It was later still when they got to the Vicarage, for Meg came in, and that detained them. Garton looked sheepish again when Mrs. Carruthers shook hands with him and wished him joy; but he did not look so when, a few minutes afterward, Rotha and he walked down to the Vicarage. Mary was expecting them, and met her friend with open arms. "Oh, my dear, Gar is not good enough for you," said the affectionate creature, in a voice between laughing and crying. "I don't care a bit for your hearing me," she continued, nodding at Garton, who was standing by, looking shamefaced and happy; "if you love her you will not mind being told how good she is. Rotha, how shall we manage to make enough of you, and to think of it being Garton, after all?" finished Mary, who was still in a highly-strung pitch of excitement, and had kept up a variation of this one particular sentence ever since the news had been told her.

Belle came down presently, while Mary and Rotha were still talking. Both of them absently started at her glastly looks. She went up and kissed Rotha with some show of kindness, but without any attempt at congratulation, and then went and sat silently in her place.

Only once Rotha attempted to speak to her—once when Garton, who had been lingering by her chair all the afternoon, had been summoned by the vicar to come down and speak to a choir-boy who was in disgrace, and Mary, who had a secret liking for the culprit, had followed him. When they had gone out Rotha crossed the room and knelt down beside her.

"Dear Belle," she whispered, "will you not wish me happiness? Every one has but you." She repeated the speech the moment she had said it, when she saw the reproachful look with which she answered her:

"Oh, Rotha, how can you? Do I look as though I could wish any one happiness? No, I don't mean that; I do wish it you, dear, none the less that you have everything, and that my heart is broken," and, before Rotha could say a word, the unhappy girl had thrown her arms round Rotha's neck in a burst of bitter weeping.

CHAPTER XXXI.

In Hoc Spero.

"Through my happy tears there look'd in mine
A face as sweet as morning violets;
A face alight with love ineffable,
The starry heart hid under trembling though."
—Masey.

"To his eye
There was but one beloved face on earth,
And that was shining on him; he had look'd
Upon it till it could not pass away;
He had no breath, no being, but in hers,
She was his voice; he did not speak to her,
But trembled on her words; she was his sigh,
For his eye follow'd hers, and saw with hers,
Which color'd all his objects;—he had ceased
To live within himself; she was his life,
The ocean to the river of his thoughts.
Which terminated all; upon a tone,
A touch of hers, his blood would ebb and flow,
And his cheek change tempestuously."
—Byron.

Belle's fit of agitation lasted so long that Rotha was frightened. In vain she caressed her, in vain she implored her, with a hundred endearing expressions, to tell her what had occurred to distress her. Belle would say nothing, and absolutely refused to be comforted. She had a paroxysm of coughing presently, and then she allowed Rotha to assist her to her own room and do many little womanly offices for her. She lay quite still, with heaving breast and closed eyes, while Rotha loosened her hair and freshened her burning face. But when she had finished, Belle put out her hand to her and said hoarsely:

"Do not mind me; go now. Garton will be wanting you."

"But I should like to stay with you," returned Rotha pityingly. But Belle shook her head.

"I would rather be alone; you know I must be alone sometimes. I shall like to think of you all being happy downstairs. You are too good to me, Rotha. I do not deserve it, and I never think of any one but him."

She looked up with quivering lips when Rotha kissed her.

"Do not tell any one; do not let Mary know that I have been so silly. She would not understand. I shall be punished for it, for I shall not be able to come downstairs and see him to-night."

And a bitter sigh echoed her words as Rotha closed the door.

Rotha had no intention of obeying Belle by keeping her counsel. She found Mary alone when she returned to the drawing-room, and at once told her what had occurred, taking blame on herself for her inconsiderate words. Mrs. Ord, who looked very distressed over the whole recital, relieved her at once by throwing quite another light on the matter.

She told Rotha that Robert had been in that morning, quite contrary to his usual custom, and, finding Belle and her together, had told Belle in her presence about Garton's engagement and his own appointment.

"Robert had behaved beautifully," Mrs. Ord added, "and had broken the double news very gently to Belle, who had, on the whole, seemed to have taken it very quietly. He put everything in a clear concise way, drew a little on the benefits of the large salary, and the comfortable house that awaited them; and then asked her in a quite straightforward way whether she thought she could get ready for him toward the end of February, or if she would prefer waiting till a few days before they sailed, 'unless indeed,' he remarked with a smile, 'you are unwilling to leave Mary and come with me so far.'"

He went on a little more after this, and then pressed gently for her answer. Neither of them could see Belle's face, for she had kept her hand over her eyes all the time he had talked. Once or twice she had shivered slightly, but for the most part she seemed keeping herself still by force. When he had finished she had uncovered her eyes and looked at them so strangely that neither of them could understand it; and there had been a strained worn look about her face that had gone to her sister's heart.

"You know I am not well enough. I don't think I shall ever be well enough to be married," she had said to them; and then calling her sister to her, "Mary, tell him I cannot. Does he not know what is the matter with me?"

"I don't think any one knows what is the matter with you, Belle," he returned, but Mary saw a flushed uneasy look come into his face. Belle caught her breath with a little sob of impatient pain as he went on. No, she was not well; he knew that, he repeated, but she must give him her word to see a doctor without delay; and Belle, in a tone of reckless misery, promised that she would; and then she had surprised them both by fixing on Mr. Greenock, the infirmarian doctor. She would not hear of the family practitioner, Dr. Chapman.

"Very well, then, it shall be Greenock." Robert had returned and, as far as he knew, he was quite as clever as the Blackscar practitioner. And then he begged her smilingly to compose herself, and to leave all other arrangements to him and Mary.

"And what did Belle say?" interrupted Rotha breathlessly at this point. She had turned red and pale over Mary's narration. She knew now why Belle had shrunk from the look of her happy face. "Oh, Mrs. Ord," she cried, "I am so afraid that Belle thinks herself very ill, and that it is preying on her mind."

"That is what I think," returned Mary, drying her eyes. "I have told Austin so, over and over again. Oh, Rotha, suppose this is the beginning of decline; she looks so like poor Aunt Isabel, who had disease of the lungs and died quite young. And then to think that Robert would not let you take her away."

"He does not understand," returned Rotha in a low voice. "But I am afraid now a milder climate ought to have been tried long ago. I do not see myself how she is to be fit for a long sea voyage. But Mr. Greenock will tell you. Did she say anything more before she left you?"

"No; Austin came in, and she let us kiss her, but at the first word of congratulation she stopped us. Robert wanted her to go and lie down—he is very gentle and considerate with her now—and she went away directly. But I heard her tell Austin first that she had promised to see Mr. Greenock, and that he would tell us what she had tried so often lately to tell us, only she could not. And as she said this she turned so white that Austin put his arm round her, thinking she felt faint. But it was not faintness, Rotha, it was misery. She knows she is worse than we think."

"Why not send for Mr. Greenock at once?" interrupted Rotha hastily; but Mary shook her head. It was hard to see Mrs. Ord's fair face so troubled and worn.

"No, it will not do to hurry it. We know Belle too well for that. She has promised to see him on Tuesday, and Robert will not be back from Stretton till then. Tuesday will be Garton's last evening too, and Wednesday will be Christmas Eve. Oh, Rotha, what a Christmas this will be for us all, if Mr. Greenock says that Robert will have to go alone!"

"He cannot leave her surely?" interrupted Rotha.

"He must. What can he do? He will have thrown up his situation too. If she be not well enough to accompany him, the engagement will have to be broken off altogether, and that will kill her. Oh, Rotha," continued Mrs. Ord remorsefully, "I did not mean to have said all this to-day. I was trying to forget it when you and Garton came in. Ah, my dear, my dear, you must not cry to-day of all days, just when we all meant to be so happy too."

"I cannot help it," returned Rotha struggling with her tears. "It seems so dreadful for her, and then for him not to see it." She broke off suddenly as Garton re-entered the room, and after that nothing more was said between them.

This conversation damped the rest of the evening to Rotha. Garton, though he sat near her and talked to her, missed the old merry smiles. Rotha was grave and abstracted, almost sad. Mary was up stairs with her sister most of the time, and the vicar was busy. Robert never made his appearance at all. Just before she went away she stole for a moment into Belle's room to wish her good-night; but Belle seemed weary, and hardly spoke to her, and with a heavy heart she crept away. The next day things were hardly more cheerful at the vicarage; Robert and Garton had gone to Stretton; Belle had relapsed into one of her taciturn moods; and Mary, after a few attempts, hardly made an effort to be cheerful. She was very sympathetic, however, and had a long confidential talk with Rotha about her own prospects. And in the afternoon the vicar, seeing how things were, put aside his own business and took them and the four boys for a country ramble, which lasted so long that Garton had already made his appearance at Bryn, and was harassing the soul of Mrs. Carruthers by his restlessness and repeated expressions of wonder as to what had become of Rotha.

The walk had done its work thoroughly, and Rotha came in by and by just as Garton loved to see her, with her brown hair ruffled and her bright face freshened with the wind. She had brought them all in, in triumph with her, and Mary laughed and looked like her old self as she helped Mrs. Carruthers to make arrangements for so large a party. Rotha let her do it; she stood talking to Garton in a low voice till she was summoned to her place at the head of the table.

These sort of impromptu gatherings were Rotha's delight. She had sent off Guy to fetch Reuben, and when he returned with the lad her pleasure was complete. Garton indeed would have preferred having Rotha to himself—love-making and tender speeches were hardly possible before the lads. But Rotha, in her unselfishness, never thought of such a thing; she was quite content to beam at Garton at intervals across the boys' rosy faces. She talked more to the vicar than to him; it made her shy to encounter several pairs of round curious eyes every time she addressed him. Rufus and Laurie were always telegraphing their astonishment to each other, and Arty's audible remarks made her desperate; she wished Garton would not break off his conversation every minute to catch her faintest words; he did all sorts of things, this clumsy lover of hers, that confused and put her out of countenance. The vicar could not help admiring the graceful tact with which she checked and kept him in order. After tea, when Mary had stolen away to look after Belle, she taught the boys games, and made them happy in a dozen ways. She played and sang to them, and joined in some of their favorite glees; but, through it all, she was always conscious that Garton was near her or following her about with his wistful eyes.

She went into the long drawing-room once, in the moonlight, to put away some music, and there she was startled by seeing him standing between the pillars like a black shadow. "Oh, Garton," she said, "I did not know you were following me. How you startled me!" And then, as he did not answer, she went up to him and touched him on the arm.

"Come, Garton, the boys are going. I think the vicar wants you."

"Let him want me," returned Garton, detaining her. "Rotha, do you know that you have hardly spoken to me this evening? I have been almost jealous of those boys—Rube especially."

"Rube, your favorite? Oh, for shame!"

"My dear, I suppose it is only natural. I have so few hours left to me, and they will see you day after day." He held her for a moment, as though under some strange agitation. "Rotha, put your little hand here for a moment," and he held it firmly to his heart. "Do you know, dear, it aches so to-night that I can hardly bear it?"

She looked up in his face, almost frightened. Was it fancy, or did the moonlight make him look so pale?

"My dear Garton—my poor boy!"

He smiled at her.

"I cannot help it, dear; it is a sort of feeling—a presentiment, I suppose. People are always talking about those sort of things, and perhaps it has come to me. I cannot get it out of my mind that it would be better for us both if I were not going away."

"Oh, Garton!"

"There, perhaps I ought not to have said that. These things are always in God's hands, and I am doing my duty. You remember what you said about putting 'the hand to the plough?' There must be no looking back in one's work, eh, Rotha?"

"No; but I do not know how I am to let you go," said Rotha remorsefully, feeling that she had not made enough of him. She heard the boys tramping out of the front door, but for once she had forgotten her duties as hostess. "Oh, Gar, if you talk like this I shall never be able to let you go."

"Yes, you will," he returned, with that wonderful new gentleness which had come to him in the last few days, and which reminded her of the vicar. "I do not fear you, Rotha. You are the bravest girl I have ever seen. You would let me go if you knew that I should never come back to you."

"Dear Garton, do you think I would be so hard-hearted?"

"It would not be hard-heartedness, Rotha; but perhaps I shall never make you understand, any more than you would if I told you that I loved you a hundred times more than you loved me."

"No, indeed," returned Rotha, rather indignant at this admission.

"Nevertheless it would be the truth," he returned quietly. "I have watched you so much these two days, and I know you so well, dear—don't misunderstand me," he continued, with a touch of his old vehemence, as Rotha tried to draw away her hand, "I am not complaining—why should I? It could not be otherwise. The time may come—I do not say it will, Rotha—when you will give me all that is in you to give; but it will not come to me just yet. Hush! Is that Austin calling?"

"He is only speaking to Mrs. Carruthers. Garton, what makes you talk so strangely to-night? Have I done anything to hurt you?"

"Hurt me, my darling?" But she need never have asked the question, for his answer fully satisfied her.

"What a grand room this is, Rotha!" he said presently, when they were still standing gazing out to the moonlighted lawn. "You look too young to be the mistress of this great house; and to think that it all belongs to you!"

"Do you mind it?" she returned softly. "I am keeping it all for you and your brother."

"For me!" He absolutely started. A sudden film came before his eyes; he had not realized before that all these good things were to come to him.

"Yes; but we must not forget Robert," said Rotha, following out the unspoken thought.

"Do you mean you and I? No, we will not forget him. You must not think me strange or ungrateful, Rotha; but it almost oppresses me to think that I may possibly share all this some day; it does not seem right or true. I wonder," he paused, looking round him with strange unseeing eyes; and then he stooped and kissed her softly once or twice.

What was that dull pain beating at his heart—that shadow that darkened his face with subtle trouble, and which haunts him even now? What though he never dwell here, in the presence of the woman he loves? "In thy Father's house there are many mansions" for thee and such as thee, Garton. Ord.

The next day was Sunday. It was one of those soft wintry days which seemed snatched from the early spring. The robins chirped busily in the ivy; here and there a snowdrop peeped out from the ground. The sea was all in a glitter again, with a maize of deep blue shadow. Rotha, in a soft blue dress, looked perfectly in unison with the day itself, Garton thought, as he came through the lych-gate to join her after service.

Rotha long afterwards looked back on that day as one of the most peaceful she had ever spent. Garton had lost that feverish restlessness which had somehow oppressed her in spite of herself. He was a little quieter than she had ever known him, but full of thoughtfulness for her and Reuben. Reuben came up to Bryn by Rotha's express desire, and the three spent the afternoon together in the old way.

But once, when Garton and she were left alone together, he said suddenly:

"I have been thinking, Rotha, that I should like to leave you a little keepsake, and I have nothing in the world but my mother's keeper. It is very old-fashioned, and hardly worthy of your acceptance; but I should like you to wear it, dear, when I am away." And Rotha changed color very prettily as he slipped the quaint old ring on her finger.

Nothing more was said for a few minutes, and then Rotha asked Garton if he did not like the old German custom of exchanging rings at a betrothal.

"There is a ring upstairs among your treasures that I should like you to wear for my sake," she said quickly; and before Garton could answer her she had left the room, and shortly after returned with the little case in her hand. She blushed a little as she held it out to him. "Look here, Garton; this ring always reminded me of you, somehow, and you must wear it as a kind of talisman to preserve you from danger. When you are lonely and home-sick you can look at it and think of me."

"But it is too beautiful. Oh, Rotha, how can you?"—and after my poor old keeper too!" he returned in a broken voice.

Garton was right as to its beauty, for the ring was of a singular design, and almost unique of its kind. In the centre was a recumbent cross formed of tiny rose diamonds set round with blue enamel, and graven on the broad gold band itself were the words, In hoc spero ("In this I hope").

Garton kissed the glittering cross reverently as Rotha put it on, and there were tears in his eyes as he thanked her. "In hoc spero," Rotha heard him whisper once or twice. "I wish all crosses were as light to carry as this!" and once, very solemnly, "Dear, you are right, and the cross is the only talisman."

THE line of life is a rugged diagonal between duty and desire.

THE QUIET CORNER.

BY THE BISHOP OF EASTON.

XXII.

Besides the wretchedness of Anxious Care the uselessness of it is most apparent. How generously is all creation provided for? What exhaustless wealth is at the command of God! The little birds, how helpless they are, imprisoned in their nest—yet God feedeth them. He condescends to watch the flight of the new-fledged sparrow and to break its fall. He hears the young ravens when they cry. He decks lilies and roses with beauty and scatters loveliest forms along the pavement of the sea. The eyes of all wait upon thee, O Lord, and thou fillest all things living with plenteousness.

Surely God has proved Himself rich enough and wise enough to provide for all His creatures. If the land be desert He can make the manna fall; if the springs be dried, the rock can yield us water; if the enemy is on every side, He can make the sea divide and furnish us a pathway. O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are His judgments, and His ways past finding out! With the volume of His providence open daily before us, holding in our hands the record of His dealings with His covenant people from the very beginning of history, we have abundant reason to know and believe that God is adequate to His majestic rule; that He will govern all things well and wisely.

Our Saviour does not require us to be insensible and to submit stoically to what we cannot help. He, Himself, was very sorrowful sometimes, and He wept over the coming sorrows of Jerusalem. Poor humanity may say with David, "when my heart is vexed I will complain." But then there must not be that corroding anxiety, that melancholy foreboding, that desolate helplessness by which so many are made miserable. All this, the Saviour teaches us, is useless—He does not say because the future is fixed and our anxieties will not alter it; but He takes us by the hand and leads us out into the midst of nature. He bids us see and recognize everywhere and in everything the presence of a Special Providence; a Father-God near at hand, seeing all, forgetting nothing. To-day's ill is all sufficient; how useless to trouble ourselves with the question what will God do to-morrow!

Anxious Care is not only useless, it is sinful.

How much has God done for us already? He gave us the most precious gift He could bestow—His only Son in whom He was well pleased. He has shewed us how much He thinks of us by the infinite price paid for our recovery. He has hidden us not to be afraid of Him, but when we pray to say, "Our Father which art in Heaven." He has sent His Holy Spirit to teach us and to comfort us. He has admitted us to the fellowship of His Holy Church, and again and again swears to us, holding forth the emblems of His Son's precious body and blood, that He will save and help sinful people who come to Him in that dear name: that we are His children, and that He has great things in reserve for us. Oh how sinful to say, yes, I know all this, but then I fear-to-morrow's trial will be more than I can bear!

Let us review the history of the past. We have never yet lacked food and raiment. Is it unreasonable to believe that God will still supply them? We have had our trials and losses and bereavements, and found them all tolerable. Is it too much to trust that in the future God will not tempt us above that we are able, but will, with the temptation, also make a way to escape?

We have had many dark days when all was cheerless and obscure, and we groped as the blind at midday, and yet the clear shining came after the rain, and our hearts were cleaner for the tears that had washed our cheeks. Oh, how wicked to fear that God's compassion will wear out, and that He will be less merciful than in the days that are past!

But, perhaps, one will say I am one of a troubled spirit. My heart knows its own bitterness, and I cannot even tell my unsuspected griefs. I am faint and weary wrestling with my besetting sin. I am dejected and sorrowful by reason of lamentable failures. Sometimes my heart will ache almost to bursting, and my tears will flow, and the impatient exclamation will burst forth: "the journey is too great for me; it were better for me to die than to live," and bear responsibilities to which I am not adequate.

Al! my brother, you forget yourself. Is not God your father, kind and reasonable and indulgent? Does He not accept the honest effort as if it were the successful result? Does He not receive the two mites and the cup of cold water when it is the best you have to give?

Was not the Man of Sorrows lonely and desolate, grieved by men's hardness of heart, and seemingly unsuccessful in his personal ministry? Does He not assure you that He knows your sorrows, and pities them? Has He not promised to come to you when the sea is boisterous, and you are spent with rowing? O thou of little faith, wherefore dost thou doubt? Believe, only believe, for all things are possible to him that believeth.

We are prone to condemn those who suffer the riches and the pleasures of life to choke the principle of religious life in the soul. Let us remember that the indulgence of Anxious Care is equally a wretchedness, a folly, and a sin. It disturbs the repose of the soul, and unfits it either for right judgment or vigorous action. It makes us, more or less, sour, sullen, fretful, and irritable, and the easiest yoke God ever laid upon man galls him when he frets under it. It is right for us to be sorrowful and uneasy sometimes, but we ought never to lose our evenness of temper, our cheerfulness of spirit, our hopefulness of good that is in reserve.

Let us meditate much upon that Special Providence, so many proofs of which are all around us, and which we have so often had occasion to recognize in our own experience. Let us try to realize that high above the storm and turmoil of life One dearer than a brother sitteth at the right hand of God, making intercession for us and sending angels to the rescue of His saints. In every hour of sadness let us cast into the bitter waters some word of Gospel comfort, and they will become sweet and wholesome. In every perplexity and apprehension let us grasp some dear promise, and we shall float with it over seas of trouble.

And if there be some deliverance or some blessing seemingly so necessary that we cannot do without it, and we are tempted to demand, Give it me or I die, then let us lift up our eyes and say, My Heavenly Father knows all my need. He spared not His Son, but gave Him up to my necessity. He would give me now in hand a world, if it would make me really happier and better. My Father, I leave all with Thee. In the sincerity of my soul I take up to-day's cross, I address myself to to-day's duty. To-morrow, Thou, Lord, wilt provide.

ISRAEL IN EGYPT.

Through the Red Sea.

Exod. xiv. 19-31.

Verse 19. "The Angel of God." Here as in similar places, this is held by expositors to signify the second Person of the Blessed Trinity. "Removed and went behind them." Placed Himself at the rear of the camp of Israel—of course to interpose between Israel and Egypt. This is a type of the delivering work of Christ. "The pillar of the cloud." This implies that it was yet day when the Egyptians came in sight of the Israelites. The change of the place of the cloud-column was a visible sign of interposition. The account mentions here the real defence first, and then the outward sign of it.

Verse 20. "It come between." The pillar of cloud was probably enlarged so as to cover the entire rear of the Israelites, and was dark on the side of Egypt but luminous to marching Israel. It lasted through the entire night.

Verse 21. "Moses stretched out his hand over the sea." Moses was holding the rod of his power. "A strong east wind." There have been many attempts to explain this miracle by a natural phenomena, as an extraordinary ebb of the tide. But the literal explanation is sufficient. The objection may be made that a wind strong enough to plough a channel through the sea would have been a serious hindrance to the march of the Hebrews. But there is nothing to prevent the concentrated force of the wind from operating on the right and left of the line of march, leaving a still space between. Of course the conditions are clearly miraculous, and this is fully confirmed by the New Testament allusions.

Verse 22. "Upon the dry ground." The same force operated upon the bed of the sea so that it was for the time dried up. "The waters were a wall unto them on their right hand and on their left." This cuts off the rationalistic interpretation of a remarkable ebb, leaving the upper part of the gulf bare. There was a wall of water between them and the head of the Red Sea—a wall corresponding in height to the depth of the sea they traversed. Possibly "the strong east wind," as its agency is mentioned, divided the waters and then they were divinely held in place.

Verse 23. "The Egyptians pursued." Probably the veil of cloud held out of view that which had taken place so that they were not aware of where they were, but only knew that the Hebrews were before them, and were expecting every moment to overtake and surround the fugitives, or to bring them to bay beside the sea.

Verse 24. "The morning watch." About two in the morning. The conditions of a tropical night are to be considered—viz., a much briefer twilight between day and dark. There can be no precise calculation unless the spot were fully known and the conditions of the sea at that time. What is required is for the whole two millions, with their flocks and herds to pass, and for the whole army of Egypt to follow and be in the midst of the sea. For this one must calculate first, the front by which the Hebrew column was deployed, and next the depth of the column. This last, probably, at the moment of mid-transit occupied the entire width of the sea—that is, its van was just reaching the further shore as its rear was leaving the Egyptian side. We then want time enough for the Egyptian army to occupy the passage left by the Israelites. "Looked through the pillar of fire and of the cloud." Psalm lxxviii; 18, 19, says with a storm. Doubtless the glow of the fiery column was seen through the cloud, and this alone would disturb the Egyptian army. The purpose was to crowd it together so that escape would become impossible. "Troubled the Egyptians." Threw them into confusion.

Verse 25. "Took off their chariot-wheels." The clashing together of the chariots in the terror produced by the fiery looking of Jehovah through the cloud broke the wheels from the axles. "Drive them heavily." They were impeded in their efforts to escape when the cry "Let us flee" was raised. "For the Lord fighteth for them." There is an intimation here that Egypt was not without the knowledge of the true God—the original faith though falling into idolatry and error.

Verse 26. "Stretch out thine hand." This was the hand holding the staff of power. Probably it was in reverse of the former motion, as Moses had undoubtedly crossed in the meantime and was on the further shore. Israel had now of course reached the other side.

Verse 27. "Returned to his strength." That is, resumed its natural power from which it had been held back. "When the morning appeared." It was so that Israel and Egypt both could see what was wrought. "The Lord overthrew." Literally "shook off," the Egyptians.

Verse 28. The ceasing of the east wind to blow and the turning round, so that it came from the west, would send the shock of the returning surges in the face of the Egyptians striving to return. This shows that it was not the flow of an ordinary tide, but much more rapid; and this verse declares that none escaped. The return wave beginning from the west cut off retreat.

Verse 29. This verse is a repetition of what went before, and emphasizes the miracle, as a miracle.

Verse 30. "Saw the Egyptians dead on the sea-shore." Not all, but enough to show what was the fate which had come upon them.

Verse 31. The work of the miracle was first in punishing Egypt, and next in convincing Israel. This last was also done.

If sorrow could enter Heaven, if a sigh could be heard there, or a tear roll down the cheek of a saint in light, it would be for lost opportunities, for time spent in neglect of God which might have been spent for His glory.

WIKKEY—A SCRAP.

CHAPTER II.—Concluded.

The following evening Lawrence found a letter from his cousin on his table.

"From what you tell me," Reginald wrote, "I should say that Wikkey must be taught through his affections: that he is capable of a strong and generous affection he has fully proved, so that I advise you not to attempt for the present much doctrinal instruction. ('Doctrinal instruction!') mentally ejaculated Lawrence: 'what does he mean? as if I could do that; ' then he read on.) What I mean is this: the boy's intellect has probably, from the circumstances of his life, been too strongly developed to have left much room for the simple faith which one has to work on in ordinary childhood, and having been used chiefly as a weapon, offensive and defensive, in the battle with life, it is not likely to prove a very helpful instrument just now, as it would probably make him quicker to discern difficulties than to accept truths upon trust. I should, therefore, be inclined to place religion before him in a way that would appeal more to his affections than to his reason, and try to interest him in our Lord from, so to speak, a human point of view, without going into the mysteries connected with the Incarnation, and if possible without, at first, telling the end of the Gospel narrative. Speak of a Person—One Whom you love—Who might have lived for ever in perfect happiness, but Who, from love to us, preferred to come and live on earth in poverty and suffering (the poor lad will appreciate the meaning of those words only too well)—Who was all-powerful, though living as a Man, and full of tenderness. Then tell of the miracles and works of love, of His continued existence—though for the present invisible to us—of His love and watchfulness: and when Wikkey's interest is aroused, as I believe it will be, I should read from the Bible itself the story of the sufferings and death. Can you gather any meaning from this rough outline? It seems to me that it is intended that Wikkey should be led upwards from the human to the Divine. For others a different plan of teaching might be better, but I think this is the right key to his development; and, moreover, I firmly believe that you will be shown how to use it."

Lawrence remained for some time after reading his letter with his elbows on the table, and his head resting on his hands, which were buried in his thick brown hair; a look of great perplexity was on his face.

"Of course, I must try," he thought; "we couldn't have it on one's conscience; but it's a serious business to have started." Looking up, he met Wikkey's rather anxious glance.

"Is anything amiss, Lawrence?"

"No, Wikkey—I was only thinking;" then, plunging on desperately, he continued: "I was thinking how I could best make you understand what I said last night about Someone Who sees everything you do—Someone Who is very good."

"Cut on, I'm minding. Is it Someone as you love!"

Lawrence reddened. What was his feeling towards the Christ? Reverence certainly, and some loyalty, but could he call it love in the presence of the passionate devotion to himself which showed in every look of those wistful eyes?

"Yes, I love him," he said slowly, "but not as much as I should." Then, as a sudden thought struck him, "Look here, Wikkey, you said you would like to have me for a king; well, He that I am telling you of is my King, and He must be yours, too, and we will both try to love and obey Him."

"Where is He?" asked Wikkey.

"You can't see him now, because He lives up in Heaven. He is the Son of God, and He might always have stayed in Heaven quite happy, only, instead of that, he came down upon earth, and became a man like one of us, so that He might know what it is. And though He was really a King, He chose to live like a poor man, and was often cold and hungry as you used to be; and He went about helping people, and curing those who were ill, because you know, Wikkey, He was God, and could do anything. There are beautiful stories about Him that I can tell you."

"How do you know all about the King, Lawrence?"

"It is written in a book called the Bible. Have you ever seen a Bible?"

"That was the big book as blind Tim used to sit and feel over with his fingers by the area rails. I asked him what it was, and he said as it was the Bible. But, bless you! he weren't blind no more nor you are; he lodged at Skimmidge's for a bit, and I saw him a reading of the paper in his room; he kicked me when he saw as I'd twigged him;" and Wikkey's laugh broke out at the recollection. Poor child, his whole knowledge of sacred things seemed to be derived from—

"Holiest things profaned and cursed."

"Tim was a bad man to pretend to be blind when he wasn't," said Lawrence, severely. "But now, Wikkey, shall I read you a story about the King?"

"Did He live in London?" Wikkey asked, as Lawrence took up the old Book with the feeling that the boy should hear these things for the first time out of his mother's Bible.

"No, He lived in a country a long way off; but that makes no difference, because He is God, and can see us everywhere, and He wants us to be good."

Then Lawrence opened the Bible, and after some thought, half read, half told, about the feeding of the hungry multitude.

Each succeeding evening a fresh story about the King was related, eagerly listened to and commented on by Wikkey with such familiar realism as often startled Lawrence, and made him wonder whether he were allowing irreverence, but which, at the same time, threw a wonderfully vivid light on the histories which, known since childhood, had lost so much of their interest for himself; and certainly, as far as awakening first the boy's curiosity, and then his love, went, the method of instruction answered perfectly. For Wikkey did not die at the end of the week, or of many succeeding weeks; warmth and food, and Mrs. Evans's nursing powers combined, caused one of those curious rallies not uncommon in cases of consumption, though no one who saw the boy's thin, flushed cheeks, and brilliant eyes could think the reprieve would be a long one. Still, for the present, there was improvement, and Lawrence could not help feeling glad that he might keep for a little while longer the child whose love had strangely brightened his lonely lodgings.

And while Wikkey's development was being carried on in the highest direction, his education in minor matters was progressing under Mrs. Evans's tuition—tuition of much the same kind as she had bestowed years before on Master Lawrence and her sweet Master Robin. By degrees Wikkey became thoroughly initiated in the mysteries of the toilette, and other amenities of civilized life, and being a sharp child, with a natural turn for imitation, he was, at the end of a week or two, not entirely unlike those young gentlemen in his ways, especially when his conversation became shorn of the expletives which had at first adorned it, but which, under Mrs. Evans's sharp rebukes, and Lawrence's graver admonitions that they were displeasing to the King, fast disappeared. Wikkey's remorse on being betrayed into the utterance of some comparatively harmless expression, quite as deep as when one slipped that gave even Lawrence a shock, showed how little their meaning had to do with their use.

One evening Lawrence, returning home to find Wikkey established as usual on the sofa near the fire, was greeted by the eager question—

"Lawrence, what was the King like? I've been a thinking of it all day, and I should like to know. Do you think He was a bit like you?"

"Not at all," Lawrence answered. "We don't know exactly what He was like; but—let me see," he went on, considering, "I think I have a picture somewhere—I had one;" and he crossed the room to a corner where, between the book-case and the wall, were put away a number of old pictures, brought from the "boys' room" at home, and never yet re-hung; among them was a little Oxford frame containing a photograph of the Thorn-crowned Head by Guido. How well he remembered its being given to him on his birthday by his mother! This he showed to Wikkey, explaining that though no one knows certainly what the King is like, it is thought that He may have resembled that picture. The boy looked at it for some time in silence, and then said—

"I've seen pictures like that in shops, but I never knew as it was the King. He looks very sorrowful—a deal sorrowfuler nor you—and what is that He has on His Head?"

"That has to do with a very sad story, which I have not told you yet. You know, Wikkey, though he was no good and kind, the men of that country hated Him, and would not have him for their King, and at last they took Him prisoner, and treated Him very badly, and they put that crown of sharp, pricking thorns on His Head, because He said He was a king."

"Was it to make game of Him?" asked Wikkey, in a tone of mingled awe and distress.

Lawrence nodded gravely, and feeling that this was perhaps as good a moment as any for completing the history, he took the Book, and in low, reverent tones, began the sad story of the betrayal, captivity, and death. Wikkey listened in absorbed attention, every now and then commenting on the narrative in a way which showed its intense reality to himself, and gave a marvelous vividness to the details of which Lawrence had before scarcely realized the terrible force. As he read on his voice became husky, and the child's eyes were fixed on him with devouring eagerness, till the awful end came, and Wikkey broke into an agony of weeping. Lawrence hastily put down the Book, and taking the little worn frame into his arms tried to soothe the shaking sobs, feeling the while as though he had been guilty of cruelty to the tender, sensitive heart.

"I thought some one would have saved Him," Wikkey gasped. "I didn't know as He was killed; you never told me He was killed."

"Wikkey, little lad—hush—look here! it was all right at the end. Listen while I read the end; it is beautiful." And as the sobs subsided he began to read again, still holding the boy close, and inwardly wondering whether something like this might have been the despair of the disciples on that Friday evening—read of the sadness of that waiting time, of the angel's visit to the silent tomb, of the loving women at the sepulchre, and the joyful message. "He is not here, He is risen;" and lastly, of the parting blessing, the separating cloud and the tidings of the coming again. A look of great relief was on Wikkey's face as Lawrence ceased reading, and he lay for some time with closed eyes, resting after his outburst. At last he opened them with sudden wonder.

"Lawrence, why did He let them do it? If He could do anything, why didn't He save Himself from the enemies?"

The old wonder—the old question—which must be answered; and Lawrence, after thinking a moment, said—

"It had to be, Wikkey. He had to die—to die for us. It was like this—People were very wicked, always doing bad things, and nobody that was bad could go to Heaven, but they must be punished instead. But God was very sorry that none of the people He had made could come and be happy with Him, so His Son, Jesus Christ, our King, became a Man, and came down on earth that He might be punished instead of us, so that we might be forgiven and allowed to come into Heaven. He bore all that for each of us, so that now, if we believe in Him and try to please Him, we shall go to be with Him in Heaven when we die."

Lawrence was very far from guessing that his teaching had become "doctrinal." He had spoken out of the fulness of his own conviction, quickened into fresh life by the intensity of Wikkey's realization of the facts he had heard.

"It was good of Him—it was good," the child repeated again and again, with a world of love shining in his eyes, till, worn out with his emotion, he fell asleep, and was gently laid by Lawrence in his bed. But in the middle of the night sounds of stifled weeping aroused Lawrence.

"What is it, Wikkey boy?" he asked, groping his way to him. "Are you worse?"

"I didn't mean for to wake you; but I wish—I wish I hadn't loved them coppers off Jim; it makes me feel so bad when I think as the King saw me," and Wikkey buried his face in the kind arm which encircled him, in uncontrollable grief. It needed all Lawrence's assurances that the King saw his repentance, and had certainly forgiven—yes, and the prayer for pardon which the young man, blushing red-hot in the darkness at the unwonted effort, uttered in husky tones, with the child's thin hands clasped in his own—before Wikkey was sufficiently quieted to sleep again. Before going down to the office Lawrence wrote to his cousin—

"I can do no more; he has got beyond me. He loves Him more than ever I have done. Come and help us both."

So Reginald came on such evenings as he could spare, and Wikkey, no longer averse, listened as he told him of the Fatherhood of God, of the love of the Son, and of the ever-present Comforter; of creation, redemption, and sanctification, and all the deep truths of the faith, receiving them with the belief that is born rather of love than of reason; for though the acuteness of the boy's questions and remarks often obliged Reginald to bring his own strong intellect to bear on them, they arose from no spirit of antagonism, but were the natural outcome of a thoughtful, inquiring mind. Sometimes, however, Wikkey was too tired for talking, and could only lie still and listen while Lawrence and the curate conversed, the expression of his eyes, as they passed from one to another, showing that he understood far more than might have been expected. One evening, in the middle of March, after he had been carried up stairs, the cousins sat talking over their charge.

"I have been considering about his baptism," Reginald said.

"His baptism! Do you think he hasn't been christened?"

"No, I don't think so," returned the other, thoughtfully. "I cannot bring myself to believe that we have been working on unconsecrated soil; but still we do not know. Of course I could baptize him hypothetically, but I should like to know the truth."

"Baptize him how?" Lawrence asked, with a frown of perplexity.

"Hypothetically. Don't be alarmed, it isn't a new fad of mine; it means baptizing on the supposition that there has been no previous baptism, for, you know our Church does not allow it to be done twice. I wonder if anything could be learnt by going down to the place named in the book."

"Crabrup! I looked in Bradshaw for it, and it seems to be a small place about an hour and a half from Euston Station. I might find a day to run down, though I don't quite see when; and how if I were to find a heap of relations wanting the boy? I could not spare him now, you know."

"Scarcely likely. Wikkey has evidently never seen a relation for, say, ten years, or he would recollect it, and it is hardly probable that any one will be anxious to take a boy in his state whom they have not seen for ten years. Besides, he couldn't well be moved now."

"No, he couldn't; and I sincerely hope that no affectionate relatives will want to come and see him here, that would be a most awful nuisance. What do you think of a fearful grandmother haunting the place?"

"The idea is oppressive, certainly, but I do not think you need fear it much, and you have established a pretty fair right to do as you like about the boy. Look here, Lawrence, supposing I were to run down on this place; I believe I could spare a day better than you, and a breath of fresh air would do me no harm."

"I shouldn't think it would," said Lawrence, looking at his cousin's pale face—all the paler for the stress of his winter's work. "Do, Reg; and for pity's sake, bring a root of some flower if you can find one; it is sickening to think of a child dying without ever having had such a thing in his hands."

"All right, then, I will go to-morrow; for, for," Reginald added gravely, "there is no time to be lost."

"I know there is not; I know it must come soon. Reg, I couldn't have believed I should have grown to care for the boy as I do."

"No, you have prepared a wrench for yourself, old fellow, but you will never be the worse for it, Lawrence. You know all about that better than I can preach it to you."

There was a silence, and then Lawrence said—

"Ought he to be told?"

"Well, that puzzles me; I feel as if he ought, and yet there can be no need to frighten the child. If it came naturally, it might be better for you to tell him gently."

"It?" exclaimed Lawrence, aghast.

"Yes, it must be you; he will take it better from you than from anyone else; but wait and see, you will be shown what to do."

The result of the curate's mission to Cranbury was very satisfactory. On being directed to the solitary remaining inhabitant of the name of Wilkins, Reginald learnt that Sarah Wilkins had been the only daughter of his brother, that she had married a ne'er-do-weel of the name of Whiston, who had deserted her shortly before the birth of her child, that she had followed her husband to London as soon as she was able to travel, and after a while had been lost sight of by her family. The old man seemed but slightly interested in the matter, and Reginald saw that no interference need be feared from him. On further consulting the parish register, he found recorded the marriage of Thomas Whiston and Sarah Wilkins, and a year later, the baptism of Wilkins, son of Thomas and Sarah Whiston, in 1856.

"So it is as I hoped, the child is one of the Flock," the curate said to himself. "And that mite of a boy is thirteen years old!" and he returned to London triumphant, bringing with him besides the information he went to seek, a root of primroses with yellow-tipped spikes ready to burst, and an early thrush's nest, containing five delicate blue eggs. This last treasure Reginald displayed with intense pride.

"I found a boy carrying it on the road, and rated the young rascal soundly for taking it, but I'm afraid the shilling I gave him made more impression than the lecture. Isn't it a beauty? I wonder when I last saw a nest?" he went on, touching the eggs with loving fingers. "Hardly since our old bird's-nesting days, eh, Lawrence! Do you remember the misel-thrush in the apple-tree?"

"Ay, and the licking you got for splitting your Sunday jacket up the back," and the two "working-men" laughed at the recollection, as they carried the prize to display to Wikkey, with a comical anxiety, almost amounting to dread, lest it should not produce the effect they intended. No fear of that! Wikkey's eyes dilated as he gazed into the nest, and, after some persuasion, took one of the smooth eggs into his hand; and from that moment he could not endure it out of his sight, but had it placed morning and evening beside his sofa or bed, near his other treasure, the Picture of the King, on the other side of which stood the primrose, planted in one of Mrs. Evans's tea-cups.

As the spring advanced, Wikkey became visibly worse, and all saw that the end could not be far off. Reginald, coming in one evening, found him asleep in Lawrence's arms, and was startled to see how great a change had taken place in him during the last four and twenty hours. In answer to his enquiring look, his cousin said, speaking very low—

"Since this morning, he is much worse; but better now than he was."

Sitting down, on the opposite side of the fire, Reginald thoughtfully contemplated the two. What a contrast! Lawrence, all health and strength, with the warm light glancing on the thick waves of his hair, and deepening the ruddy brown of his complexion, while the glow scarcely served to tint the pale face lying on his breast—deadly white, save for the two red spots on the sunken cheeks—or the hair hanging in loose lank threads. For some time no one spoke, but as the boy's sleep continued sound and unbroken, the cousins fell into talk, low and subdued, and many things were touched on in that quiet hour, which neither could have put into words at another time. At length Reginald rose to go, and at the same moment, Wikkey opened his eyes and smiled, as he saw his visitor, and tried to lift himself up.

"I'm awake now," he said; "I didn't know as you were here."

"Never mind, Wikkey, lie still," said Reginald, "you are too tired for any reading to-night. I will tell you one verse—a beautiful one—for you and Lawrence to talk about some day," and laying his hand on the boy's head he repeated, in low, gentle tones—"Thine eyes shall see the King in His beauty."

After he was gone, Wikkey lay very still, with his eyes fixed intently on the fire. Lawrence dreaded what his next question might be, and at last it came.

"What does it mean—See the King?"

"It means that we shall all see Him some day, Wikkey, when—when—we die. It will be beautiful to see the King, won't it?"

"Yes," said the child, dreamily. "I'd like to see Him. I know as I'm going to die; but will it be soon? Oh, Lawrence! must it be directly?" and as he clung convulsively to him, the young man felt the little heart beating wildly.

"Wikkey—little lad—dear little lad—don't be frightened," he said, stroking the boy's head; "don't be frightened;" but still the eyes questioned him with agonized eagerness, and he knew he must answer, but his voice was very husky, and he felt the task a hard one.

"I'll tell you, Wikkey, I think the King loves you so much that He wants you to come to Him, and not to be ill any more, nor have any more bad pain or coughing. That would be nice, wouldn't it?—never to feel ill any more, and to see the King."

"Yes," Wikkey said, with a long sigh, "it would be ever so nice; but, oh! I don't want for to leave you, Lawrence—won't you come, too?"

"Some day, please God; but that won't be as the King likes—perhaps He will not want me to come yet. I must try to do anything He wants me to do here first."

"Should you like to come now, Lawrence?"

The question was rather a relief, for a sense of being unreal had come over Lawrence while he spoke, and he answered quickly—

"No, I had rather not go yet, Wikkey; but you see I am well and strong. I think if I were ill, like you, I should like it; and you need not feel frightened, for the King will not leave you, He will be taking care of you all the time, and you will go to Him."

"Are you quite certain?"

No room for doubt here—and the answer came unhesitatingly—"Quite certain, Wikkey."

"And you are sure that you'll come too?"

"I wish I were half as certain," the young man thought, with a sigh, then said aloud—"If I try to obey the King, I hope I shall."

"But you will try—you will, Lawrence!" cried Wikkey, passionately.

Very quietly and low Lawrence answered—"By God's help—Yes!" and he bent and kissed the child's forehead, as if to seal the vow.

Wikkey seemed satisfied, and in a few minutes was dozing again. He slept for an hour after being put to bed, but then grew restless, and the night passed wearily between intervals of heavy oppression—half-unconscious wakefulness and rambling, incoherent talk, sometimes of his street-life, of his broom, for which he felt about with weak, aimless hands, of cold and hunger; and then he would break out into murmuring complaints of Mrs. Skimmidge, when forbidden words would slip out, and even then the child's look of distress went to Lawrence's heart. But oftener the wandering talk was of the incidents of the last few weeks, and over and came the words—"See the King in His beauty."

In the morning Wikkey was quieter and perfectly sensible; but the pinched look on his face, and the heavy labored breathing, told plainly that he was sinking.

Hard as it had been for Lawrence to leave his "little lad," up to this time he had been scrupulous in never allowing Wikkey to interfere with his office duties, but now it seemed impossible to leave the child, who clung feebly to him with a frightened whisper—

"Oh, don't go, Lawrence! p'raps the King will want me, and maybe I shouldn't be so frightened if I kept looking at you."

No, he could not go; so writing a hurried line—"Cannot come to-day—the boy I told you of is dying—the work shall be ready in time," he dispatched it to the head clerk of his department. "Granby's Craze" had at first excited a good deal of astonishment when it became known at the office; but Lawrence had quietly discouraged any attempts at "chaff" on the subject, and as time went on he used to be greeted by really warm inquiries after "the little chap."

The hours passed slowly by. Reginald came and went as he could spare time; sometimes he prayed in such short and simple language as Wikkey could join in—and the expression of his face showed that he did so—sometimes he knelt in silence, praying earnestly for the departing soul, and for Lawrence in his mournful watch. As the day began to wane, Reginald entering, saw that the end was near, and knelt to say the last prayers; as he finished the pale March sun, struggling through the clouds, sent a shaft of soft light into the room, and touched Wikkey's closed eyes. They opened with a smile, and raising himself in Lawrence's arms, he leant forward with a look so eager and expectant, that with a thrill of awe, almost amounting to terror, the young man whispered—

"What is it, Wikkey? Do you see anything?"

"Not yet—soon—it's coming," the boy murmured, without altering his fixed gaze; and then for an instant a wondrous light seemed to break over the wan face—only for an instant—for suddenly as it had dawned, it faded out, and with it fled the little spirit, leaving only the frail worn-out form to fall back gently on Lawrence's breast.

Was he gone? Almost incredulously Lawrence looked down, and then, with pale, set features, he rose, and laying Wikkey on the bed, sank on his knees beside it, and buried his face in the pillow, with the sound of a great sob. Reginald approached the bed, and laying his hand for a moment on the bowed head, spoke low and solemnly—

"The blessing of a soul that was ready to perish come upon you, Lawrence."

Then he quitted the room, and closing the door softly, left Lawrence alone with his "little lad."

So Wikkey passed away, and Lawrence went back to his work, ever retaining deep down in his heart the memory of the child whose life had become so strangely interwoven with his own, and more precious still, the lesson bequeathed to him by his "little lad," of how a soul that looks persistently upwards finds its full satisfaction at last in the Vision of "The King in His beauty." CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

TRUE AND LAUDABLE SERVICE.

BY MINNIE E. KENNEY.

"Mandy, can't you amuse that child and keep him quiet somehow? He's been screaming for half an hour, and you ain't paying no 'tention to him. I'll be out there after you in a minute if you don't mind out!"

Poor Mandy picked up the heavy, cross baby again with a sigh. She was not very strong, and on this sultry day, when not a breath of air was stirring, she found it far more comfortable to let her little charge amuse himself as best he might in crawling up and down the uneven pavement than to hold him and carry him up and down as he wanted her to.

He was a self-willed little fellow, though only about a year old, and he had already learned that on most occasions he could get his own way by screaming for it, so when he found that Mandy was disposed to slight him and bestow her attention on a game of "jacks," two of her little neighbors were playing, he began to scream most lustily.

Mandy had glanced at him when he first screamed, but seeing that he was neither in pain nor danger, she had paid no further attention to him until the harsh voice of her mistress warned her that she had better devote herself to quieting him, lest the threat of coming out should be carried into effect, and she knew well the heavy blows that would accompany the scolding.

Not very gently, it must be confessed, she lifted the screaming child and tried to threaten and coax him into silence, but he would not be hushed until Mandy began to walk with him up and down the narrow ally that served to separate the two tall rows of swarming tenement houses.

Long before Mickey's head began to drop sleepily on her shoulder poor little Mandy's back was aching, and it seemed to her that her tired arms could not bear their heavy burden for a moment longer, but young as she was she had already learned many a lesson of patient endurance, so she paced slowly up and down till at last she was rewarded by having her little charge fall fast asleep.

She carried him into the close dark room that served as a bedroom, and opened out of the living room of the family, and after patting him for a few moments as he stirred uneasily, missing the motion that had lulled him to sleep, she tried to creep quietly out of the room without attracting Mrs. Riley's notice. All her moments for play were stolen ones, for Mrs. Riley could always find an abundance of work for her to do from morning until night, and it never occurred to her that the child needed any time for rest or recreation.

Four years ago Mandy's mother had died, a gentle, patient woman, whose life of hard work had never made her ill-tempered or fault-finding; and although her best efforts had not always been successful in keeping want away from the door, yet Mandy had led a happy life. She had never really known what sorrow meant until the day when her cries had fallen for the first time upon deaf ears, and her mother, white and cold, had been carried away from her, leaving her alone and dependent among strangers.

What was to become of the child? Some of the most kind-hearted of the neighbors pitied her from the depths of their hearts, and wished that they could offer her a share in their homes; but as they looked at their own little ones, and thought how difficult it was to always fill the hungry little mouths, they were reluctant to increase the care and expense by adding another to the number.

Poor little Mandy was too miserable to either wonder or care what became of her now that her mother had left her, and she paid little heed to the murmurs of the neighbors as they talked among themselves, every now and then casting pitying glances at the child, who was sobbing bitterly as she realized her loss.

"An orphan asylum will be the only place for her," said one woman, and all but one assented to the suggestion.

Mrs. Riley, holding one baby in her arms, while another pulled at her skirts, bethought herself of the many times when Mandy, with a child's love for babies, had been a most efficient little nurse, coaxing the baby out of his most refractory moods and soothing him to restful slumber, and she saw that this was an excellent opportunity for apparently performing a most charitable and benevolent action, and at the same time saving herself a great amount of care and worry at a trifling expense.

"It seems a shame to let the poor child go to an asylum, where nobody knows how they may abuse her. I'd be sorry to have a child of mine sent to one of those places, and though I'm a poor woman, and have to work hard to keep bread in my own children's mouths, yet I can't find it in my heart to see that child sent off among strangers. I'll take her and do the best I can by her, and she shall have share and share alike with my own. I'm sure nothing could be fairer than that; now, could it?"

The uunrum of applause that greeted this speech made Mrs. Riley feel as if she had really performed a kind deed, and it was with unusual gentleness for her that she bid Mandy follow her down stairs.

Very different from the child's gentle mother was Mrs. Riley, and Mandy soon found that her new life was by no means an easy one. From morning until night she had to amuse the baby and she learned, to her sorrow, that not even when she was doing her best was she safe from Mrs. Riley's outbreaks of temper.

A miserable enough life the poor child led, with no hope of anything better. There was always a baby to be carried about, and her strength was sorely overtaxed by the restless, fidgety children.

She was not always unhappy, however, in spite of her many trials, for she had a bright, cheerful disposition, and many a more fortunate child is far less contented than poor little motherless Maudy. There was one hour in the week that was always a happy one. The hour that she spent every Sunday afternoon at the little Mission Chapel at the end of the street was the brightest hour of the week to her. She loved her teacher dearly, she delighted in the hymns that rose clear and sweet, though the childish voices were untrained, and she brought home some practical truth from the lesson every Sunday that helped her through the week. During her mother's life she had been carefully trained and taught, and though her ideas of right and wrong had been somewhat confused since she had come to live with Mrs. Riley, yet she tried hard, in her childish way, to do her duty that she might meet her dear mother again in heaven.

She had tiptoed across the room and almost gained the door, when Mrs. Riley glanced up from the washtub over which she was bending, and caught sight of her.

"Here you, Mandy!" she said. Don't you try to run off that way. I've got too much to do this afternoon to let you go off and take your leisure like a lady. I should think you'd be ashamed to want to, with me slaving over the tub this way, trying to earn a living for my children as well as them that's no relation to me. Take these clothes out in the yard and hang 'em up, and be sure you pin 'em tight."

Mandy did not reply. She had long ago learned that silence was the best reply to speeches of this kind, but she cast a longing look at the game of "jacks" as she took up the clothes basket and started out.

She sang cheerily at her work, and when at last the basket was emptied and its contents were hanging on the line she ran across the court and peeped into a room through the half open blinds.

A little girl lying on a neat white bed in the corner of the room, smiled brightly as she saw her visitor's face peering through the blinds.

"Hello, Nellie, how do you feel to-day?" asked Mandy.

"I'm a good deal better," answered the child, "but I'm so lonesome, for mother's been out all the afternoon. Can't you come in and sit with me a little while?"

Mandy shook her head.

"No, I daren't," she answered, with a backward glance over her shoulder. "Mrs. Riley's all the time wanting me for something, and she'll give it to me. I'd like it if I could, though."

"Can you spare time enough to get me a drink?" asked the child; "I'm so thirsty."

"Yes, I can do that for you," and without taking time to go around to the door Mandy pulled the blinds further open and scrambled in through the window.

"How clean and quiet everything always is here," she said, wistfully glancing about the room as the child eagerly drank the water Mandy handed her. "It just makes me think of our house before mother died. I tell you it's mighty different at Mrs. Riley's. 'Taint no use fixing up there, for the children tear things up just as quick as you straighten them, and I don't even get time to keep myself tidied up. There, she's calling me now. Good-bye. I wish I could stay," and Mandy was off like a flash, while Nellie looked after her pityingly.

Miss Leonard, Mandy's Sunday-school teacher, often wondered how it was that busy as the child always seemed to be, she managed to have perfect lessons, recited with more accuracy and understanding than any of her classmates, but if she had seen her that evening she would no longer have wondered.

When Mandy, rocked backward and forward with Mickey in her arms, putting him to sleep for the night, she held her little Prayer Book in one hand, and straining her eyes to distinguish the words in the uncertain twilight, she repeated the collect for the next Sunday over and over again, until she could recite it quite perfectly.

The other children were asleep, and Mrs. Riley was enjoying her evening gossip with the neighbors, so nothing broke the silence of the room except the beautiful words of the collect as Mandy softly and reverently repeated them:

"Almighty and merciful God, of whose only gift it cometh that Thy faithful people do unto Thee true and laudable service, grant, we beseech Thee, that we may faithfully serve Thee in this life, that we fail not finally to attain Thy heavenly promises, through the merits of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."
 "True and laudable service," she thought to herself, as she laid Mickey down and put away her book. "I wonder what that means. I don't suppose it's anything I could do, but I'll ask Miss Leonard about it on Sunday."

"What does true and laudable service mean, Miss Leonard?" she asked eagerly, as soon as she had recited her lesson. "Is it anything I can do, or is it only for grown up folks?"

"None of God's little 'ones are too

"My work at home is minding Mickey and helping Mrs. Riley. If I do that the best I know how, is that 'true and laudable service'?" asked Mandy.

"Yes, my dear," answered her teacher. "You must look upon these things as work not only for Mrs. Riley, but as work for God, since He has given it to you to do; and if you do it faithfully and well, as in His sight, it will be just as much true and laudable service as if it were something far greater."

"But, Miss Leonard," said Mandy, "it's so hard to do little things. I would rather do some big thing."

"Ah, that is the trouble with all of us, I am afraid, my dear child," answered Miss Leonard.

"It is only to a very few that the Lord has given a great work to do for Him, and we must not despise the little things. If He has given us little things to do for Him, we will please Him better by doing them as well and faithfully as we can, than by casting them aside neglected, while we seek for work that suits us better. Little young to do unto Him true and laudable service," answered Miss Leonard. "It does not mean any great thing, Mandy; it does not mean a great act of self-sacrifice or devotion, but doing our duty faithfully and well in the position in life God has placed us in. Every one of us, from the highest to the lowest, can serve God truly and faithfully, though He has given different work to all."

duties become well worth the doing when we bring to them hearts filled with love to Christ and a desire to do everything to His glory. There is an old story of a monk who was engaged in prayer in his cell, when a vision of the Saviour appeared to him. He was kneeling before Him in love and adoration, when the bell tolled the hour of noon. It was his duty at this hour to go to the convent gate and distribute bread to the poor. Should he go? Could he leave this glory for the little duty which awaited him below? With reluctance he left the cell, glorified by his Saviour's presence, to do his duty. When his task was faithfully performed he returned, fearful that the vision had departed; but it awaited him, and as he knelt again before it, a voice said, "If thou hadst remained, I had gone." It is only a legend, but it teaches us a lesson. We show our love to our Saviour best by obedience in all the little duties that He has given us to do."

The tap of the superintendent's bell gave the signal for silence, but Mandy's thoughts were still on her teacher's words. She remembered times when she had been impatient with Mickey when he was cross or fretful, and slighted her that Mrs. Riley had given her to do, and she resolved that after this she would do everything with the single purpose of doing true and laudable service to God.

She was often sorely tempted to be unfaithful, but she remembered to pray daily for help to the One who was able to strengthen her in her purpose. Very often the little duties seemed scarcely worth the doing, but she tried to think for whose sake she was doing them.

One day a greater opportunity than any that had ever yet presented itself, for self-sacrifice, came to Mandy. Mrs. Riley had begun to long for a breath of fresh air, and at last had found the stifling heat of the narrow alley unendurable. She planned to take a trip up the river on an excursion boat, and to the great delight of the children, promised that they should all go with her.

Mandy was half wild with delight at the prospect of a trip on the river, and could scarcely wait for the appointed day to come.

The evening before, she went in to see her little sick friend Nellie, that she might tell her of the expected pleasure. She had not seen her for some days and she was surprised to find how much worse she was. She was too weak to speak and only opened her eyes for a moment to smile faintly at Mandy, and then the white lids closed over them again.

"She ain't been so well for two or three days as she was," said Nellie's mother, who was gently fanning her. "Poor little thing, she's been feeling the heat so all day and she's pretty well used up this evening. If I only had some one to leave with her to take care of her to-morrow, I would go to work and then I could get her something cooling to eat and drink, but I can't leave her by herself, and I haven't any money to spend on her unless I go and earn it."

"It's too bad," said Mandy softly, as she stood by the bedside and looked down on the pale face of her little friend,

She was trying to get rid of a thought that had come into her mind, but she could not. Suppose she should stay home to-morrow and take care of Nellie instead of going on the excursion with Mrs. Riley, then Nellie's mother could go to work and earn money to get things for the little girl.

Could she make this sacrifice? Surely this would be doing true and laudable service, and an earnest little prayer went up swift-winged from her heart that she might have grace to deny herself.

Perhaps Mrs. Riley would not be willing to let her stay at home even if she wanted to; she might insist upon her going with them, that she might take care of Mickey, but she would ask her at all events.

She slipped softly out of the room, and running across the court, not without a faint hope perhaps that Mrs. Riley might insist upon her going, asked rather shyly if she might stay at home the next day.

"Stay at home!" echoed Mrs. Riley in surprise. "Is the girl crazy? Why, I thought you was so anxious to go."

"So I was," answered Mandy, "but Nellie is worse and her mother wants to go to work to-morrow, and I thought I would stay and take care of her if you was willing."

Mrs. Riley hesitated a moment. She wanted Mandy's help in taking care of the children, but then if she stayed at home the expense of her ticket would be saved, and perhaps the older children could take as good care of Mickey as if Mandy was along.

"Well, I don't care. You can stay home if you've got a mind to, I s'pose," she answered, and Mandy went back to Nellie's room, pleased at the thought of giving pleasure to the sick child, but sadly disappointed at the thought of giving up the trip she had been so happy over.

Nellie's mother was delighted at her promise to remain with Nellie the next day, and thanked her warmly for giving up her anticipated pleasure.

Mandy did not repent of her resolution even the next morning, when the little party started off, and it was with a bright face that she went into Nellie's room, and seated herself beside the bed with the fan in her hand.

She passed a very quiet day, but a happy one. Late in the afternoon the doctor called to see his patient, bringing her a little bunch of flowers which the child was too sick to do more than languidly notice, but Mandy inhaled their perfume, and put them in water with loving touch.

"She wants nourishment and fresh air more than anything else," said the doctor. "My wife is coming over here for a little while this afternoon, and perhaps she can prescribe for her better than I can."

Before long the doctor's wife came, a kind, motherly lady, and even little Nellie, weak and weary as she was, grew interested in her pleasant talk. She had brought some cool jelly with her, that was very refreshing to the child's parched mouth and tongue.

Just before she went away she told the children something that seemed almost too good to be true. She said that some kind people in the country had offered to take two children every week into their homes, that they might have a little taste of country life and pleasures, and she was one of a number of ladies who distributed tickets among children that they thought would be benefited by the change.

Nellie had told the lady of Mandy's self-denial in giving up her excursion on the river that she might stay with her during her mother's absence, and the doctor's wife had noted how pale and thin the girl looked, so she made Mandy as happy as her little friend by giving each of them a ticket that would give them a whole week of fresh air and good food at a farm-house.

"Now you must make haste, and get strong enough to go next Wednesday," she said, as she rose to go, and Nellie, feeling stronger already at the prospect, smiled a bright farewell.

"Do you suppose Mrs. Riley will let me go?" asked Mandy, breathless with delight, as she turned the ticket over and over.

"I guess so," answered Nellie, hopefully, "and what a beautiful time we'll have."

As soon as Nellie's mother came home she was greeted with the joyful intelligence, and when Mrs. Riley, hot and tired, reached home, Mandy's first question was whether she might go to the country.

"You can go and stay, for all I care," answered Mrs. Riley, who was not in a very good-natured frame of mind, but Mandy was too happy at gaining her permission to care how unwillingly it was granted.

Of all the happy children that leaned from the car-windows to wave last good-bys to their friends, Mandy and Nellie were among the happiest, and I will leave you to imagine for yourselves how delighted they were when they really reached the place of their destination, and saw the green fields stretching around them on every side.

When the time came for their return, after a week which had been, as they enthusiastically declared, the happiest time in their lives, the kind-hearted farmer's wife, who had learned Mandy's story, offered to give her a home with her.

Mr. Riley's consent was somewhat reluctantly given, so Mandy became a member of the family at the farm-house, and soon took the place of a helpful elder daughter. She found

The Churchman.

THE GREAT GENERAL.

What shall we give our hero here—
What tribute shall we render now
To him whom all the world acclaimed,
Whose every laurel pressed his brow!

Oh, story more than passing strange!
A mighty nation stops its rush,
And every head is lowly bent,
As though God's angel whispered "hush!"

One thought, one grief, one common love
From every heart beneath our sun,
For him who all an empire saved,
And, saving, made again all one.

Call him a hero if you will;
But heroes oft are common stuff.
This was a man for whom our love
Could somehow never cry, "Enough!"

And yet a man like other men—
This was his grandeur, after all:
Responsive to the truth of God,
And simply loyal to His call.

Assuming nothing but the grace
That halos every honest heart,
Content, when every claim is met,
To take his common civic part.

A Cincinnati, not a king—
A meet successor to his grace,
Who won and wore the civic crown
Of liberty for all our race.

A peer with him, the Western chief,
Who in the nation's darkest hour
Sublimely took the task of fate,
And fell in triumph of God's power.

God greet ye, heroes of our land—
God welcome you beyond the grave,
And wash away your mortal stain,
For His dear sake who died to save!

God keep us lead unto your aim—
God give us grace to think with you,
That life were nothing worth without
The tried, the tempered, and the true!

ALBERT Z. GRAY.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 15, 1885.

THE President is inexorable in requiring the ranchmen to remove their cattle from the Indian Territory within forty days. He reminds them that though their interest is one thing, the public interest is another. What was the character of these Indian "leases" has been clearly and pointedly set forth by Senator Dawes. Out of 4,250,000 acres, only one-tenth, or 400,000, is left. That they would be got the better of was as certain as that the Indians have never stood any chance at the hands of interested and unscrupulous white men. Better sacrifice even two hundred and fifty thousand head of cattle, than have another Indian war, which may cost the country many times more than the $7,000,000 at which the cattle are valued. The Indian problem is being badly solved by leasing Indian lands to cattle-men.

WHEN Church people hear the Gospel on the Twelfth Sunday after Trinity, August 23d, reciting the miracle of our Lord in healing the deaf and dumb man, they should consider seriously the importance of Church work among the 35,000 deaf-mutes of this country and make offerings towards its support. The rectors of the parishes in the five districts into which the work has been provisionally subdivided will know to whom the offerings should be sent. The Rev. Dr. Gallaudet, who began a Bible-class for the deaf-mute residents of New York City in September, 1850, the seed corn of all this work, is always glad to give information to those who will address him on the subject. He is the general manager of the society, incorporated in New York City, in October, 1872, under the title of "The Church Mission to Deaf-mutes." He desires to see this society possessed of a farm on which to place a permanent home for aged and infirm deaf-mutes, an industrial house for the unfortunate and erring deaf-mutes, and a chapel. When $30,000 shall have been accumulated for this object, it will, God willing, be begun. The society has already nearly $14,000 at interest.

DIOCESAN MISSIONARIES.

We are glad to see that the experiment of the Bishop of Western Michigan and his Diocesan Board in the employment of a general missionary for that diocese has turned out so satisfactory as to be no longer a tentative measure, but one of the most important factors in the practical work of that really missionary diocese. It was an experiment, but from the first there was no doubt as to its success. Western Michigan has not only a hard-working, but an eminently practical bishop. He has no money for experiments. His projects are sure of success.

This one in particular turned out so well that upon the retirement of his first general missionary to an important parish at the East, one of the most honored presbyters of the diocese was willing to resign the parish which he had served so long and so well, for this larger though more self-denying work.

We look forward to the employment in all dioceses of a general missionary, working under the direction of the diocesan. Doubtless nothing now prevents the wide adoption of this well-proven plan but lack of funds. We are sure, however, that even this will soon seem an unwise economy.

It can hardly be necessary to point out the great usefulness of some such agency. Even in small dioceses there is work—very important work—to be done, which a tried and true presbyter could do quite as well, if not better than the bishop himself. The pressing engagements of bishops make prolonged visits to parishes and missionary stations quite out of the question.

Further, the employment of a general missionary in all dioceses might be found to work so well as to bring about the employment of a convocational missionary. In this case an easy solution might be found for questions which now disturb the peace of many a poor priest. It would, too, no doubt, open up a field of large usefulness to priests who have a vocation for just such work.

ERNEST RENAN.

Speaking of the Père Loyson, we incidentally mentioned his contemporary, Rénan, whom his "Recollections of Youth" have introduced to his own times in a new light. Too little has been known as the renegade of St. Sulpice, the victim of Rome's anathemas upon the glorious faculty of human reason, the wreck of a noble mind which the Seminarists had launched upon the perilous voyage of life, richly freighted, but like a vessel too feebly timbered in its construction to withstand the navigation for which it was destined between Scylla and Charybdis. His "Recollections" are the most melancholy reading we have ever gone through, not only as the personal narrative of a most gifted and interesting mind, but as a reflection of France in its religious condition at this period, and not less as a mirror of the modern Romanism which has destroyed the system of Bossuet, and which is equally responsible before God and man for the drivelling superstitions of Pius IX., and the brilliant aberrations of such minds as Lacordaire and Lamennais and Rénan. Add to this melancholy list the name of a widely different character, the pious, broken-hearted Montalembert, and well may we retort upon Rome the bitter and most unjust accusations which the unhappy Newman launched like Parthian arrows against his own mother, the Church of England: "Who hath set this note upon thee of dry breasts and a miscarriage womb!" Sure it is that, after this, all that is purest and best in the Roman obedience must fall away from her into infidelity, if not saved by the revival of Gallicanism in the purer form of the Old Catholic restoration. The revelations which this book gives us of the intolerable burlesks with which the Vaticanism of Pius IX. has loaded the consciences of such men as the Sulpicians, make it equally clear that good men can submit to bear them and work under them only by the amputation of reason and the quenching of mental illumination.

Rénan knew Romanism only in its best phases. The son of Breton peasants, he was reared in the blind unquestioning piety of Brittany, from which he was transferred to St. Sulpice under the patronage of Dupanloup. In that respectable school he was taken up by a most incompetent system and by incapable though pious masters. Of Church history he seems to have gained only the slightest ideas in his whole course of education. He marked out for himself an exceptional line of study, which made him an Oriental scholar and then a German inquirer, and thus, for the rest of his life, a sort of "Wandering Jew," one who has looked upon Jesus, but who carries with him wherever he strays a mixt remembrance of His tenderness and patience with a remorseful sense of cruel partnership in slaying Him.

Of the Catholicity of the Nicene Constitutions, Rénan seems never to have gained the first inkling of a conception. "Catholicism" and "Orthodoxy" are terms which he honestly confounds with modern Vaticanism. Of the Anglican Reformation he seems never to have heard. Once only does he speak of "Father Hyacinthe," who might teach him even yet what he needs most to learn. In terms of respect which involve self-reproach, he says: "One of the wisest acts of the Abbé Loyson has been his resistance of the temptation to which Lamennais gave way—his refusal to accept the advances which extremists always make to those who break loose from their official relations with Rome."

THE MERCERSBURG MOVEMENT AND CHURCH UNITY.

I.

The "Mercersburg Movement" began about 1845 in the German Reformed Theological Seminary at Mercersburg, Pennsylvania. Its leaders were two professors in that institution, Dr. J. W. Nevin and Dr. Philip Schaff, both of them still living. It was part of a broader movement, essentially theological, which can be traced under varying forms in widely separated communions, and which showed itself at the late "American Congress of Churches" in the theme of the final discussion, "The Historical Christ Regarded as the True Centre of Theology." The Mercersburg divines found the central truth of Christianity in the truth about Christ's Person as divine and human. And this gave them, as part of their system, the idea of Church unity, to express which in its own way the Congress came into existence. They saw in the Church the perpetuation of Christ's incarnate life, and they attached a high dignity and value to the sacraments, worship and the ministry. Schisen was, and is, for the advocates of this theology, the work of anti-Christ and the restoration of unity, a primary concern of all Christ's people. Theologians of this school have been teaching for more than a generation very nearly what our bishops teach in their last pastoral letter.

After a struggle, sometimes called the "seven years' war," within the limits of the Eastern Synod (not then in union with the smaller Synod of Ohio), the Mercersburg doctrines had become dominant there in 1852. In 1853, the year made memorable by Dr. Muhlenberg's great call to unity, some of the obstacles to unity were singularly illustrated. In that year the Reformed Dutch General Synod, representing another American offshoot of continental Presbyterianism, suspended correspondence with the German Synod for refusing to disown its two professors as false to Protestantism. Similar action was taken in 1854 by the Old School General Assembly, the chief American representative of British Presbyterianism. The coincidence of this repellent attitude with the attitude of invitation which episcopacy seemed to be taking under the powerful impulse given by the Muhlenberg memorial is very striking; and had the bishops felt free to act as Catholic ministers holding a commission immediately from Christ to serve all the baptized and empowered by Him to confer orders without imposing rubrics and canons, according to Muhlenberg's (if not also Seabury's and John Tallot's) grand conception of their office, then perhaps neither the memorial nor the Mercersburg movement would have worn even the aspect of failure. But nothing of this sort took place, thanks in part to the vigilant Presbyterianism of the House of Deputies and non-episcopal Presbyterianism had time to recover from its panic. In ten years the Dutch Synod resumed correspondence with the German, and within ten years more was proposing organic union.

The General Assembly is likewise now on friendly terms with the German Synod, and the latter is duly represented in the great "Presbyterian Alliance." It is, however, a gain for Catholicity that a churchly theology has to this extent won recognition within the domain of parity. Every step, anywhere, towards toleration in matters of opinion is a step towards unity.

But the best test of the value and permanence of the Mercersburg movement is its influence upon the denomination principally affected by it, and it is worth while for good Catholics, of all varieties, to study this influence.

When a powerful stimulus is applied to a healthy organism the normal result is the more rapid development of its own life, while a vitality relatively feeble may seem rather transformed than developed. In the German Reformed Church the historical life was in danger of being overpowered by the evangelical movement, as renewed in America near the beginning of the present century. This danger was escaped largely through the earliest labors of Dr. Nevin, who came to that body from the Old School Presbyterians in 1840. He vindicated the sober views of religious experience and of the true function of Christian nurture proper to all Presbyterians, and checked the extravagances of the revivalists. In this process, of course, the importance of faithful catechizing was emphasized, and the old textbook of the Church, the Heidelberg Catechism, issued in 1563, recovered its rightful place. Thus, when Evangelicalism, in giving the Church a forward impulse, had disturbed its balance, the balance was restored by the older Puritanism, represented by Dr. Nevin. He, in his turn, became an exponent of German Calvinism, which has no doctrinal standard but the Catechism, and insists much more on Calvin's sacramental doctrine, (as against Lutheranism), than on his doctrine of the decrees. To fresh impulses from Germany, given in various ways, but not least through the arrival of Dr. Schaff from Berlin in 1844, Dr. Nevin loyally responded. The germs of the new conceptions were sought on the historic ground of the Heidelberg formulas, and the Mercersburg theology is, to its adherents, a legitimate development of the more churchly teaching of Calvin and Melancthon. This was favorable to a Catholic tone for the further reason that the Heidelberg Catechism is moulded upon the Apostles' Creed, and assigns to that in terms very similar to those used in our Baptismal Office, the supreme place among confessions of faith. To Dr. Nevin especially, this creed had the profoundest significance, as the spontaneous, independent, authoritative witness of the Bride of Christ to her Incarnate Lord, and as making the Church herself a supernatural fact and an object of faith.

But Catholic as the movement was, it necessarily intensified denominational consciousness. The German Reformed body became aware of a mission, a mission in behalf of the whole Church indeed, but its own, and one which it must fulfil by being itself. This was true of the whole communion, for the new movement stimulated thought on all sides, and by planting itself on the old formularies of the Church increased the general interest in them. Accordingly, in 1863, when the Tercentenary of the Heidelberg Catechism was celebrated, a union was effected between the synods of the East and the West, in the face of strong theological antipathies. Dr. Nevin, who presided at the commemoration, presented denominational development as a proper object of effort, even while distinctly avowing his Catholic aspirations. The sacrifice of race feeling made when the word "German" was dropped from the Church name in 1869 (as the word "Dutch" had been dropped in 1867) doubtless looked towards this object. It was felt that a foreign name must be a hindrance to the fulfillment of a mission in America. And, by styling itself "The Reformed Church in the United States," this body still kept the historical designation of continental Calvinists, always known as the "Reformed." Unfortunately, the descendants of the Hollanders, with whom the race distinction is now not so much a fact as a sentiment, value their continental ancestry none the less, and they had become "The Reformed Church in America." The result is rather bewildering, and suggest the reflection that as long as the Catholic Church in America exists in fragments, it is better to have labels which everybody can understand.

Another sign of an intense vitality of its own in the (German) Reformed Church was the failure of the effort at union which followed this approximation in name. Dutch and German Presbyterians had been substantially one during the later colonial period, and were apparently drawing together again when the Merceburg movement began. There was a permanent tie between them in the Heidelberg Catechism, authoritative in both, and the divines of the Merceburg school were pledged to the cause of Catholic reunion. But the union proposed involved either the acceptance by the Germans of the Belgic Confession and the Canons of Dort, or their abandonment by the Dutch. The latter would not abandon them, and the former could not accept them without accepting Calvinism on its sterner side, to the prejudice of the sacramental doctrines for which Merceburg had contended, as well as of the mild Augustinianism current throughout the German Church. It would, moreover, have imposed restraints on theological thought which few could have welcomed. Even those who think that the fusion of denominations is in itself an advance toward unity, may consistently believe that acquiescence in such terms would have been a backward step toward sectarianism. True unity, indeed, cannot come as long as its doctrinal basis is sought in any theological system, whether embodied in a confession or a catechism. But while the Reformed Church in the United States plainly signified its intention to remain German rather than become Dutch, the agency of Dr. Nevin in producing the conditions which led to this result shows that it was not insensible to other than German influences. And the story of Muhlenberg, with his unmixed German blood (revealing itself at times in a sort of German consciousness), teaches us how precious that element may be in American life. The persistence of diverse forces of race and of creed only adds effect to their interaction, and is a pledge of an ultimate unity both firmer and richer for having been wrought out slowly.

WM. G. ANDREWS.

THE BOOKS OF THE BIBLE.*

Deuteronomy.

I.

The English title of this book is derived from the Greek deuteros, Latinized Deuterionum, signifying the second Law, or "the law repeated." The Greek form appears to be an imitation of the Jewish appellation Mishneh Hal'orah, repetition of the Law, founded on the expression ch. xvii. 18, which the lxx. render "this repetition of the Law," although its true meaning is "a copy of this Law." The rabbinical designation of Deuteronomy as Sepher Tokchoth, "The Book of Reproofs," on account of ch. xxviii., is not happy. In the Hebrew Bible it is called Eleth Haddabirin, or simply Dabirin, these being the first two words of the book.

The ten sections into which it is divided in the Hebrew Bible are: Ch. i. 1, iii. 23, vii. 12, xi. 26, xvi. 18, xxi. 10, xxvi. 1, xxxi. 9, xxxii. 1, xxxiii. 1.

The contents of the book are three addresses, or charges, delivered by Moses, shortly before his death, in the plains of Moab, on the eastern side of Jordan; several separate documents, viz., the resignation of his office and the appointment of Joshua, the Song of Moses, the Blessing of Moses, and the account of his death.

The delivery of the addresses began on the first day of the eleventh month of the fortieth year after the Departure (ch. i. 3).

VIII. Account of the death and burial of Moses, ch. xxxiv. 1-8; encomium, vv. 10-12.

The contents disclose the design of this book to be the farewell address, or parting charge, of the great leader, lawgiver and prophet of Israel, in which he reviews the most memorable events of their joint history, accentuates those parts of the law which mark their covenant relation to God, and depicts the consequences both of their obedience and disobedience.

The striking unity of style and treatment proclaims the book as the work of one author, while the concurrent results of external and internal evidence constrain us to accept it as the work of Moses.

The traditional belief of the Mosaic origin of the Book of Deuteronomy is all but universal, and its rejection by some is of relatively recent date. To deny the Mosaic authorship is to deny the testimony of the Christian Church, of the fathers, of the apostles, of the Divine Founder of our religion, and of the sacred writers of the Old Testament almost up to the very time of the reputed date of this book. Those who challenge the Mosaic authorship must prove on internal grounds that Moses could not have written it, and that the sacred writers of the Old Testament, our Lord and His apostles, and the Church of the Old and New Covenants were mistaken, and sanctioned a falsehood.

Not less than forty direct citations from this book are found in the New Testament, and it may suffice here to name only three in which our Lord expressly authenticates it as the work of Moses, viz., Matth. xix. 7, 8; Mark x. 3, 4; John v. 46, 47.

References and allusions to Deuteronomy, and verbal coincidences with it, abound in most of the books of the Old Testament, and prove, as they are too numerous and explicit to be accidental, that the Book of Deuteronomy was known, and in common use, in Israel at the time of their composition. They are so frequent and striking in the writings of Jeremiah, that that prophet has actually been named as the author of Deuteronomy.* Isaiah, Amos, Hosea, the compilers, or annotators of the books of Kings, Samuel, Judges, and the author of Ruth, knew and used the book of Deuteronomy, and this indisputable fact proves that from the time of Moses, all through the checked history of Israel, this book has been in constant use.†

Comparison of the said passages furnishes incontestable evidence that the writers in question were intimately acquainted with the Book of Deuteronomy, and shuts up the objector to the incredible hypothesis that it was compiled after their publication by a skilful forger who adapted his own work to them for the express purpose of establishing so surprising a harmony.

The great antiquity of Deuteronomy is manifest from numerous archaisms; ‡ Besides those which, being strictly grammatical, cannot be discussed in a popular introduction, may be named the prevalence of figures, comparisons, and phrases, peculiar to Moses, such as "a root that beareth gall and wormwood" (for a secret apostate), ch. xxix. 18, head and tail, ch. xxviii. 13, 44, "to add drunkenness to thirst" (for confirmed sinners enticing those dangling with sin), ch. xxix. 19; "as a man doth his son," ch. i. 1, "chased you as bees do," ch. v. 44, "as a man chasteneth his son," ch. vii. 5, "as the eagle flies," ch. xxviii. 49, "as the blind gropeth," v. 29; "gates" for habitations, nineteen times, "empty" for without an offering, ch. xvi. 16; "to humble a woman," ch. xxi. 14; xxii. 24, 29; "to turn to the right hand or to the left" for departing from the law of God, ch. v. 32; xxviii. 49; "to prolong days" for long life, eleven times, etc., etc.

The Mosaic authorship of this book is also proved from numerous statements, provisions, and references, such as the prohibition of intercourse with the Canaanites, ch. vii. 1 sq.; the removal of the shoe as the symbol of transfer of right and title,

* The inconclusiveness of this opinion has been triumphantly demonstrated in the exhaustive and unsavoury work of L. König, "Alttestamentliche Studien," 2 Hft., Berlin, 1869.

† The places showing the correspondences are too numerous for reproduction here, but may be seen at considerable length in the Introductions named under Literature, and, for ready reference, in the volume on Deuteronomy. ("Pulpit Commentary," p. vii. sqq.)

‡ See the works of König, i. c., Dietrich, "Abhandlungen," § 89, Delitzsch, "Genea," Einleitung, § 37, Hengstenberg, "Uebersetzungen," etc., and for a compilation, "The Pulpit Commentary," Deuteronomy, pp. xiv.-xvi.

ch. xxv. 9 (in proof of the antiquity of this usage, and of the prior existence of Deuteronomy, see Ruth iv. 7); the injunction to remember the conduct of Amalek, v. 17 (which would have been absurd after the extirpation of the Amalekites); the provision for the regal office, ch. xvii. 14 (which must have been written before the time of Samuel); the directions concerning the blessing and the curse, ch. xxvii. 11, 12 (their vagueness would have been avoided by a later writer); the appointment of cities of refuge, ch. xix. 1-10 (which is incredible long after the occupation of the land) etc., etc.

The Mosaic authorship of Deuteronomy is equally vouched for by the entire absence of anything conflicting with the circumstances of time and place under which it was composed; the time is uniformly that immediately preceding the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan, and the place as uniformly the plains of Moab. The speaker appears throughout in the character of leader, lawgiver, and friend of the people; he narrates the events of their joint history as one who had lived through them all; his charges breathe the spirit of authority and loving solicitude, and this is also the undertone of the terrible predictions in which he portrays the consequences of their disobedience, and of the blessings which he bestows on the several tribes. Only one intimately acquainted with the laws and usages of Egypt by long residence in that country would have introduced the numerous references and allusions to the period of Israel's servitude, as warnings, or incentives to holiness. It has been said with great truth: "If Deuteronomy is not the work of Moses, there is here the most exquisite of literary frauds, and that in an age which had not as yet acquired the art of transporting itself into foreign individualities and situations" (Hengstenberg).

This leads us to emphasize the express declarations found in the book itself that Moses wrote it; they are as follows:

Ch. i. 1. "These be the words which Moses spake unto all Israel on this side Jordan in the wilderness, in the plain over against the Red Sea, between Paran, and Tophel, and Laban, and Hazeroth, and Dizahab."

Ch. xxix. 1. "These are the words of the covenant, which the Lord commanded Moses to make with the children of Israel in the land of Moab, beside the covenant which he made with them in Horeb."

Ch. xxxi. 1. "And Moses went and spake these words unto all Israel."

Vr. 9-11. "And Moses wrote this law, and delivered it," etc.

Vr. 24-26. "And it came to pass, when Moses had made an end of writing the words of this law in a book, until they were finished," etc.*

* The entire passage reads thus: "And it came to pass, when Moses had made an end of writing the words of this law in a book, until they were finished, that Moses commanded the Levites which bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord, saying take this book of the law, and put it in the side of the ark of the covenant of the Lord your God, that it may be there for a witness against thee." The full text of v. 9 is: "And Moses wrote this law, and delivered unto the priests, the sons of Levi, which bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord, and unto all the elders of Israel." These two places, as well as ch. x. 1-5, are commended to the notice of Professor W. Robertson Smith, M.A., who, on p. 257 of his work, "The Old Testament in the Jewish Church," New York, 1891, makes the startling announcement that "It is very noteworthy, and on the traditional view, quite inexplicable, that the

There being nothing in the contents of Deuteronomy in conflict with these statements, we are bound to regard them as true, and to reject with the Jewish and Christian Church of every age the insinuation that the book is a forgery.

THE CHURCH IN CANADA.

FROM OUR CORRESPONDENT.

The complete suppression of the late Northwest Rebellion and the triumphant return of the troops seems to mark a very important era in the history of the Dominion. Totally unaided and quite single-handed, Canada has suppressed, in an almost incredibly short time, a rebellion which seemed at one time likely to tax her resources to the very utmost, and last an indefinitely long time. Whether it be the bravery and fortitude of her citizen soldiers, the decision and promptitude of the Government, or the singular unanimity of the nation, this episode will ever remain one of the brightest in her history. Indirect good will there fore eventuate from this most unfortunate affair, in the development of loyalty, patriotism, and national self-respect, and, moreover, in the not unlikely further opening up of this vast country, which promises yet to become in every sense our "Greater Canada."

I very much regret to announce the somewhat untimely demise of the Rev. G. W. Hodgson, rector of St. Peter's church, Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island. Mr. Hodgson was for many years a member of the Provincial Synod, and took a very prominent part in the debates of that body. He was a fine preacher and a most diligent parish priest, and his loss will be keenly felt in the island province, where the Church can ill spare such a man.

A retreat for the clergy of the Diocese of Newfoundland was recently held at Topsail, which was conducted by the Rev. Canon Churton, of King's College, Cambridge, who was on his way to attend the Synod of Fredericton. There was an early celebration each day, and the canon delivered very impressive addresses upon a series of practical subjects. The retreat seems to have been productive of much good, and its effect will not soon pass away.

At a meeting of the corporation of Trinity College, Toronto, lately held in that city, it was announced that $108,588 had been collected in Canada and England toward the Supplemental Endowment Fund. The bulk of this magnificent sum, a large portion of which is already paid, has been collected by the Rev. R. H. Starr. The corporation decided to continue the canvass. A very prosperous future seems now assured for old Trinity.

At an ordination held by the bishop in St. James's Cathedral, July 26th, the following gentlemen were ordained deacons:—Messrs. E. A. Oliver, B. A., R. Harris and C. Scadding, Trinity College, and A. C. Miles, A. W. Daniel, P. W. H. French, and H. B. Hobson, Wycliffe College. The Revs. Angell and Armitage were raised to the priesthood. Canon Dumoulin, rector of the cathedral, has signified his intention of discarding the black gown in the pulpit. A discussion on the subject has been dragging its interminable length through the columns of the Toronto Globe ever since. One writer says the black gown is "the distinguishing mark of the Reformation."

Mosaic sanctuary of the ark is never mentioned in the Deuteronomic code." It is, I think, very noteworthy and quite inexplicable that the Professor should commit himself to so damaging a statement, for if he has read the Book of Deuteronomy, he must have read it in a very slovenly way; and if he has not read it, he is certainly not qualified to criticize its contents. Such criticisms are downright perversions of the truth.

The Sisters of St. John the Divine are meeting with the most encouraging success in Toronto. They have rented an additional house adjoining their own, for the reception of patients, which has already been partially furnished by the kindness of numerous friends. A committee of ladies, presided over by Mrs. Sweetman, is energetically co-operating with the good sisters.

Thanksgiving services, with a celebration of the Holy Communion, for the complete suppression of the Northwest Rebellion and the safe return of the volunteers, have been held in the Dioceses of Huron, Niagara, and Toronto. At these services special psalms, lessons, and collects were read.

The Bishop of Saskatchewan is at present upon an extended confirmation tour among his Indian missions. All these missions are supported by the Church Missionary Society of England.

The new cathedral at St. Johns, Newfoundland, is to be consecrated September 1st.

It is being proposed in many quarters to present the metropolitan with some memorial upon the attainment of the fortieth year of his consecration. A good many suggestions have been made, but the establishment of a Bishop Medley Divinity Scholarship Fund seems to meet with most favor. At a recent meeting in Fredericton, a committee was appointed to take steps to investigate the prospects of successfully undertaking such a scheme.

ENGLAND.

THE GRANT MEMORIAL AT WESTMINSTER ABBEY.—On Tuesday, August 4th, an imposing memorial service for the late General Grant was held in Westminster Abbey. The abbey was crowded with a congregation, nearly every member of which was a distinguished personage. The service began with Schubert's "Funeral March," after which followed a general procession up the nave to the choir, with the sentences of the burial service. The burial anthem (Psalm xc.) was then sung, followed by the Lesson (I. Cor. ix. 20).

Archdeacon Farrar then delivered an impressive address, taking as his text, Acts xiii. 38. He said, in substance:

"Eight years have not passed since the late Dean Stanley, whom Americans so loved and honored, was walking around this abbey with General Grant, explaining its wealth of great memorials. Neither of them had nearly attained the allotted span of human life. Both might have hoped that many years would elapse before descending to the grave, full of years and honors. This is only the fourth summer since Dean Stanley fell asleep. To-day we assemble at the obsequies of the great soldier whose sun set while it was yet day, and at whose funeral service in America tens of thousands are assembled at this moment to mourn with the weeping family and friends. I desire to speak simply and directly, with generous appreciation, but without idle flattery, of his private life, his faults or failings of character, whatever they may have been, belong to no sense to the world. They are before the judgment of God's merciful forgiveness.

"We will touch only upon his public actions and services. Upon a bluff overlooking the Hudson his monument will stand, recalling to future generations the dark page in the nation's history which he did so much to close."

After eloquently tracing Gen. Grant's boyhood and manhood, the speaker said: "If the men who knew him in Galena—obscure, silent, unprosperous, unambitious—had said, if any one had predicted, that he would become twice president and one of the foremost men of the day, the prophecy would have seemed extravagantly ridiculous. But such careers are the glory of the American continent; they show that the people have sovereign insight into intrinsic force. If Rome told with pride that her dictators came from the plowland, America may record the answer of the president who, when asked what would be his coat-of-arms, answered proudly, 'mind of his early struggles, 'A pair of shirt-sleeves.' The answer showed a noble sense of the dignity of labor, a noble superiority to the vanities of feudalism, a strong conviction that men should be honored simply as men, not according to the accident of birth. America has had two martyred presidents—both sons of the people. One, a homely man, who was a farm lad at the age of seven, a rail-splitter at nineteen, a Mississippi boatman at twenty-eight, and who in manhood proved one of the strongest, most honest and God-fearing of modern rulers. The other grew, from a shoeless child, to a humble teacher in the Hiram Institute. With those presidents America need not blush to name the leather-seller of Galena. Every true man derives a patent of nobleness direct from God. Was not the Lord for thirty years a carpenter in Nazareth! Lincoln's and Garfield's and Grant's early conscientious attention to humble duties fitted them to become kings of men. The year 1861 saw the outbreak of the most terrible of modern wars. The hour came, and the man was needed. Within four years Grant commanded an army vaster than had ever before been handled by man. It was not luck but the result of inflexible faithfulness, indomitable resolution, sleepless energy, iron purpose, persistent tenacity. He rose by the upward gravitation of natural fitness. The very soldiers became impregnated with his spirit. General Grant has been grossly and unjustly called a butcher. He loved peace and hated bloodshed. But it was his duty at all costs to save the country. The struggle was not for victory, but for existence; not for glory, but for life or death. In his silence, determination and clearness of insight, Grant resembled Washington and Wellington. In the hottest fury of the battle his speech never exceeded 'yes, yes,' and 'nay, nay.'

"God's light has shown for the future destinies of a mighty nation that the war of 1861 was a necessary, a blessed work. The Church has never refused to honor the faithful soldier fighting for the cause of his country and his God. The cause for which Grant fought—the unity of a great people, the freedom of a whole race—was as great and noble as when, at Lexington, the embattled farmers fired the shot which resounded around the world. The South accepted a bloody arbitrament. But the rancor and fury of the past are buried in oblivion. The names of Lee and Jackson will be a common heritage with those of Garfield and Grant. Americans are no longer Northerners and Southerners, but Americans. What verdict history will pronounce upon Grant as a politician and a man, I know not; but here and now the voice of censure, deserved or undeserved, is silent. We leave his faults to the mercy of the merciful. Let us write his virtues on brass for men's example. Let his faults, whatever they may have been, be written on water. Who can tell if his closing hours of torture and misery were not blessings in disguise—God purging the gold from dross until the strong man was utterly purified by his strong agony. Could we be gathered in a more fitting place to honor General Grant! There is no lack of American memorials here. We add another to-day. Whatever there be between the two nations to forget and forgive is forgotten and forgiven. If the two peoples which are one be true to their duty, who can doubt that the destinies of the world are in their hands. Let America and England march in the van of freedom and progress, showing the world not only a magnificent spectacle of human happiness, but a still more magnificent spectacle of two peoples united, loving righteousness and hating iniquity, inflexibly faithful to the principles of eternal justice, which are the unchanging law of God."

After the address, which was listened to in almost breathless silence, Spohr's anthem, "Blessed are the Departed," and Handel's "His Body is Buried in Peace," were sung; after which the two concluding prayers of the Burial Service were said, and the blessing was pronounced. The Dead March in "Saul" was played as the immense congregation dispersed.

Among those present were members of both Houses of Parliament, representatives both of the late and present ministry. Mr. Gladstone, Lord Salisbury, the Duke of Cambridge, Commander-in-Chief, and representative of the army, foreign ambassadors, the Chief Justice of the United States, and other prominent Americans. The Queen, the Prince of Wales, and the Dukes of Connaught and Edinburgh were represented, while the Prince and Princess Teck attended in person. During the service the flags at Windsor and on the royal yachts were lowered.

THE BISHOP OF PETERBOROUGH.—A rumor that the Bishop of Peterborough was about to resign, has been authoritatively contradicted. He attended the late meeting of Convocation and looked very well.

AN ARMENIAN PASTOR IN LONDON.—An interesting correspondence has taken place between Dr. Essai Adevadadourian, a member of the Confraternity of Etchmiadzin, and the Archbishop of Canterbury.—On the 1st of July, the former wrote a letter to the Primate, in which he stated that the Synod of Etchmiadzin had issued a mandate appointing him spiritual pastor to the Armenian residents in London, and that it had authorized him to open a place of worship at Nottinghill, and had engaged to supply him with the necessary vestments and holy vessels. On the ground that the Church of England and the Church of Armenia are sister Churches, and have many things in common, the Armenian primate requested the due authorization of the Archbishop and of the Bishop of London. The Primate replied on July 19th. He stated that after conferring with the Bishop of London he wished to express his great satisfaction that the Synod of Etchmiadzin has determined to open a church "for the worship of those families which are resident here belonging to the ancient and illustrious Church of Armenia." The Archbishop, after recognizing the fact that the Church of Armenia "is a sister National Church of the Church of England," says:—"It gives me sincere pleasure also to find that a pastor of such eminence and such experience, and one who expresses views so consonant with my own, has been appointed by the Holy Synod to be pastor of our Armenian brethren in London." It is stated that the church has been actually opened at Nottinghill. Mr. Essayan, an Armenian merchant of London and Constantinople, has liberally provided an altar and defrayed the expense of furnishing the church.

SCOTLAND.

THE COADJUTOR BISHOP OF MORAY AND ROSS.—The proceedings for the election of a Coadjutor-Bishop of Moray and Ross have come to hand. The Rt. Rev. James Butler Kull Kelly, D.D., some time Bishop of Newfoundland, was chosen by a vote of 17 against 10 for the Rev. John Ferguson. The election has to be confirmed by the College of Bishops.

The Rt. Rev. J. B. K. Kelly, D.D., the coadjutor-elect was born in 1832. He was graduated at Cambridge in 1854. He was ordained deacon in 1855, and priest in 1856, by the Bishop of Peterborough, and was curate of Abingdon, in Northamptonshire. Subsequently he became chaplain to the Bishop of Sodor and Man, and vicar of Kirkmanton, in the Isle of Man. In 1865 Mr. Kelly was made Archdeacon of Newfoundland, under Bishop Field, and president of the theological college at St. John's. In 1867 Mr. Kelly was elected Coadjutor-Bishop of Newfoundland, and continued in that position until Bishop Field's death, in 1876. The constant sea voyages required of him as bishop brought on a determination of blood to the head, and the physicians ordered their discontinuance. Deeming himself too young to ask for a coadjutor, Bishop Kelly resigned in 1877, and became vicar of Kirby, in the Diocese of Chester. He was Archdeacon of Macclesfield from 1880 to 1884, and Bishop-Commissary of Chester from 1879 until the death of Bishop Jacobson, in 1884.

JERUSALEM.

THE ANGLICAN BISHOPRIC.—According to the Cologne Gazette, the present arrangement with regard to the Bishopric of Jerusalem will probably be given up. As is well known, England and Prussia at present possess the right to appoint a Protestant Bishop of Jerusalem alternately. It is now Prussia's turn to name a bishop; but there is good reason for believing that she wishes to retire and leave the bishopric entirely in the hands of the English. It is stated, on other authority, that the reason why Prussia desires to retire is that she finds it difficult to procure any clergyman of the State Church willing to submit to English ordination and consecration.

SOUTH AFRICA.

THE NEW CATHEDRAL OF BLOEMFONTEIN.—The new nave of the Cathedral of Bloemfontein was dedicated by the Bishop of Grahamstown on Sunday, June 7th. The original building, now forming the chancel and sanctuary, was built in 1866, while Bishop With was one of the Bloemfontein clergy, and in 1876 the demand for further accommodation was met by the addition of a temporary iron structure; but in 1880 a stone nave was begun, which has just been completed. Bishop Webb was heartily welcomed to his old diocese to dedicate the cathedral, in whose building he had taken such interest.

LYNN—Church of the Incarnation.—This new parish (the Rev. J. L. Egbert, rector,) starts off with over fifty communicants. At a recent meeting of persons interested, it was voted to erect a stone church edifice thirty-two feet by sixty, to seat two hundred and fifty persons. A lot has been secured, and an architect engaged.

NEWTON—Grace Church.—Workmen are engaged upon the interior of this church (the Rev. Dr. G. W. Shinn, rector,) making repairs and improvements. The building will not be ready for occupancy before the first Sunday in September, but in the meantime services are held in the new chapel.

WATERTOWN—A Mission Chapel.—A movement has been begun for the purchase of a lot preparatory to the erection of a chapel for the needs of this mission. Services are continued regularly during the summer in a hall.

NEW YORK.

NEW YORK—The Church of the Reformation.—This building, erected in 1883, which was condemned by the Department of Public Works, has been torn down, while the ground has been broken for a new edifice. The contracts have been given out, and the work will be pushed forward with all possible dispatch. It is expected that the church will be completed by Christmas, and that it may be possible to occupy the basement much earlier. The building will cost $45,000, and the furnishing $5,000. The Rev. Dr. E. F. Miles is the minister in charge.

FORDHAM—The Home for Incurables.—On the Sunday following St. Barnabas' Day, a new and commodious chapel was opened in connection with this institution. The chapel was given as a thanksgiving offering, in 1883, by Mr. Benjamin H. Fields and wife, Mr. Fields being president of the institution. The building is of brick, has a seating capacity of two hundred persons, and cost $8,000. Mr. Renwick was the architect. The whole number of patients in the home is 127, of whom, 75 attended service on the first Sunday in August. The patients are of all denominations, but take much interest in the services, which are those of the Prayer Book, shortened. The services are held twice on Sunday, as also, morning and evening on week days. The chaplain, the Rev. Dr. Thomas Drummond makes an address on both occasions, five or ten minutes long, which has added much to the interest of the services. Within a few weeks the congregation has trebled.

At the north end of the home, a pavilion was added last fall and opened the first week in May, which will accommodate 66 patients. Of the buildings occupying the thirteen acres, all are of a high order of architecture, but the pavilion surpasses all the others. The rooms are comfortably and tastefully fitted up, while the pavilion is connected with the north wing by means of corridors enclosed by double glass windows. The corridors are fifteen feet in width, and afford excellent seating accommodations for the patients. No expense has been spared in the matter of plumbing, gas fixtures, etc., and the work is as good as that in a first-class hotel. The cost of the pavilion was $45,000, this amount having been raised by means of subscriptions. In general the home is in a prosperous condition.

TOMKINS COVE—The House of the Good Shepherd.—This institution, situated in Rockland County, on the west side of the Hudson River, was established in 1896 as a home for orphans and also as a mission house. During the eighteen years of its existence over five hundred children have been received and educated. Of these over one hundred are communicants of the Church, while with few known exceptions all are useful members of society.

In its work as a mission house, the Gospel has been preached throughout the mountainous region where the home is situated; Sunday-schools and Church services have been established and carried on, and several hundreds of adults and children have received baptism.

In addition to this, hundreds of garments have been judiciously distributed among the very poor.

In the summer season special arrangements are made to receive from the streets of the heated and uncomfortable city, and from the hospitals, those who need a few days in the country. By means of this department a great deal of good has been done, and many sick have been restored to health.

The situation of the home is unrivaled for beauty and healthfulness, and near by are many sites on which buildings may be erected in the future. The walls of the Church of the Holy Child Jesus are slowly rising, and, when erected, the church will be one of the most attractive objects on the Hudson.

The immediate needs of the work are means for the daily support of fifty persons, clothing for poor men, women and children, and money with which to erect the Church of the Holy Child Jesus. The institution is in charge of the Rev. E. Gay, Jr.

LONG ISLAND.

BROOKLYN—St. Ann's Church.—The vestry of this parish having resolved to change the character of their music by the introduction of a surpliced choir, the necessary changes in the arrangement of the chancel to adapt it to this service were begun early in July, with the expectation that worship can be resumed about the middle of September. The alterations which are proposed will cost about $4,000.

BROOKLYN—St. Stephen's Church.—Funeral services of the late rector of this parish, the Rev. Dr. Thomas Frederick Cornell, who died after an illness of several weeks on Friday, July 31st, were held in the church on Tuesday, August 4th. Of the clergy there were present the bishop, the Rev. Drs. D. V. M. Johnson, C. H. Hall and Francis Peck, the Rev. Messrs. S. S. Roche, H. H. Washburn, C. W. Turner, C. L. Twing, R. B. Snowden, L. S. Russell, H. O. Lacy, E. A. Edgerton and D. Marvin. The service was conducted by the Rev. Francis Peck, who has officiated during the illness of Dr. Cornell, the Rev. Dr. D. V. M. Johnson reading the lesson. A minute prepared by the Rev. S. S. Roche, rector of St. Mark's church, of which the deceased was rector for many years, was adopted by vote of the clergy and read at the service by Mr. Roche. In it he said: "The Rev. T. F. Cornell, M.D., was born in the city of New York in 1830. On his father's side he was descended from the Cornell family of Central New York, while through his mother he was connected with the family of Mann, long and well-known in the metropolis. At the age of twenty he was graduated at the New York University. He entered the College of Physicians and Surgeons, and after three years he took his degree. Shortly after, the impulse of his mind inclining him to the sacred ministry, he entered the General Theological Seminary, where he took his diploma in 1857, having as classmates the present Bishop of New Jersey and the Missionary Bishop of Colorado. He was soon after his graduation placed in charge of the Church of the Redeemer, Morristown, N. J. Thence he was called, August, 1861, to the rectorship of St. Mark's church, Brooklyn. On his arrival he found the parish in a very depressed condition, but his energetic administration, his distinguished pulpit ability and his genial personality soon wrought under the divine blessing a great change. The finances improved, the membership increased and the location of the parish church was changed to that which it holds at the present time. After ministering in this field for more than eight years, failing health rendered prolonged rest advisable, and having tendered his resignation to a vestry unwilling to receive it, he terminated his connection December, 1869. An extended tour in Europe followed. On his return he made his residence in this city, and at a later period assumed charge of the Church of the Mediator, and subsequently accepted an invitation to the rectorship of St. Stephen's. In his last scene of holy activity he displayed a noble fidelity, a constant zeal. His health now visibly failing, he begrudged not the expenditure of his strength in the labors of the Gospel. He felt that the preparation of the class for confirmation in the late spring was un-dermining his vitality, but he would not be restrained. When the candidates had been presented, he gave affecting expression to that joy which Almighty God permits His priests who are conscious of having manfully tried to do their best. On the first Sunday evening in June he preached before a Post of the Grand Army of the Republic. He never after officiated in the congregation or left his house. In a painless and comparatively comfortable interval of the disease, and about two weeks before his death, he gathered his household around him, and, like Jacob, worshipped and blessed. The end came peacefully, and on the last day of July, 1885, our friend was sumbered with those who are asleep in Jesus. The comprehension of his character and the lesson of his life should remain as a precious inheritance to his bereaved home, to the wide circle of his clerical acquaintances, and to that far larger number to whom he was known as pastor, counsellor and friend. In the Rev. Dr. Cornell a mind of native force, disciplined by a long-continued training in the schools, adorned with capabilities that furnished the basis for the eloquence of the pulpit and seconded by attractive manner, was instrumental by the blessing of God in gathering fruit unto life eternal."

BROOKLYN—Church Charity Foundation.—During the spring of this year, by the will of the late David Chauncey, $500 was received by the Foundation. To this handsome legacy an additional $500 was generously contributed by members of the Chauncey family, and it was determined by them to devote the $1,000 to the erection and furnishing of an Infirmary for the Orphan House. The matter having by them been entrusted to an advisory committee, of which Mr. Edwin Beers was made chairman, the work was begun in June, and is now completed except the furnishing, which will soon be accomplished.

This result has been secured by converting the attic of the new wing of Orphan's House into an Infirmary, which, thus constituted, comprises a boys' ward about 34x18 feet in size, and a girl's ward adjoining, not quite so large, together with a nurses' room, an excellent bath room, and plenty of closet room for linen and other necessities. It is intended at present, to put six beds in each ward, which will afford more than ample accommodation for the sick, except in case of an epidemic. The beautiful situation of the Foundation and the excellent care taken of the children, rendering the percentage of illness very small. There are at present, 84 children in the orphanage, a larger number than ever before in the history of the institution. The facilities for recovery in case of illness will be now all that can be desired, through this infirmary so kindly provided by the Chauncey family, and wisely planned by the chairman of the committee.

A home for the printer boys has been provided in the house adjoining the Printing House. Mr. William Clarke, foreman of the office, himself formerly one of the orphan boys of the Foundation, will, with his wife, occupy the house and take charge of the boys. Under the supervision of two of the lady managers and the superintendent, Mr. J. J. Golder, six girls are now under instruction. Five girls, former pupils, are now supporting themselves by this occupation in Brooklyn; and two others who were instructed some years since, were employed in New York offices until they married.

A member of Grace church has presented the Foundation with an excellent stereopticon, accompanied by about 300 slides, representing many interesting views of buildings, cities and art treasures, together with lectures in print and manuscript. The chaplain, the Rev. Joseph Reynolds, expects to make use of this valuable gift in the autumn and winter, for the entertainment and instruction of inmates and friends of the Foundation.

The manager of the Brooklyn, Flatbush & Coney Island R. R., James Jourdan, Esq., has kindly presented a pass for 25 children weekly, by which all will in turn be able to enjoy the pleasures of the beach during the season.

GARDEN CITY—The Cathedral School of St. Paul.—The following circular and endorsement has been issued to the clergy and laity of the diocese:

DEAR SIR:—At the special convention of the Diocese of Long Island, April 16th, 1885, as part of the action taken in regard to the various branches of the cathedral work in Garden City, it was declared in substance that the Cathedral School of St. Paul should henceforth be considered both diocesan in its character and diocesan in its claims upon the clergy and laity of the diocese, to do what they can to sustain it by their sympathy and patronage.

In the report of the Standing Committee on Christian Education, presented and read at the last annual convention, held a few weeks later (May 19th), an earnest appeal was made to the clergy and laity to remember, as matters of the utmost practical importance, the declaration thus made and the obligation thus assumed.

As head master of this your own school, I beg you to consider this appeal a personal one, and to show your interest in St. Paul's, both by doing all in your power to increase its membership, and also by visiting it and personally observing its work.

With the magnificent building already provided and a corps of teachers who are enthusiastic in their work, and who believe that this work includes the building up of character as well as the training of the mind, the school will be a source of strength to the Church and the diocese, as well as a centre of intellectual culture, and will amply repay all efforts in its behalf.

This, however, will depend largely upon the interest taken in the school by the clergy and laity of the diocese.

I ask, therefore, your heartiest co-operation and support in my efforts to make St. Paul's all that you desire it to be.

CHARLES STURTEVANT MOORE, Head Master.
Garden City, L. I., Aug. 1st, 1885.

The above letter has my cordial approval, and I commend it to the earnest and respectful attention of the clergy and laity of the diocese. The proceedings of the special and annual convention referred to, were influential in determining the head master's acceptance of his difficult and responsible position, and he is only suitably discharging his duty in thus pointedly reminding us all of their scope and meaning. I pray that he will not have done so without receiving from all whom this great interest concerns the encouragement and support which he so much needs, and which, I am glad to add from personal knowledge of his character and acquirements, he so well deserves.

A. N. LITTLEJOHN,

Bishop of Long Island.
See House, Garden City, Aug. 1st, 1885.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

BUFFALO—Trinity Church.—The Buffalo Courier says of the new church building for this church (the Rev. Dr. L. Van Bokkelen, rector):

"The preliminary work on the new Trinity church edifice on Delaware Avenue is rapidly approaching completion. The outside masonry is finished, the roof is on, and the ceiling is being pushed forward as rapidly as possible. A visitor to the building found the interior in possession of a little army of carpenters and painters, engaged on work at or for the ceiling, a portion of which is so far completed as to enable a casual observer to form some idea of its proportions and appearance. The roof is supported on eight trusses, resting on massive hammer-beams, and forming what is known as an open timber ceiling. The woodwork is of heavy Gothic design, with ornamental arches, in character with the general plan. Between the trusses on each side of the church are longitudinal arches, and the spaces between the trusses are each divided into four sections appropriately outlined in carved wood-work. In each of the sections are three panels. The groundwork of the ceiling is a light sky-blue, with a stencil work pattern of a darker shade. Scattered over the ground-work are stars in gold-leaf, which will be very pretty and effective, especially when the church is lit up. The lighting will be effected by means of coronas depending from the ends of the hammer-beams, and will be both novel and brilliant. The lower wainscoting has yet to be done, and also the plastering, before the building will be ready for the stained glass-work of the doors and interior fittings generally. The work in the chancel, the gift of Mrs. Clark, and selected by her in New York, will be done under the direction of Mr. Geiseler of that city."

GENEVA—Trinity Church.—During the past week workmen have been occupied in taking up the floor of Trinity church preparatory to replacing it entirely with a pavement of encaustic tiles. The pavement will be about three inches lower than the present floor, and will be a very great improvement to the interior of the church. It is not generally known, perhaps, that such a pavement is, in the long run, a great economy in churches, as in other public buildings—saving the wear as well as the dust and other disadvantages incident to carpets. A church which has even a hardwood floor for its alleys, as is the case in some large and costly churches in this country, can be kept free and clean from dust and dirt in a degree impossible where the whole church is carpeted; but tile-paving is ever so much better than hardwood, and not so very much more expensive; having also the advantage of much greater security from fire, and being almost proof against ordinary wear.

The addition to Trinity church, a large stone edifice, including commodious rooms for parish and Sunday-school use, is going on rapidly towards completion, and will be ready, it is hoped, for the Council of the Diocese, which meets there in September.—The Church Calendar.

NEW JERSEY.

MANTUA—St. Barnabas's Church.—This church (the Rev. H. B. Bryan, in charge), has just been presented with a very handsome carved altar-cross and vases from the Rev. Howard E. Thompson, rector of Christ church, Woodbury, N. J. The church needs still a font and lamps, and it is hoped some one will help it to them.

NORTHERN NEW JERSEY.

ORANGE—The Bishop's Recommendation.—The bishop of this diocese issued a recommendation to the clergy that all the churches should be opened for appropriate religious services on Saturday, August 8th, the day of the funeral of the late General Grant. In accordance with the recommendation, appropriate services were held in many of the churches of the diocese.

PENNSYLVANIA.

PHILADELPHIA—St. Jude's Church.—This parish, (the Rev. W. H. Graff, rector), situated in one of the older portions of the city, is one of the most active. There are 311 communicants on the list. The public services during the last convention year were 276. 6 adults and 15 infants were baptised; 23 were confirmed; 44 new communicants were added. In the Sunday-school there are 28 officers and teachers, and 276 pupils who are faithfully catechised. The parish school has 1 teacher and 90 pupils. There are connected with the church as aids in its work a Church Progress Committee, a Missionary Staff Guild, (young men), a Chancel Committee, (young ladies), a Beneficial Association, a Mother's Meeting, Mothers Aid Society, sewing school and a parish paper.

The receipts from all sources were $7,301.42. This parish, which is by no means a wealthy one, shows what may be done for missions by a systematic effort being put forth. It has given during the year for various missionary objects $664.40, beside $282.22 for the sick and needy, $90 to the Episcopal Hospital, $24.50 to the Sheltering Arms, $32.38 to the Increase of the Ministry, $35.26 to the Disabled Clergy Fund. It has one of the most efficient vested choirs in the city. The congregations are large and the people energetic. The church owns all its property, (church and school-building), free from every encumbrance, and is now with commendable zeal putting forth a strong effort to secure a rectory, towards which they have already $1,800.

MARYLAND.

FUNDS AND LEGACIES.—There are several funds created by legacy or otherwise for the benefit of this diocese, and which, now handsomely invested, are yielding goodly fruit.

THE DIOCESAN MISSIONS' FUND.—Though not strictly coming under the heading, only some seventy out of the one hundred and forty congregations of the year 1884, contributing to it, reached last year $3,041.85; $823.79 special; $522 of the total, from the "Trustees of Church Charities," and $1,283 from collections on occasions of episcopal visitations; then, from cash due treasurer, $665; general total, $9,535.62. The resolution of the convention fixing $10,000 for the minimum of missionary expenditure for the year was, it is thus seen, none too large. A trifle more of effort (especially on the part of the sixty-two non-contributing congregations, which, though themselves weak and poor, could still have given something, would have reached the amount suggested by the convention). The bishop has asked that no less than $15,000 be, if possible, raised during the year ending May, 1886, for Diocesan Missions. Forty-seven clergy, at nineteen mission stations, twenty-five parishes and seventeen congregations, are annually aided out of this fund.

FUND FOR SUPERANNUATED AND DISABLED CLERGY.—This fund is made up from voluntary contributions from some fifty parishes and congregations, some special donations from individuals, bequests and investments, from which last source it received for the last year some $1,000, making in all $2,593.80. Ninety-two parishes made last year no contribution toward this important fund. The fund is appropriated upon orders of the missions' committee, which, to nine clergy of the diocese, have, in sums of from $100 to $350, ordered the distribution of $2,100 of this fund. This is done with delicate privacy, and every care and loving forethought exercised in apportioning the sum at the disposal of the committee according to the needs and circumstances of each beneficiary. Besides this fund which is raised and may be expended year by year, there is "the permanent Clerical Sustentation Fund," which amounts now to $864; and though it is annually added to itself, and though growing very slowly, a few parishes take interest in it, and it is destined to be a source of great help to the diocese.

RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION.—The committee distributed last year $205 in Bibles and Prayer Books and Hymnals, giving away of these 1,352 volumes; for the aid of parish schools in Washington and Baltimore, $175. The convention appoints the second Sunday in November as the day for this diocesan collection; about forty, out of the one hundred and forty parishes, responded.

THE DIOCESAN "PERMANENT FUND."—The trustees of the Episcopal Fund, report the gratifying sum of productive property and securities, included in this fund, to be $22,974, being in city stock, bank shares, and ground rent. Their unproductive property, residence, library and annex, is $43,883; total amount in the hands of this board of trustees, of which the diocesan is ex-officio a member, $66,858.

THE WYMAN FUND.—This fund is now $4,500, invested in Baltimore loans; the income from this fund, left by Samuel G. Wyman, of pious memory, is divided equally between the Church Home and Infirmary, the Aged and Infirm Clergy Fund, Diocesan Mission Fund, St. John's Church School, Huntington, and the rector of St. John's, same place.

SUPERANNUATED AND DISABLED CLERGY FUND.—This fund has invested in city loans, savings bank, and railroad bonds, the sum of $13,135.79. product $900, paid to treasurer of the Committee of Missions, being the six per cent. interest on that sum, plus sums from a few other sources, ($1,700 from the Prout, and from the Hink's Funds, the Young and the Winn legacies, are included in the total of this fund.

THE REV. DR. MCKENNEY FUND.—This is at present $6,975.48. The income from $3,580 of this goes to the credit of the Theological Education Fund of the Diocese, and is to always be at the order of the diocesan; the income from $2,330 of the fund is deposited to the credit of the treasurer for Disabled Clergy; and that from the rest of the fund ($920) towards keeping over in repair the Church of the Atonement, St. Thomas Parish, Prince George's County, Md., and the grounds belonging to the same.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL ARMY.—The Maryland brigade of this noble army consists, according to this year's statistics, of some 16,260; to which might be added 2,400 children in parish schools. At the rate of one cent per month, as the bishop suggested in his address, there would result for special missionary work the sum $1,950, or nearly $2,000. It is thought that by the end of the year every Sunday-school in the diocese will have fallen into line and have reported in dollars and cents as the bishop requests. At the beginning of June nearly forty had done so, some $250 having been forwarded for the "Bishop's Penny Fund."

THE WILLIAM G. HARRISON FUND.—This is $3,880; interest on this fund is paid annually over to the treasurer of the Missions Committee, and by that committee disbursed as a part of the Pastoral Aid Fund of the Diocese. It is snugly invested at six per cent. in Baltimore City Loan of 1900, the interest when due being deposited in the Eutaw Savings till needed.

THE REV. W. T. JOHNSTON LEGACY.—This is now $1,058, principal and accrued interest, Baltimore City stock, six per cent. of 1890, and the income from it, by the will of Mr. Johnston, to be applied forever, upon the order of the vestry of St. John's church, Huntington, of which parish he died rector, to the keeping in due order the cemetery connected with that parish.

MINOR FUNDS.—The H. L. Stewart Fund, $209; the Bishop's Legacy for "contingent expenses, etc.," $327.75, making in all, in the control of the Trustees of Church Charities, about $27,000. These figures they lay before the Church in their business-like Fifteenth Annual Report. The clergy of the diocese have set an example to the rest of the diocese, as well as having given the precept of providing by will of their worldly goods, where they have chanced to possess any.

BALTIMORE—The Benevolent Society of City and Country.—This was founded in 1800, and carries on an orphanage for girls in the Parish of St. Paul, this city, and does a good work. Several of the inmates having of late come of age, have withdrawn from the care of the institution, leaving some thirty still resident under the charge of an efficient matron and teachers, among them a sewing teacher to whose loving instruction the pupils are greatly indebted for what often proves to be a source of remunerative industry to them in after life. The society has invested wisely means for the decent maintenance. The rector of St. Paul's parish is chairman of the board of trustees.

BALTIMORE—The Whittingham Steinick Library.—The value of this library, the well-known gift to his diocese by Bishop Whittingham, is $30,000, consisting as it does of 15,000 and more volumes, many of them far beyond the ability of most of the diocese. The cost of the fireproof building in which these books are kept was some $5,000; and later, at a cost of $522, an entrance has been made from the street, with a vestibule, iron doors being now the only connection with the main building, the episcopal residence. The rear windows are also of iron; space had been increased for the convenience of visitors, and the insurance on the library, which had been far too low, has been increased to a fairer approximation to the value of trust, viz.: $5,000 insurance; value of property, $3,522.

BALTIMORE—Church Home and Infirmary.—By a somewhat recent resolution of the Board of Trustees of the Baltimore City Church Home and Infirmary, any clergyman of this diocese who may be in need of the care and treatment which this noble institution, now in its thirtieth year, affords, will be received, temporarily or otherwise. One hundred and sixteen patients have been cared for here during the last year—72 beneficiaries, 44 remuneratives; $16,500 were expended during the same time, about $5,000 from well-secured investments, nearly $5,000 from board, the remainder from voluntary contributions, mostly from in or near this city.

BALTIMORE—Boys' School of St. Paul's.—Incorporated and wholly under the control of the rector, having a resident master, a matron, and ten other teachers, this school is enjoying full prosperity. It has twenty-five boarding pupils, all of whom, with but one exception, receive board, tuition, lodging, and in part clothing, from the funds of the incorporation. The expenditures for a year are about $2,250, and are met almost wholly by the voluntary contributions of this large parish—a parish whose yearly offerings are some $17,000 or more, in whose ample territory all the other congregations are "churches" only, not parishes, it being the only parish in the city, the mother of all—territorially, at any rate.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Statistics.—Personal: Parishes and congregations, 19; adult baptisms, 93; infant baptisms, 742 (835); burials, 274; confirmed, 353; communicants gained, 40; lost, 195; present number, 5,469; marriages, 188; parish school teachers, 26; pupils, 81; Sunday-school teachers, 409; pupils, 4,44; clergy, 35; rectors, 20; assistants, 6; deacons, 1; aged and invalid, 8. REINSTERSTOWN.—The Hannah More Academy.—On the 29th of January last the trustees of this Christian school for girls had the pleasure of formally accepting the newly-completed annex, erected under the will of Mr. S. G. Wyman at a cost of $5,000. The annex was called, in memory of this donor and his wife, "Wyman Hall." Sixty-five pupils have formed the household—forty-eight resident, seventeen day pupils. By the addition, twenty more pupils can be accommodated than before, there having been put up three recitation rooms, two dormitories, and a hall. A cabinet organ was sent given by Mrs. Hooper of Baltimore, and twenty of the alcoves have been individually or jointly furnished. The Mary Byrd Wyman Academy educates several girls here at its expense, clergywomen's daughters preferred.

KENTUCKY.

DIOCESAN MISSIONS.—The following action of the Board of Diocesan Missions of this diocese will be of interest.

Resolved 1st. That this board recommends the holding of services, one or more times during the present summer, at each of the points hereafter named, under the direction of the bishop, and hereby respectfully requests the bishop to arrange for the same.

Resolved 2d. This board hereby agrees to defray the expenses of clergymen undertaking this work by the bishop's appointment.

Resolved 3d. The board requests that at each service an offering be asked in behalf of the general mission work of the diocese.

Convocation of Covington.—Ashland, Flemingsburg, Blue Lick Springs.

Convocation of Lexington.—Booneville, Irvine, Winchester, Crab Orchard Springs, Staaford, Lawrenceburg, Eminence, Lancaster.

Convocation of Louisville.—Lagrange, Bardonia, Elizabethtown, Glasgow, Grantston, Grayson Springs, Cloverport, Shelbyville, Pewee Valley, Anchorage, St. Matthew's, and Lebanon.

Convocation of Paducah.—Madisonville, Edylville, Princeton, Uniontown, Mayfield, Jordan Station, Kuttawa, and Coal Mines.

Gratifying reports have been received showing that the work suggested has been inaugurated within the four convocations of the diocese.

Services have been held at Blue Lick Springs, Crab Orchard Springs, Pewee Valley, and Madisonville, and others arranged for. The Sunday School Board of the Diocese has offered to aid by furnishing Prayer Books and Hymnals.

Accounts have come in showing that these services are appreciated by the people, and the clergymen who have left their homes to conduct them have been most courteously received. A great work remains to be done in Kentucky. Our forty clergy laboring faithfully and unitedly in the one direction of rebuilding the kingdom of God in this diocese, will accomplish great results. Let the laity lend hearty co-operation, cheerfully surrendering upon an occasional Sunday their own privileges, that those who seldom enjoy lay roles, may sometimes have them. Let laymen be ready and willing to conduct services as lay-readers in the absence of the minister, and may our congregations encourage both minister and lay reader by their presence at these services. This missionary work, steadily enlarged and extended is the "aggressive" work we must do if we would see our Church blessed of God, winning souls for Christ, and finding favor with the people—the great mass of the people.—Kentucky Church Chronicle.

INDIANA.

DIOCESAN ITEMS.—Albion.—The Rev. Mr. Orpen reports that he has found an encouraging opening for the Church at Albion, four of his communicants from Lima having settled there, and he has found five others, making nine. He intends visiting there once in three weeks, and has been kindly tendered the use of the Presbyterian church.

Cannelton.—The missionary writes there are not now any openings for missionary work in the diocese from this point. Hainesville, Ky., is visited as usual. From various causes Gloverport, Ky., has not been visited for the past two or three months.

Columbus.—A recent lawn fete given at the residence of Col. H. Daily, by the Ladies' Guild of St. Paul's church, netted some twenty-six dollars.

Crawfordsville.—The missionary, Mr. Throop, is giving his alternate Sundays to missionary work outside. On Sunday, July 5th, he held service in the Court House at Lebanon, in the morning, with a congregation of twenty. He will officiate again in Lebanon on the third Sunday in August. In the evening, in Thornwood, held service in the Methodist church, with a very large congregation present. He found two communicants residing there, and some children for baptism at next visit. At Lebanon the missionary found several families kindly disposed to the Church and a desire expressed for regular services. Mr. Throop has also visited Darlington, where he found three communicants. Here several children were also found for baptism. On Monday, July 17th, Mr. Throop opened a mission at Tipton, where we have no Church people, and held a series of services, the results of which we will give in our next.

Delphi.—Mrs. Braddon's Children's Guild had a sale and festival in June which netted the handsome sum of $60. The children are now at work on a quilt for St. Stephen's Hospital. Mr. Burr, the venerable senior warden, has been ill for some time. The missionary writes: "I find the great want of some sort of conveyance, for all through the country I hear of members of old English families who are anxious to have me go and see them, but I cannot get around. I could hold services at Camden, Flora and Birmingham on Sunday afternoons had I a horse and buggy." At Attica the services are well attended; the Ladies' Guild reorganized; the vestry elected at Easter are discharging their duties; there is prospect of great improvement in the music. The vestry have given the missionary a month's vacation and he has spent the month of July in Davenport, Iowa.—Church Worker.

QUINCY.

QUINCY.—Church of the Good Shepherd.—On Sunday, August 2d, there was added to the memorials in this church (the Rev. Dr. W. B. Corby, rector,) a very beautiful and artistic professional cross of brass, the gift of Mrs. N. C. Medill, in memory of her husband, Samuel Medill. The memorial is a very appropriate one, as Mr. Medill was always interested in the welfare of men and boys.

The presentation on behalf of Mrs. Medill was made by the senior warden, and the benediction of the cross by the rector.

LOUISIANA.

LAKE CHARLES.—An Opportunity.—The diocesan missionary, the Rev. E. W. Hueter, held the first Church service in this town on Sunday, July 19th. A large congregation was present. This is one of the best business towns in Louisiana. It is situated on Lake Charles, a beautiful clear-water lake, is on the line of Morgan, Louisiana, and Texas railroad, and within about eight hours' run to New Orleans, Louisiana, and Houston, Texas. It is a great lumber country, has a population of some 4,000, and is growing larger every day. A large London syndicate, of which Mr. J. B. Waters is president, lately bought over one million acres of land here, is stock raising partly, and partly cultivating. The Church people are very anxious to have a resident clergyman, and can promise an energetic man a salary of $800 per year at present, with every prospect for an increase. The Sunday-school just organized, consists of over thirty children, and seven teachers. A good man could build up a fine parish here, as the people are willing to work with a view. The climate is healthy, the town prosperous, and the people are in earnest. The bishop of the diocese would be glad to have an active, faithful priest in charge of the work, and the diocesan missionary would be glad to communicate with such a man on the subject.—The Church Messenger.

TEXAS.

EAGLE LAKE.—Church of the Heavenly Rest.—This church (the Rev. H. C. Howard, rector,) is so far completed that the congregation has been enabled to hold its first service therein and organize a Sunday-school. They enrolled thirty-two children, although there is what is called a union school in the town. It is expected to be ready for consecration at the next visitation of the bishop. While the building is not pretentious, costing $1,100, the best part is that it has been erected by the parish without outside help.

COLORADO.

DENVER.—Church Music.—The Denver Tribune-Republican, on July 19th, has an interesting article on church music in Denver, particularly that in St. John's Cathedral, which we condense.

Although notable work has been accomplished in the choirs of the churches, yet the pioneer path through the woods of hitherto uncultivated popular taste has been made by the lyric workers of St. John's Episcopal parish, and noticeably by the Dean. To such a high point have these musicians now raised the standard local of church music that many claim there is no city in the country, except New York and Boston, where such excellence is attempted and attained. And in organizing, particularly, Denver has reason to be proud of one of the first performers in the country in Mr. Walter C. Hall of St. John's Cathedral, where there is what is claimed to be the finest instrument in the West. It was built by the well-known organ builders, Hooks & Hastings of Boston. The Cathedral organ has three manuals and 2,500 pipes, and cost $12,000 (including freight); its tone is excellent, and its vox humana combinations are delicate and fine.

The pioneer in local church music was Preceptor and Organist Marchant, who came from England with the dean in 1879 and began work in the old Episcopal church on Arapahoe street, till the cathedral's completion in October, 1881, with Mr. Winter, also an English musician, as preceptor. Marchant founded the first Denver Philharmonic Society, whose harmony is in pleasing contrast with some of the inharmonics that have retched the society of late years. He also brought out the Dottingen Te Deum with the Choral Society, and Marchant with Winter introduced here with success Dr. Stainer's "The Daughter of Jarvis." The soprano solo was sung by Master George Brown, who will long be remembered by those who attended the Easter services of 1882. Shortly after Mr. Marchant moved East, since when the Ditsons of Boston have been publishing many of his compositions. At Thanksgiving of the same year Rossini's "Stabat Mater" was given, the principals being Mrs. D. T. Frith, Mrs. Belle Rowley, Mrs. Billings and Mr. Winter. Mr. Walter C. Hall presided at the organ, this being his first special service. At the 1882 Christmas service extended selections from the oratorio of "The Messiah" were given. Winter left after Easter service.

The entire charge of St. John's Cathedral choir then devolved upon Mr. Hall, who carried it through with great credit to himself until the coming of Preceptor Tipton, who came from across the pond at the wave of the dean's wand. But he failed as a preceptor, and in December, 1883, Frederick Stevenson, of Blackheath, London, was secured by the dean, who hoped by this time he had got a man he could rely on, and he has not been disappointed. Tipton was a fine organist, though not a preceptor, having been a pupil of Dr. Stainer, the organist of St. Paul's Cathedral in London, and one of the present century's great masters of organ music. However, Dean Hart found Tipton a place in Washington, District of Columbia, as organist and choir master of the Church of the Epiphany, in October, 1883.

However, before Stevenson's coming Mr. Hall brought out at the Thanksgiving service Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang," and for the first time brass instruments were used in the church. The principals were Mrs. Brown, Miss Shields and Mr. Thommen.

Frederick Stevenson, the present preceptor of St. John's cathedral, was selected by Dean Hart himself, who went over to England to secure a man whom he knew was trustworthy, without running any more risks. Stevenson was the professor of music and conductor in Blackheath, a London suburb, at the head of two fine musical societies, one vocal and orchestral, the other instrumental.

Mr. Stevenson's ability as an instructor is evidenced in one of his London pupils, twenty years old, who has secured over many competitors the organ of St. Stephen's Church at Westminster, besides taking his recent instructor's position as conductor of the two musical societies of Blackheath. The new preceptor studied under Sir G. A. McFarren, the great authority on harmony and musical composition, his latest work on Harmony being the standard authority. Mr. Stevenson's speciality is voice culture. He was the sole teacher of "sight reading" at Blackheath Conservatory, his associates in voice culture being the well known professors, W. H. Cummings and Senor Visetti. One of the St. John's choir testifies that Mr. Stevenson is indispensable to their success; that, after years of study at musical centers, she knows no one who can handle a choir in the style Mr. Stevenson does.

The new preceptor was surprised to find on reaching Denver so fine a performer in Mr. Hall, and such well-trained vocal talent in the choir. He said with such material he could accomplish excellent results, and how well he has done the public can testify. Mr. Stevenson brought with him a good library of selected Church music, among which are the Judas Maccabean "Oratorio," Mendelssohn's "Hear My Prayer," Dr. Stainer's "Lead, Kindly Light," and his finest production and Christmas anthem, "I Desired Wisdom," Gounod's "Send Unt Thy Light" and "Sing Praises unto the Lord," Toure's Easter anthem, "God Hath Appointed a Day," and Sir John Goss' "The Wilderness."

Mr. Walter C. Hall, formerly of Cheshire, England, the organist, is yet a young man of about thirty-five. He comes of an organ-playing family, his father having handled the instrument for over thirty years. He studied under Frederick H. Gunton, later under Dr. Bridge, of the Chester (England) Cathedral, and by persistent application had built up a reputation for himself, when Mr. Winter engaged him in London, while acting as the agent of Dean Hart, nearly four years ago. Mr. Hall has been here now three and a half years, and he has noticed in this time that the congregation has learned enough to criticize and pick flaws in the rendering of pieces which, three years ago, they would have thought "too beautiful for anything," imperfections and all.

From December, 1882, to January, 1884, Mr. Hall was organist also at the Jewish Temple of Emmanuel, where he introduced much English Church music that was suited to Hebrew worship; in fact, remodeled the musical service, to the satisfaction of the congregation. This performer's steady maintenance of the highest order of Church music has given him the reputation of being the best executant west of the Mississippi River. Indeed, his friends claim his playing fully equals that heard in the best Eastern churches.

Joseph Bennett, a London musical critic, in a recent contribution referred to the Denver Cathedral music as setting the standard for the entire West. Mr. Hall is a religious man, as the character of his playing suggests. He will not handle light music on the Lord's Day, which a friend lately found out when asking him to play Nicola's "Merry wives of Windsor" as a Sunday evening voluntary. St. John's organist has a three manual organ, his friends would like to see a fourth manual added, which could be done by setting up the extra pipes across the chancel, as it is done in Dr. Haesting's church in New York, and Dr. Storr's Church of the Pilgrims in Brooklyn.

By the first annual report of the New York Cancer Hospital it appears that the receipts for the first year were $314,048.07, and there are outstanding subscriptions for $57,500. The buildings are now in process of erection, and it promises to be a most useful institution.

In Philadelphia there are eighty Episcopal churches, or one for every 12,000 people. In ten years one new parish has been organized and two or three unorganized have been founded, and one or two have died out, and meanwhile the population has increased by 225,000.

A RECTOR in North Carolina with a wife and five little children receives as a salary $365.97, without any missionary stipend. To beg he would be ashamed, but it would seem as if there was wealth enough in the Church to prevent such a shame, not to say cruelty, towards one of her priests.

ART.

FOUR hundred pictures sent to the Exposition at New Orleans failed to be hung for utter want of merit.

CHAS. S. PEARCE'S "La Prelude" has been reproduced in the Architect, a leading art journal of London.

It is said there are but three statues raised to women in this country—one to Harriet Martineau, one to Margaret Haugherty of New Orleans, and one to Julia A. Teris in Kentucky.

The impressive solemnities that attend the prolonged obsequies of the nation's hero—first the lying-in-state at Albany, and afterward in the City Hall of the metropolis—illustrate eloquently enough the significance of Art and the Beautiful, even in this climacteric of a nation's grief. The ritual of military mourning, the reversed arms, the muffled drum, the shrouded, trailing colors, the full-voiced dirges from the splendid regimental bands, the involuntary homage, day and night, of vast concourses of inflowing peoples from all quarters, the expressive draperies and hangings—each and all speak an intelligible language which the dullest cannot misunderstand.

The minor in music, the elegiac and threnody in verse, have a legitimate service. The great choruses, with their funeral motets, on the City Hall steps, are plainly in harmony with the hour and its experiences. True, we have not yet felt the Church with her hallowed and hallowing ministrations, nor the consolations of her anthems and offices, while the wholesome shadows of the Cross have not yet brooded over these demonstrations with spiritual refreshments. For this, it must be remembered, is thus far a civic and military, rather than a Christian solemnity. Yet even the peculiar majesty of an exceptional grief like this is not without discordant elements. It would seem that such a man and such a demonstration were enough in themselves to push aside and drive off all petty vanities and childish, half-barbaric whims of decoration and intrusive conceit.

The secondary terror of old-time funerals, everybody knows, was the obsequious, bustling, half-concealed satisfaction of the undertaker, especially if the occasion had thrift in it, and the insufferable exactions of heartless, vulgar pageantry according to the prescriptions of the undertaker's inexorable tariff of properties.

Scarcely had a long-suffering public reduced this functionary and his minions to a tolerable subordination when the florid adroity slips into the foreground, bribing "the occasion" with flowers no one can easily lay rude hands upon; and with wreaths, crosses, pillars, and pillars, unstrung harps, gates-ajar, and otherwise, and an indescribable motley of morbid, incoherent "emblems" of protean sort. So that the latter day funeral in the white-to-do world, unless caution signals are heisted in the funeral announcements—"please omit flowers," or "it is kindly requested," etc.—is turned into a lively competition, in which florists and ambitious acquaintances jostle one another, until the place where the dead repose, parlor or chancel, becomes strangely like a festive bazaar. This barbaric usage is dying out, but it dies hard. Only a few months ago, at the funeral of a celebrated groom, the florists had it pretty much their own way, for no clergyman officiated, and there were "designs,"—whips, buggy seats, saddles, pillows, and other equally expressive souvenirs worked out in the costliest hot-house productions, and now the nation's solemnity is pestered and littered with a preposterous array of the old "designs," until the sickening odors of the decaying rubbish become well-nigh insupportable. What false, shallow sentimentalism it is that clutters up this grand lying-in-state with such child's play as a "floral coronal" with its bushels of buds, immortelles, pinks and posies—a colossal "gates-ajar," a dramatic "column" broken, with the taxidermist's exploit of wired doves ready to take wing, with more bushels of buds, asters, and other costly merchandise—and all for the delectation of the donors and the distraction and dissipation of the mourners. This hero gains nothing from such superficial, meretricious demonstrations, and nothing could have been more repugnant to his simple Doric temperament and his well known dread of display. All this piling together of "floral pens," "floral swords," and "floral insignia" of military and civic greatness are very mockeries in the presence of that purple-covered casket with its banner-pall of a nation's colors. Such a tremendous pagant of grief far above the range of undertakers' and florists' pomps and vanities.

THE REV. MATTHIAS PETTIT.

A man of great earnest and resolute usefulness in the Church below, has been suddenly terminated; and God has taken to His rest, in Paradise, our well-loved brother, MATTHIAS PETTIT, of Warren, N. H.

Ordered deacon less than thirty-six years ago. Mr. Pettit had yet been, since 1857, the senior preacher of the diocese, in which all his life was spent. He had earlier mission stations, and the two parishes of Christ church, Newton, and Christ church, Borden-ton, and some localities of his own congregation, given to change, he built the better, as he stayed the longer; and the stable strength of his parishes resulted from God's blessing on his labors.

His studies and his convictions were all in the line of sound Anglican theology; and in his practice he exhibited the harmony doctrine of conservatism with the progressive spirit of the Church's life.

In the response to the petition for his nomination and president of the Standing Committee, he defined the expectations of his bishop and his brethren, who were so much in need of his services, his example, and his loving companionship.

Mr. Pettit exemplified a type of Christian and clerical life which were almost unknown in our generation that to our own; simple, unaffected, manly, almost rugged, but so adorned with kindness and gentleness was attractive to all hearts, that the oak that gave loving shelter to the soft mosses and the clinging vines.

Called to bear such burdens of sorrow and care as God lays not often on His servants, our brother bore with a serenity and cheerfulness that seemed to lighten the burden of suffering and grief, and to cheer the hearts of men, to whom abatement in joy.

We, his clerical brethren, gathered here with his beloved children, and his beloved family, to lay to rest all that is mortal of our dear friend and brother, bless God for the good example of His servant departed, and pray that his great soul may be able to follow him in those things wherein he followed Christ, and that we, with him, may attain the peace of Paradise, and the bliss that is beyond.

MRS. ANNE DENNISON.

Forty-three years of devoted married life were ended by the death of this exemplary woman. It may be permitted to one whose memory remains so fresh to express his heartfelt sorrow at their termination, and his deep sympathy with those upon whose hearts sad remembrance falls the heaviest of burdens. The beauty of her character and life stood in its reality, unaffectedness, sincerity, and faithful and unassuming, and yet very duty. It was a life of honor as though all their quiet graces and power displayed themselves without any effort or self-consciousness. It is a grief unpossible to feel that she is yet here when she has been extinguished, and that husband, children and grand-children must honorarily travel along the lonely road, without the loving help, sympathy and care, the wise counsels and the unremitting labors, that have been their stay and solace, their comfort and their joy. It is a grief that is honored as though all their lives together. In her humility and self-forgetfulness she would have shrunk from being commended to the "virtuous women" as described by King Lemuel in the Proverbs, and yet his words portray her so exactly what she was, "the grace of God, the heart of her husband, both are fully trusted in her. . . . She will do him good and not evil all the days of her life. She is clothed in strength and her clothing; and she shall rejoice in time to come. She openeth her mouth with wisdom; and in her tongue is the law of kindness. She looketh well to the ways of her household, and eateth not the bread of idleness. Her children arise up, and call her blessed; her husband also, and he praiseth her." M. V. R.

APPEALS.

The Mission to the Deaf-Mutes in the Central Western and Northwestern Territories, and asks to be remembered with offerings on next Twelfth Sunday after Trinity, or some other Sunday.

Two years ago I took charge of this work. Since then, services have been held in almost 300 parishes, and at July 20th Saint-Scholasticus, the Deaf-Mute Candidates for confirmation, hearing children have been baptized; 347 deaf-mutes are communicants. Almost 500 have been confirmed within the present year, and candidates for confirmation are awaiting at many places.

With my large field, embracing 15 dioceses, there are fully 6000 deaf-mutes, of whom I reach 3000 by travelling every week the year round, with short intervals at home to arrange new appointments and attend to a growing correspondence.

Offerings are needed to meet the expenses of the work. They may be sent to me.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

MR. WILLIAM MOORE.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN :

Will you permit me, through your widely-read columns, to pay tribute to one of the most faithful laymen the American Church has yet produced, the late Mr. William Moore, of Garrison-on-the-Hudson. It was the writer's privilege to be his rector for a number of years, and to observe admiringly and affectionately the features of a character which should be held up (as is indeed the aim of this letter) as an object of emulation to the younger Churchmen of our day.

A gentleman and a scholar in every trust, highest sense of the term, belonging to one of our oldest and best American families, a man who had travelled much in earlier life, and was a deeply-read scientific student almost to the day of his death, for when all but completely deprived of the social enjoyment of his faculties, he was still ever pouring over his books, and two books there were that never left his side or his hand—his Bible and his Prayer Book. Humble and devout, courteous and accomplished, unselfish, and mistaken, a gentleman of the old school, in fine, a school that is rapidly passing away amid the sneering cynicisms of a utilitarian, if not a degenerate school—a school whose work was as good as its bond, whose chivalry was an ægis to womanhood, and whose knees never failed in lowly homage to God.

Never a Lord's day that he was not at his place in the temple; never a day of atoning memory that he was not following devoutly his litany. Indeed, in the latter days of his life, when enfeebled in memory, he would start up and off for the church, and was with difficulty made to understand that there was no service there. And when in the church it was beautiful to behold his venerable form, his white head ever reverently bent, his almost demerced and his tottering gait, as almost to the last he insisted upon carrying out his warlike duty of bearing the offerings of the faithful to the altar of God.

His liberality was as grand as it was unostentatious. Never will the writer forget the quiet way in which he once, at a time of parish emergency, made a princely gift of money, and deemed it as always more of a privilege than a duty.

Many a faithful, toilsome missionary in the far West blessed God for the bounty of this true steward, who never turned a deaf ear to any worthy personal appeal or to the pathetic tale of self-sacrificing zeal on some page of THE CHURCHMAN.

And never, again, can the writer forget how, when he was endeavoring under great difficulties, to erect a little wayside chapel for the scattered sheep of his Highland cure, this venerable servant of God, then threescore years and ten, at once volunteered to survey and lay out the ground, and worked faithfully at it through much of a summer day.

We might thus proceed, giving instance after instance of devout fidelity, or we might take up much more of your columns in relating more secular incidents of this pure and beautiful life, contemporaneous with our country and identified with the marked progress of social, commercial and ecclesiastical history; but we will leave that for a worthier hand to draw out, simply closing this most affectionate tribute with the thought of how aptly such a life and such a death illustrates the solemn and eloquent prayer of our service book, "the testimony of a good conscience, in the communion of the Catholic Church, in the confidence of a certain faith, in the comfort of a reasonable, religious and holy hope, in favor with God, and in perfect charity with the world."

ALBERT ZABRISKIE GRAY.

WITH THE SHOSHONE INDIANS.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN :

In order to gain the ear and the heart of any race of men it is necessary to learn their native tongue and live among them. The red man is especially sensitive. He must be convinced that he and his cherished habits are not despised before he will give heed to the good news the white man offers him. I determined, therefore, on being sent out as missionary to the Shoshone Indians, on their restoration in Wyoming, a few years ago, to give myself no rest until I should be able to speak to them in their own language. Fortunately a native who understands English has consented to be my teacher. I have also procured a tent which costs, including freight, $25; a stove will cost $15 more. My salary is too small to enable me to pay for them. Did the rev. Mr. THE CHURCHMAN know, degraded these poor Indians have become, corrupted in numerous instances by contact with unprincipled white people, I feel sure some of them would lend us a helping hand. The tribe has always been at peace with the United States, and is making praiseworthy efforts to learn the arts of civilization. There is an excellent school at the agency, under the superintendence of the Rev. John Roberts, of the Episcopal Church, who is imbued with a genuine spirit of self-sacrifice. But it is not enough to educate the children. They leave school just at the age when they are exposed to perils of all kinds. If the Christian influence is to be maintained, it must be continued in their Indian homes, what fruit might the Church not expect to reap. The Shoshones are not demonstrative in their gratitude, but they have warm feelings all the same towards their true well-wishers. Their venerable old chief, Washakie, has put it thus in his acknowledgement of a letter from General Sherman: "A Frenchman thinks with his head, and his tongue speaks; an Indian feels with his heart, and his heart has no tongue." Contributions will be thankfully received by the Right Rev. John F. Spalding, Denver, Colorado, or by the undersigned.

THE REV. A. C. HOEHING.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN :

Please correct a typographical error which may cause perplexity to some minds. In the letter from Bishop Schereschewsky, printed on pp. 152 and 153 in your issue for August 8th, I read: "He (the Rev. A. C. Hoehing) was but two years in China (see Spirit of Missions for July)." The reference shows that Mr. Hoehing was "in China from June, 1866, until October, 1876," which is correct. The bishop's name, no doubt, is erroneously printed as "two," and the compositor and proof-reader have misread the word. It is a mistake, as I know from experience, likely to occur. During the ten years Mr. Hoehing was once absent from the field, in Germany and the United States. I was present at his marriage, during this visit, by the Rev. Dr. Muhlenberg, in the chapel of St. Lake's Hospital.

JOSUA KIMMER.

New York.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN :

In reply to Bishop Schereschewsky's remarkable criticism upon a devoted missionary and fellow-worker, the Rev. A. C. Hoehing, recently at rest, I beg leave to say:

First, I have compiled a service book in the Cantonese dialect for use among the Chinese in this country. This he did with the help of the Hon. Chinese Consul, Gu Yang Ming, in 1884. This has its own value and character.

Second, The classics and poets have many translators. Mrs. Hoehing has the beautifully written translation by her husband, from English into Mandarin. As the Rev. Mr. Hoehing's field in China was for many years hundreds of miles distant from the Rev. Mr. Schereschewsky's of that time, the latter could not be a judge of the Rev. Mr. Hoehing's attainments.

Bishop Schereschewsky speaks of the Rev. Mr. Hoehing being "only two years" in China. He must have meant "ten years" (from June, 1866, to October, 1876). As the Rev. Mr. Hoehing was so remarkable a scholar in other languages, music, etc., it would have been remarkable if in ten years, with nearly as much subsequent study, he should not have been a Chinese scholar as well. "To every star his own glory." THOMAS M. THORPE.

"SUFFER US NOT—"

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN :

I feel so much indebted to Mr. Vandyne for calling attention to the petition, "Suffer us not at our last hour for any pains of death to fall from Thee," for I am one of those who never hear it without a shudder of dread. When I first heard it read, it startled and filled me with such a dread of dying as I had never experienced before, for I had always believed that he would be with me when passing through the waters. Mr. Seaver refers to Pilgrim's experience. If he will re-read it I think he will find that all his trouble arose from want of faith, and will it not be the same with us only if we are faithless! I am sure I am not the only one who hopes his petition will be omitted in the revised Prayer Book. ELLEN KIRK.

CORRECTION.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN :

In my sketch of the Rev. Philo Shelton, which appeared in your issue of the 1st inst., I followed in one particular a statement which I found in Sprague's "Annals of the American Episcopal Pulpit," and was led into error by it. After the transfer of the services, titles, and rights of Trinity parish, Fairfield, to the new edifice in the borough, the old church in Mill Plain was taken down, and parts of it used to build the rectory in Southport. The memorial tablet was also transferred to the Southport church, which was accidentally burnt on the afternoon of March 11th, 1854, and the tablet destroyed.

SAYING THE GLORIA.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN :

In regard to the suggestion of Mr. Walter Mitchell as to the way to say the Gloria Patri so that the minister may always say the first verse of the Psalm in reading the Psalter, I would suggest that he and those for whom he writes try what seems to be the most natural method—have the congregation join with the minister in saying the whole of the Gloria exactly as is done when the Psalms are chanted. Then the minister begins the next psalm as a matter of course, and the Gloria is made of more account than in any other way.

NEW BOOKS.

THE APOSTOLICAL FATHERS, VOL. II. American Ed. Church Lit. Pub. Co. [Buffalo.]

The second volume of the republication, under the editorship of the Bishop of Western New York, of this work from the well-known Edinburgh edition, adds fresh and stronger evidence of its great value, not to the clergy only but to lay readers, for whom the literary remains of Christian antiquity cannot but have a fresh and even novel interest. We are glad to learn that the reception given to their undertaking is encouraging to the publishers, and trust that it will rise in due proportion to the magnitude of the work.

The present volume ranges from the Pastor of Hermas (A. D. 160) to the last extant writing of Clement of Alexandria (A. D. 217), covering thus rather more than the one hundred years that followed the death of St. John.

It would surprise those of the general public whose idea is that only some scanty remains of that period have come down to us, with no literary value and of small worth otherwise, to learn that these works, printed in large 8vo, with compact though clear type, number 694 pages.

The Edinburgh edition gave comparatively small help to the reader in estimating the value of what was thus put into his hands.

The present series, while an accurate reprint, is much more so for the editorial remarks, whether prefatory or in foot-notes, place the primitive writer in his ecclesiastical surroundings, and point out with remarkable aptness the bearing of particular passages that call for such illustration.

Apart from the many special points that will strike the student of these writings, there are some general ideas that should be kept in view throughout.

Before the second century was completed the truths of Christianity had been published long and widely enough to form something like what we term a "Christian public," that was reached mainly, in the first instance, by the voice, but also, and far more effectually than is usually supposed, by the pen. The two notes were indeed combined, specially in the instance of The Pastor of Hermas, which was widely and habitually read in the Christian assemblies, where the many could not read and very few had access to the MS. Amid the variety of minds and tempers thus reached it was inevitable that different aspects of the one truth would take hold of distinct classes of believers as by natural selection, and the formation of schools of Christian teachers would be the result. In this second volume of the Ante-Nicene Library, this process begins to show itself distinctly, and we are enabled to trace the advance towards a full development of that famous Alexandrian school, which gave its first philosophic cast to Christian thought. Yet, throughout, the rashness of mere speculation was restrained by a constant appeal to the Holy Scriptures—an appeal, moreover, that had its strength in the unbroken acceptance by the Churches of those summaries of the Faith that came over too short a space to be other than the very echo of words that fell from apostolic lips.

The most striking contribution in this volume to the literary history of the period is the editor's attempt to define the position of Hermas. It is far more than an attempt, for it states the case though concisely yet with sufficient fulness, and also with fairness and force. It was said of the late Charles O'Connor that his legal arguments had their conclusiveness in his statement of the case. Such a statement in respect to the authorship and reception by the Church of the pastor, as Bishop Coxie here makes, has very great weight. We shall not re-state it, for it cannot well be more condensed, and the volume itself, with all its other rich contents, may be had at a very reasonable price.

The conclusion which the editor reaches is that Hermas is not the one whom St. Paul names; that he was the brother of Pius, the ninth Bishop of Rome; that his "Pastor" was an understood fiction, not so dull to its first readers as Bunsen found it; that its object was to counteract, indirectly and popularly, the Montanism of the period; and that its thorough accordance with the apostolic teaching in respect to both Christian strictness and moderation, as well as its attractive form (as Orientals would esteem it), procured for it that regard and veneration which seems singular to us of the present day. Written in Greek and meeting "a felt want" among the Easters, its currency is accounted for.

In one point the reader of this volume must be prepared to find less light thrown upon some of the questions that agitate our times than he might expect. The same remark, indeed, may be made of all the primitive writers. It was only in passing that, for the most part, they touched upon strictly ecclesiastical matters. How the Church was constituted was to them no problem, but a fact. The ministry, the sacraments, the worship, went on, of course: the deep problems of the heart and mind, concerning nature and grace, man and God, exercised and agitated their minds, How to live in such a world was their chief difficulty. Circumstances compel Christians of this day to discuss whether they shall be Roman, Anglican, or Puritan; but no such questions could vex the primitive age.

The Catholic Church was a structure already reared; the faithful accepted the roof above them and the walls around the internal furniture and arrangement, without any impulse to describe what all saw and knew so well. Their souls were filled with the ideas there presented, the truths taught, the mental and spiritual training there received. It sufficed them that there, and no where else, was the place for such training. We hold this to be a sufficient explanation why, in the writings before us, so far in this Ante-Nicene series, there is comparatively so little said of the positive institution of the Christian religion. What is said is by the way, and tells the more forcibly for its undesigned testimony to the constitution of the Church and the methods and principles of her work, as we of the Anglican communion have received and maintained them.

The two volumes of this series, it may be well to repeat, are a library in themselves; indispensable to any clergyman, and a valuable addition to the book shelves of every layman. They are now, for the first time, presented in a form that brings them within reach even of moderate means.

DOGMA NO ANTIDOTE FOR DOUBT. Including a Review from the Standpoint of a Protestant Churchman, of Bishop McLaren's work entitled, "Catholic Dogma the Antidote for Doubt," an Exposition of the Character and Claims of Modern Ritualism; and an Appeal for Christian Unity. By a Member of the New York Bar. (Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott & Company.) pp. 253. Price $1.25.

We do not doubt the authorship of this book as given in its title. The style of the argument forcibly reminds us of that which is employed to move the minds of the average New York jurymen—selected because "they have not read the papers and have formed no opinion." It is not a grave examination, it is the reply of a lawyer to the speech of the opposing counsel. Its object is to make out Bishop McLaren's book as wrong as possible, and in order to do so, it puts an unfavorable construction on every passage which can be twisted toward Romanism, and it implies that the worst intentions are there, even when it can give no evidence of them. In more than one place the argument is directed against, not what the bishop has said, but against a possible construction of his words, which it is perfectly evident to any intelligent reader was very far from his thoughts. It is pretty evident that the "Member of the Bar" has the widespread and mistaken notion of Scripture that it is an oracle for man's interpretation, and not the record of a revelation which must have preceded that record as a matter of course. That is to say, the apostles knew and taught all the facts necessary to salvation before a line of the New Testament was written. What made the New Testament Scriptures such, was the verdict of the Church, and that verdict was greatly determined by the proof in dogma. Again, the author of this treatise seems to have a very uncertain idea of what dogma is. We say (with the bishop) that in order to read the New Testament aright, one must have right ideas (that is true dogmata) concerning the Lord Jesus Christ. A man who has wrong ideas—for instance a Socinian who denies the possibility of the Incarnation and the Lord's divinity, will misread every page of the Gospels. There are passages which can be interpreted in favor of the Unitarian as well as in favor of the Trinitarian side. The reply of the "dogmatist" is conclusive: "The interpretation must be as we, not as you, say, because when it was written the creed of the Church was thus and so.

The principle of construction, we need not tell so good a lawyer as our author, is that when of two meanings one harmonizes and another does not, with a statement wherein is no uncertainty, the harmony has the preference. If a statute is ambiguous, but one reading agrees with another statute, while the other reading conflicts with it, which stands? The principles of our author admit of some rather wide conclusions. It is implied that doubt is a good thing, and the settlement of doubt undesirable. It is intimated that true Catholic unity is impossible, and that the best thing is the pseudo substitute for it, "the agreement to disagree," or, as it is sometimes called, "unity in essentials." The meaning of this last phrase is that essentials consist of those things only, which nobody cares enough about to deny. We probably sympathize more nearly with the author of this volume than he would suppose from our review. We think he had a fair case which he has injured by an unfair argument. In the fear of Romanism, and in the feeling that he somehow was holding a brief for ultra-Protestantism, he has suffered himself to be drawn into a line of reasoning which is not only unsound in its premises, but which leads in its conclusions to those very results against which the Church needs to put forth all her strength.

MILITARY MANNERS AND CUSTOMS. By James ANSON FARRER, Author of "Primitive Manners and Customs." [New York: Henry Holt & Company.] pp. 284. Price $1.50.

A young midshipman being called upon for an essay on the manners and customs of the Hottentots, gave it as follows: "Manners, none; customs, nasty." Mr. Farrer seems to have framed his plan upon the aforesaid model. This book is an attack upon all war making, by endeavoring to show that all the usages supposed to lessen the horrors of war are practically nullified by the war spirit itself, and that there is no practical escape from the worst evils save by the abolition of the military profession. There is certainly a very powerful argument drawn up in these pages. At the same time we cannot say it has quite convinced us that war has not been modified essentially for the better by Christianity. Mr. Farrer strives to prove that in treatment of non-combatants and prisoners, and in the forbidding the use of certain methods of destruction, there has been no real advance in humanity. Nevertheless few will be willing to believe that the modern soldier is not a much more humane and estimable being than the condottieri of the Italian republics, whose battles were almost bloodless, and whose main effort was to capture one another for ransom. We believe that science may possibly yet abolish war by carrying destruction to the annihilating point, because, with the extinction of chance, courage is abolished, and with the end of courage will come the failure of battle.

It will be well to read this book, which certainly "handles war without gloves," to see what a strong case the peace societies can make out, but no one need take it with any idea of finding curious information on military matters or recouidite anecdotes of the camp and the field. It is an examination of the military code, for the purpose of drawing up a crushing indictment against the whole thing. It is well and ably written, and has not a little information upon what it calls the "Science of Belology."

POEMS OF THE OLD DAYS AND THE NEW. By JEAN INGELWOL. [Boston: Roberts Brothers.] pp. 229.

Jean Ingelwol wants but one thing, and that is to have been born when the art of versification was less easy. There is plenty of poetry in her thoughts, but their expression needs to be compressed. She is not diffuse, exactly, one does not get the impression of the spreading out of a single idea thinly over a large word-surface, but one has the wish that she would say more directly and pointedly what she has to say. We have had to read these verses over and over again to be sure what was meant, or rather to get a distinct picture. This was not the fault of her earlier poems. Some of them were too long, but they were not vague. What she needs to do is, with Campbell, to throw away half the stanzas in a poem, or, with Tennyson, to spend twelve days over a single line. We do not deny that this book is a very lovely work (by the way, the graceful introduction by "Susan Coolidge" is as pretty as anything in the book), but we are haunted by the feeling that it ought to be better, that all this gift of poetic expression should be used to better purpose. It is not enough that the author sees clearly a mental picture; it is his (or her) business to make the reader see it. The poet is the interpreter of hidden thoughts and glories, but it is not enough for him to see and feel them, or for others to see him feeling them; he must also translate them into the common tongue "understanded of the people." We know it is the current creed that only the privileged disciples may comprehend the real power of their Master, and that true poetry requires a sort of initiation approaching to that of Eleusis. We hold to no such doctrine. We are "anti-impressionist," and stand by the older authors, who could be read without a commentary: We are not converts to the new school—all color, and no form. Perhaps we are bigotedly conservative and old fogish, but this is our poetical creed, and by it we stand.

BIRDS IN THE BUSH. By Bradford Torrey. (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.) pp. 300. Price $1.25.

Mr. Torrey is par excellence an observer. These delightful pages are the fruits of close, quiet and loving study of the ways and habits of the birds, more especially of New England, if indeed birds can be said to have an habitat more limited than the continent they fly over. They make one personally acquainted with the ways of birds, at least as far as those very shy and evasive creatures are disposed to let their ways be known. Mr. Torrey has the faculty of interesting the reader in a topic which may be outside that reader's sympathies. One may care nothing about birds, but can hardly keep up indifference after reading this little volume. It opens glimpses into a new, rare and delightful world. It suggests a study which is at one's own door. It puts unsuspected facts into easy communication with the hitherto unobservant. Especially has Mr. Torrey studied the musical life of his feathered friends. He is manifestly a music-lover, and he seems to feel that the bird has the right to be criticized and admired as truly as the prima donna. This book is made up of a series of papers quite independent except by their reference to the one subject of study. They are entitled "On Boston Common," "Bird Songs," "Character in Feathers," "In the White Mountains," "Phyllida and Corydon," "Scraping Acquaintance," "Minor Songsters," "Winter Birds about Boston," "A Bird-Lover's April," "An Owl Head's Holiday," and "A Month's Music." These charming essays can be read one at a time, and the book is a book for winter or summer, for a country vacation or for city leisure. There is a great deal of light, not to say frivolous reading afloat, and if the thoughtful reader desires a selection we can only say that this one should have a high place on the list of books to be chosen. Especially since it is of convenient size, it is to be commended to the notice of those who must do their reading at intervals.

NEW LIGHT ON MORMONTISM. By Mrs. Ellen E. Dickinson. With Introduction by Thawley Weed. (New York: Funk and Wagnalls, pp. 472. Price $1.25.

This title is rather too ambitious for a book which tells but little not already known. The principal part of the "New Light" relates to facts concerning the history and fate of the MSS. of Solomon Spaulding, which was the original of the "Book of Mormon," and these facts, though curious, are not of especial value in considering the Mormon problem. But the history of the Mormon imposture is well given, and the truth concerning it put in a way to reach the general reader. Mrs. Dickinson's statements appear to us to be very fair and temperate, and what she tells ought to be known by all the voting population of the United States. We agree with what appears to be the author's conclusion that not merely polygamy, but the whole Mormon system is an abomination, and that it should be repressed, if not crushed out. So far as it is a union of Church and State it comes under the range of United States legislation; and the Mormon plea of religious liberty will not avail in defence of civil despotism. If the overt tyranny becomes amenable to law the religious error on which it rests will have to go too. A man may hold as abstract opinion the right to steal, but the moment he puts it into concrete practice on his neighbor's goods his belief, however sincere, will not avail before the courts.

The Mormon leaders are very skillful at evasions of the law, but we think it may yet be possible to reach their foreign propagandism and to prevent the immigration of Mormon converts. This would be the death-blow of the system.

We commend this book especially to those interested in that portion of the domestic mission field which lies in the Mormon neighborhood. The statements concerning the spread of Mormonism outside of Salt Lake City are very important.

ST. PAUL'S EPISTLE TO THE PHILIPPIANS. With Translation, Paraphrase and Notes. For English Readers. By C. V. Vaughan, D. D., Dean of Lincoln, and Master of the Temple, (London, Fife and New York: Macmillan & Co.) pp. 124. Price $1.50

Dean Vaughan has given here his own version of the epistle, but side by side with the Greek original. While we decidedly object to the majority of changes made in the Revised Version, we consider them legitimate and desirable here. In fact this is the way in which revision should have been conducted. Individual, at least private, and unhampered work would in the long run produce the best conjectures. These would be on trial, and when they won general assent, then from all sources a true Revised Version would be obtained acceptable to everybody. In the meantime all the advantages of a parallel translation in explaining the accepted text would be had without disturbing the regard which that version should receive. The notes of Dean Vaughan are very full, clear, and it seems to us, satisfactory. Those on the famous passage II Phil. 6, 7, are very able. Again, whereas the revisers were bound by certain preagreed rules, Dean Vaughan has felt himself free to depart from these where the differences between Greek and English idioms required. Thus the reviser's use or omission of the definite article was sometimes manifestly wrong, simply because Greek is not English, nor English, Greek. There is a double index, one of words English and Greek, the other of texts quoted. In every way this work is an addition to the store of New Testament literature, and a worthy offering of English scholarship to the student. The notes are not pious common place, but real elucidations of the meaning, and being primarily designed for English readers, are more accessible to such than the more scholastic commentaries. We repeat again our belief that ultimate revision will be reached and satisfactorily, by just such methods as this.

A SEPARATE WOMAN. (No Name Series.) (Boston: Roberts Brothers, pp. 98. Price 81.

We judge that in this story one "superior woman" has been writing of another. Unless we greatly mistake, this is feminine handiwork. It is a pleasant, readable and entirely "wholesome" story, by which we mean something more than correct in morals—viz., free from all morbidity of plot and sentiment.

POVERTY CORNER. ("A Little World.") A City Story. By G. Manville Pugh. Author of "The Vear's People," etc. (New York: Cassell & Co., limited.) Price 81.

There is in this story a capital illustration of the power of clever handling. The plot of the story is commonplace enough. There are the rich brother, who is bad, and the poor brother, who is good, there is innocence falsely accused and virtue finally rewarded, but all these are worked up in a very telling way, so that when one begins one must go on to the end. The minor characters are particularly good. There is a charity-school boy, who is an organ-blower, who is fully worthy of Dickens, and a number of other personages, all involved in the little drama revolving round a city church, who are all individual and lifelike.

HOSEA. With Notes and Introduction by the Rev. T. K. Cheyne, D. D., Late Fellow and Lecturer of Balliol College, Oxford, and Rector of Reading, Essex. (Cambridge: at the University Press.) pp. 152. Price 6 cent.

This is one of the very valuable series of the Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges, of which Dean Peabody is the general editor. The notes are very full and able, and there is a comprehensive introduction which adds greatly to the value of the book. We like much the idea of having in this form the separate books of the Bible for handy reference and use.

TALKS FROM MANY SOURCES. (New York: Dodd Mead & Co.) Vols. I, II, and III. Vol. I, pp. 320.

This volume contains six very good short stories. The best two are "The Black Poodle," by F. Anseley, and "Mattie," from Blackwood's Magazine. But all are good and well-told short stories, just the kind which editors of magazines are, they will not say willing to pay for liberally—for they never are—but ready to give a better compensation than for long serials. It goes without saying that such are hard to get.

LITERATURE.

GEN. GRANT'S article on the Siege of Vicksburg will appear in the Century for September.

The illustrations in Vick's August Monthly are unusually good. The colored plate shows roses.

MR. WHITTAKER has in press "Oldham, or Beside all Waters," by Lucy Ellen Guernsey. A story of New England life.

The report on the Revision of the Prayer Book by the Committee of the Council of Wisconsin is able and full, and is printed in a pamphlet.

The August Sideral Messenger, Northfield, Minn., is devoted entirely to its specialty, and is a credit to the progress now making in astronomical science.

The Quarterly Review for July (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.) makes a solid volume of two hundred and eighty pages, besides the index to volume 159. It contains ten papers, all of them of interest, but the most valuable one to our readers will be the one on "The First Christian Council." Volume 160, or numbers 319-320, will be published early in October, and will include a general index to the first twenty volumes of the Review.

The Andover Review for August opens with an appreciative paper upon Cardinal Newman, admirable in style and feeling. It is by the Rev. F. B. Hurrebrooke. The two other articles are "The Becket of Mr. Froude and of Lord Tennyson," by the Rev. N. W. Wells, and "Compulsory Education in Crime," by E. A. Meredith. The editorial is on "Eschatology," the fourth of the series on "Progressive Orthodoxy." Dr. Woolsey discusses at length and learnedly the passages which speak of "The Disciple whom Jesus Loved."

The July Sanitarian is largely taken up with the proceedings of the American Climatological Association. The subjects there discussed were of the most practical consequence, ghettos occupying a large place. The leading paper is the number is "Practical Sanitation," by Dr. Raymond, Brooklyn Health Commissioner. The tables of vital and mortality statistics in the number are of great value. Dr. Bell, the editor of the Sanitarian, has gone to the elevated and pine woods region of North Carolina to inspect a proposed site for a winter resort for consumptives.

L'ART, No. 506, has an etching, "The Canal at Venice," by Chauvel, from a water-color belonging to the Baroness N. de Rothschild, and a representation of Victor Hugo upon his death-bed, by Guillaumet. The letter-press contains a continuation of "The Salon of 1885," the conclusion of the "Château Chantilly," "The Death-Bed of Hugo," and book-notices. The articles are finely illustrated. No. 507 gives the "Interior of a Norwegian House of the Thirteenth Century," etched by Will Peters, and "The Army of the Loire, 1870-'71," a sculptured monument. Eugene Veron finishes his account of "The Salon of 1855," and there is a paper on "The Reorganization of the Museum of Florence," by Paul Leri. Both papers are illustrated, and with this number comes the title-page and index of the thirty-eighth volume. We also acknowledge the numbers of the Courrier de L'Art for June.

BEFORE THE ALTAR.

BY I. H. C.

Low before Thy footstool kneeling,
Hear Thy servants, Lord, we pray;
Now to us Thyself revealing,
Send us not unless'd away.

May the comfort of Thy Spirit
Enter every aching breast;
Grant unto the bruised healing,
And unto the weary rest.

Like a cloud our sins have risen,
Blotting Thee from out our sight;
Pierce our dark and gloomy prison
With Thy beams, O Light of Light!

All our weakness, Lord, Thou knowest,
All our sin and all our shame;
Naught have we to plead, dear Saviour,
But the merit of Thy name.

From Thy table now returning,
Our full hearts with love do glow;
Keep that love within us burning,
Shielding us from every foe.

Calm our wayward passions, Saviour,
Keep us aye through toil and strife,
Until, by Thy gracious favor,
We shall enter into life.

ROBERT ORD'S ATONEMENT.

BY ROSA NOUHEITE CAREY.

CHAPTER XXXI.—Continued.

The next morning Garton was under an appointment to meet his brother at Thornborough; and, according to promise, Rotha and Meg set out also for a day's shopping. Rotha was in hopes that Mary would accompany her, but at the last minute the vicar came round to say that Mrs. Ord was unwilling to leave her sister. This damped the expedition a little; but, as Rotha had a great deal of business to transact, she started reluctantly without her. She got through all her commissions before Garton was at liberty to come in search of her. As they walked through the smoky streets or looked in at the shop windows for the trifling gifts that Garton proposed to buy for Mary and the boys, they met Robert once or twice, evidently bent on more important errands of his own; but he barely noticed the little party beyond lifting his hat to the ladies, and Rotha was certain that he was anxious to avoid coming into direct contact with them.

When he had passed, however, Garton had plenty to say in his brother's praise. He told her that Robert was stinting himself that he might procure comforts for his journey; Robert had been with him to the different shops and ordered things almost lavishly; he had attempted to remunerate with him once or twice, but Robert only answered that he meant to do his best for him.

"I don't think I have ever had so many things in my life before," finished Garton, who knew nothing about the handsome travelling dressing-case and writing-case with his initials stamped in silver on the Russian leather. Mary knew all about it, and so did the vicar; but Rotha's desire was that they should be slipped into the bottom of the box, and only be brought to light as a pleasant surprise on the voyage.

Rotha went into the vicarage on their return and found Mary already marking some of Garton's new things. A heavy travelling-trunk blocked up the passage; Garton pointed it out rather sadly as they went through the hall. "Forty-eight hours more and I shall be on my way," he observed, with a sigh, which Rotha was only too ready to echo.

It was arranged that Garton was to come up to Bryn and wait for Rotha, while the carriage went to fetch Aunt Eliza and Nettie; but Rotha, who had put off dressing for the party till an unconscionably late hour, was not nearly ready when he arrived; and to beguile his impatience he sent up all sorts of messages by Mrs. Carruthers, to Prue's and Catherine's great amusement.

Meg gave ludicrous accounts of Garton pacing up and down like a Polar bear; his hair was just a quarter of an inch long, Meg protested; and she was sure that Madame Rudeisheim would take him for an escaped convict. "And he has holes in his gloves already, through fidgeting them, Rotha; and he looks such a giant in his dress-coat," Rotha burst out laughing at the flattering picture.

"There, give me my fan and gloves, you ridiculous woman," laughed Rotha. "I must go down now and ask if I shall do."

She went rustling into the room in her pink dress, her white neck and arms showing through the folds of some flimsy scarf. She burst into the presence of the astonished Garton radiant and smiling. Wonderful pearls gleamed on her neck. She wore glittering armlets and serpents with brilliant heads. She stood tapping the ground before him with her satin slipper.

"Shall I do, Garton?" she said. "I have put on some of the old jewels in your honor to-night." She laughed at the awe and reverence with which the young man seemed to regard her. A hot flush crossed Garton's face as he answered. Rotha sparkling with jewels seemed different from the Rotha in the gray dress and blue ribbons. He could not make her understand this, but in his humility he seemed to be suddenly removed miles away from her. What could there be in common between her as he and the radiant girl before him?

Garton did not say all this—he would not have known how to speak—but he looked at her with grave wistful eyes.

"How will you do? Don't ask me. I do not know you to-night, Rotha. Are those Aunt Charlotte's pearls you have on?" He glanced anxiously at her hand to see if the old keeper was there, but it was half hidden under a glittering diamond hoop.

"Do you not like me to wear them? Are you not pleased?" asked Rotha. She felt disappointed and half ready to cry. She was a thorough woman, and wanted her lover to admire her. She wished Garton would not stand looking at her with such big, solemn eyes. Perhaps he thought that a future clergyman's wife had no business to wear jewels. She moved her bracelet up and down her arm so restlessly that it unsnaped, and Garton had to come to the rescue with bungling fingers. He looked at her in a queer, uncertain way when his clumsy hands had achieved the clasp.

"I was half afraid that I should be kept at arm's length this evening. I cannot believe that you belong to me to-night, dear," he said, wistfully. It was this humility, this self-distrust that was Garton's great stumbling-block in Rotha's eyes; another time she would have waxed a little impatient over it, but now it only pained her. She drew back from him with tears in her eyes. In a moment she felt both chilled and wounded. After what she had done for him—how could he—how could he?

Rotha was too gentle to retaliate; but Garton felt the silent reproach instinctively. In another moment he was beside her.

"Oh, Rotha, I did not mean that. How could you misunderstand me? Sweet heart, dear heart, how can you be what you are, and not be deserving of reverence?"

But Rotha's answer was right womanly. "I would rather be loved, Garton."

"Well, and are you not?" But the rest of his reply must have been tolerably satisfactory to Rotha, to judge by the happy blush and smile with which she answered him.

Madame Rudeisheim's handsome rooms were in a blaze of light, and dancing had long commenced when Rotha and her party entered. To Rotha it was a dazzling spectacle; she leaned on Garton's arm, a little confused and giddy; the whirling couples, the lights, the music, the gay dresses, the small knots of chaperones and wallflowers, nodding like well-preserved exotics against the wall, the conservatory with its compound lights, a blinding of Chinese lanterns and moonlight, were like the shifting of a kaleidoscope to Rotha, whose sole notion of a party was derived from the breaking-up at Miss Binks', where the young ladies were all dressed in a uniform of white muslin, and dancing was carried on to the limited hour of eleven.

"How beautiful it all is! Don't you like parties?" asked Rotha, with little gasps of admiration. Her eyes sparkled, her cheeks glowed; how pleasant it was to be there, among all those people, leaning on his arm! She moved away from him a little reluctantly when her partner, Mr. Effingham, came to claim her. As for Garton, he might have been in earnest, he glared at him so; Gar could not dance. He went off rather sulkily, with Rotha's flowers in his hand. He stood by Aunt Eliza's side, rearing himself against the wall in a thoroughly English-like bad humor; the poor flowers rather suffered for it. Rotha came up for them and her fan presently—rather to Mr. Effingham's surprise. He half believed Jack's account was true, after all. Gar gave them without a word; as far as that went, he was quite content to fetch and carry for her all the evening. He had her scarf, a scented, gauzy thing, hanging conspicuously over his arm; nay, under other circumstances, he would have been quite happy to have stood in a corner all the evening and watched her—his lady of delight; but he could not help feeling hurt and sulky when one gay partner after another whirled her away. Rotha was much sought after, and it was only natural, but perhaps it was trying for Garton. Mr. Effingham in particular became abhorrent to him—probably because he was the handsomest man in the room, and danced often with Rotha. Gar longed to go after him and tell him that she belonged to him. Before the evening was half over the impulse was strong upon him to make his claims known to the whole room; he leant against the wall hour after hour buttoning and unbuttoning his huge gloves, or pulling the fronds of maidenhair out of Rotha's bouquet. He stood like a stony young giant when Rotha innocently brought up her partners to him, and frowned heavily over the graceful badinage, as though every joke were treason to his love. I think, after a little while, Aunt Eliza would have gladly dispensed with his close attention—he trampled on her rich silk dress, and answered all her cheerful remarks with monosyllables. He burst into a gruff laugh when Aunt Eliza feared that he was not enjoying himself, and then checked himself with a twinge of remorse.

"No; I am not, but she is," he said, in a tone that told Aunt Eliza everything. "Does not she look beautiful?—just fit for this sort of thing," he burst out after a moment. "Of course every one admires her—no one else in the room can compare with her; and then how gracefully she dances!"

"Why don't you take her in to supper?" said Aunt Eliza, nodding at him till her brown front got slightly disarranged. "Of course I see how it is: you should not let Mr. Effingham monopolize her. He is handsome, but he is no good—more whiskers than brains; there's Nettie there won't say a word to him."

"He—I hate him—that is— Confound his impudence! there he is making up to her again. I beg your pardon, Miss Underwood, but there are some things a fellow can't stand." And with these obscure remarks Garton threaded his wrathful way through the dancers to where Rotha sat fanning herself, with the obnoxious Mr. Effingham leaning over her.

Garton almost pushed against him as he held out his hand to her.

"Come," he said, "they are going down to supper now, and I want to get you a good place."

"Miss Maturin has accepted my escort, I believe," hissed young Effingham, with a twirl of his moustache, and with what he intended to be a fascinating smile.

"I beg your pardon, Effingham," retorted Gar, "Miss Maturin is engaged to me for this. You promised, you remember?" with a change of tone so meaning and tender that it was not lost on the watchful rival. Rotha colored a little as she answered:

"Yes, I remember; but I thought you had forgotten me. You seemed so engrossed with Aunt Eliza. You see you must excuse me, Mr. Effingham, but I shall be ready for our next dance."

"That is if Mr. Ord will allow us. I had no idea that I was interfering with a monopoly," he returned, with a perceptible sneer. It was lost on Garton, however, as he hurried Rotha away.

"How often have you been dancing with that fellow?" inquired Garton, hastily. "I hate him! None of the Effinghams are any good, I can tell you."

"Hush! he is behind us—he will hear you. He dances very nicely—that is all I know. Don't let us talk about him. I am so glad to get back to you." And Rotha looked so honest and so genuinely happy as she said this that Garton was instantly mollified, and all his sulkiness vanished under the magic of her smiles.

That hour was the one oasis of the evening to Gar, the rest was a splendid blank; and he roused himself to such purpose, and was so devoted and attentive, that it was sufficiently patent to every one at their end of the table how things stood between them. Nothing is perfect in this world, and there is always a cause for discontent to leak out. Such is the contradictoriness of human nature, and female human nature in particular, that Rotha wished that his manner to her had not been quite so empressé, and that he would not look at her so often. How she hated herself for this feeling afterward! but it made her a little quiet at the time—perhaps because she was aware that Mr. Effingham still watched them from a distance. How glad she was that there was no room for him at their table!

He came up by and by to claim her for the Lancers. Rotha, who was drawing on her gloves, was very cool and dignified all of a sudden, but she rose without a word.

"Do put on your scarf; it is so cold and draughty in the passages," said Garton, following her. Rotha bit her lip with something like vexation at this unwelcome pertinacity.

"No, no, I don't want it; give it to Aunt Eliza to hold if you are tired of it," she said impatiently. How she wished afterward that he had spared him this rebuff!

He went off sadly enough after that. As he passed through the hall there was a sudden long ring at the door-bell, and a moment afterward he was shivering in a draught of cold night air.

"I suppose a carriage has arrived for some one; I wish it were ours," muttered Gar, disconsolately; and half in curiosity he turned back to question the waiter, the very green-grocer in disguise who was at all the Blackscap parties, and who rejoiced in the mellifluous appellation of Gubbins.

"Gubbins, was that the carriage from Bryn?"

"Carriage, sir? no, sir! I was just coming to find you, sir. Your brother, sir"—motioning to a small apartment where hats and coats had been multiplying and dividing all the evening under the care of a large-headed youth in a suit of tight livery—"your brother, sir, wanted you fetched immediately."

"All right, Gubbins, that will do. It is I, Garton. Come in here, my dear fellow; I want to speak to you." And Robert, taking hold of Garton's arm, gently led him into the little room and shut the door.

CHAPTER XXXII.

"Good-bye, Gar."

"Glitters the dew and shines the river
Up comes the lily and dries her bell;
But two are walking apart forever,
And wave their hands for a mute farewell."

"And yet I know, past all doubting, truly—
A knowledge greater than grief can dim—
Know, as he loved, he will love me truly—
Yes, better—'eu better than I love him."

"And as I walk by the vast calm river,
The awful river so dread to me,
I say, 'Thy breadth and thy depth forever
Are bridged by his thoughts that creep to me."
—Jean Ingelow.

Meanwhile Rotha went through the Lancers somewhat languidly, and for once Mr. Effingham's gay chatter fell unheeded on his partner's ear. Rotha was absent, a little distraine—she was wondering what had become of Garton, and why he had not followed her into the room. Aunt Eliza was still in her old corner, talking in a loud voice to a very sulky young wallflower, who gave small cool answers in return. Nettie was carrying on a violent flirtation with a stout bald-headed widower, old enough to be her father and the happy parent of nine children; and Mat O'Brien, in an audible voice, was telling Mrs. Stephen Knowles that the thing was as good as settled. How flat, stale, and unprofitable these sort of affairs were, after all! Everybody was enjoying themselves, it was true—except the chaperones, who were just getting drowsy. Rotha began to be a little tired of it all. The lights were not quite so bright, the flowers were faded, the music had degenerated into a mere jig. Mr. Effingham's talk was tedious. Rotha looked wistfully across to the empty corner, but no impatient young giant blocked it up, no dark eyes followed her up and down the room; no wonder her dancing was spiritless and that her unlicky partner got short answers.

"I wonder where he is? How I wish this dance were over! I am afraid that he has not enjoyed the evening as much as I have," thought Rotha, with an undefinable feeling of remorse as she remembered that she might have given up at least one dance to stay with him; and then she resolved mentally that Mr. Effingham should not again tempt her. She had been angry with him ever since his speech as to Garton's monopoly; and then Garton did not seem to like him.

"It is your turn now; ladies to the centre," observed her partner. "It is a bore, you know, and all that sort of thing"—and he shrugs his shoulders slightly and walks to his place, looking handsome and used up. "Ah, there's our monopolizing friend," he continues presently, with a cool well-bred stare, which Rotha immediately resents; but she looks up very eagerly notwithstanding.

Yes, he was right; there was Garton making his way towards them, pushing through the dancers with a pale determined face. Rotha's flowers are all to pieces now, strewn hither and thither as his strong shoulders part the crowd.

"I don't congratulate you on your choice of a bouquet-holder, Miss Maturin," says Mr. Effingham, caressing his whiskers to hide a smile. "Ladies to the centre again, if you please."

Garton makes a hasty stride and lays his hand on her arm, her dress.

"Rotha, I want you."

"Presently," she says, with a smile; and she goes up and makes strange fluttering movements with three other ladies. Garton watches the grave profound salaams with a mixture of contempt and impatience. "Hands across!" Rotha is back in her place again, and now the gentlemen perform mysterious evolutions and turn their backs disdainfully on each other.

"Oh, Rotha, do leave all this nonsense. I want you," says Gar, trying to speak steadily. His face is very pale indeed by this time; he looks like one who has received a shock.

"How can I come in the middle of a dance? Is anything the matter? Has our carriage come? How strange you look, Garton!"

"There is nothing the matter; at least I shall have to go home alone if you will not come. I am wanted directly," says Gar in an agitated manner.

"I don't know what you mean. Of course I will come if you want me," returned Rotha, quite bewildered. "I am afraid something is the matter, Mr. Effingham, and I must go home. There is Annie Johnson without a partner. Shall I tell Aunt Eliza we are going, Garton?"

"No; leave her alone, she will only be in our way. We can send back the carriage with a message presently. I am so sorry to disturb you, dear, but it could not be helped." And Gar looks at her with such sad eyes that Rotha feels quite frightened.

"But what is it? and why must we go home?" she inquires, pressing his arm. The music sounds softly in the distance. There is a sweet overpowering smell from a daphne near. The Chinese lanterns have burnt out in the conservatory, and the moonlight pours in unchecked. She detains Garton by the door, but he draws her on.

"Hush! I can't tell you here, they are all coming in. I don't think I quite understand how it is myself, though he has been telling me. I only know that I am to leave you directly." Then with a sudden burst of despair, "Oh, what shall I do without you, Rotha, my darling?"

"Leave me directly?" cries Rotha, with a start. Her hand tightens insensibly on his arm. "Oh, my dear boy, do tell me plainly what you mean."

"Hush! there's Robert. It means that I am going now, this morning, and not to-morrow evening, as we thought. Ask Bob to explain it; it is more than I can." And Gar's face worked with agitation.

Rotha gave a little exclamation when she saw Robert, but he did not hear it. He looked a little moved from his usual calmness when he saw her coming in on Garton's arm. Undefined feelings of remorse chilled him; a nameless pain smote upon his heart as he marked her clinging gesture. How young and fair she looked in her evening dress! Jewels, too! He always knew how well she would look in jewels. How milky white the pearls were against her soft neck! but the clear eyes looked up at him sorely troubled. He saw quicker than Garton, too, that she was trembling. He came up to her with what Mary called "his good look on his face."

"This is a sad business. I am so sorry for you and Garton. It is all the fault of those telegraph clerks that the mistake has occurred. Do sit down;" for she was trembling more than ever at his kindness. "Garton, my dear fellow," with a touch of impatience at his brother's dilatoriness, "why do you not give Miss Maturin a chair?"

"Thank you. I am very silly; but—" "But Gar was too sudden. Yes, I understand; that was always his fault, dear old boy." He sent Garton off with prompt thoughtfulness for Rotha's wraps, and then poured out some wine and brought it to her, putting it to her lips himself. Tears came to Rotha's eyes at this. She was a little giddy and stunned at the quick transition of events. She was tired, too; and this was the first kindly office he had ever rendered her. Of course Robert misunderstood her emotion, but he was not the less kind.

When Garton brought the furred cloak he took it from him and wrapped her in it himself. In trying to fasten it his hand accidentally touched hers, and with a sudden kindly impulse he took it for a moment in his as though to detain her. Did she remember, even at that moment, that it was the first time their hands had ever met?

"There is no hurry—at least not until you are ready. Was I right in thinking you would come with us to the vicarage?"

"Do they expect me?" asked Rotha.

"Yes, Mary does; and so does Austin, I believe. If you are really ready there is no time to be lost." And Rotha rose immediately.

"How soon must he go?" she said presently, when they were in the carriage. Garton's hand had already felt for hers in the darkness, but he had not trusted himself to speak, and Robert's sympathy kept him silent.

"In little more than an hour," he replied. "You know we have to go to Stretton first, and then he is to take the six o'clock train to London; of course I shall go with him and see him on board. They expect to drop anchor about four."

"But why—what is the reason of all this hurry?" persisted Rotha, with dry lips. She leant back in the carriage, too confused and giddy to follow the explanation that Robert gave her. She never understood more than that it had been a mistake in a telegraphic message as to the time the vessel was to leave the docks, and that it had been rectified too late. Robert had arrived from Stretton a little before midnight, and had found the vicar and his wife up. Mary was hard at work at some of Garton's things, and he had stayed to explain matters and put everything in train before he set off to find Garton. By these means very little time had been lost, for Garton was so bewildered by this sudden parting with Rotha that his arrangements were hardly to be depended on.

Yet, even though their very minutes were numbered, he could not bring himself to speak to her; but the convulsive pressure of the hand he held spoke volumes. Once, somewhat alarmed at his continued silence, Rotha put up her other hand and touched his face in the darkness, and then she felt something very like a tear on his cheek. "My poor boy—my own poor boy!" she whispered. But Garton only said, "Hush! don't be too kind to me to-night—I cannot bear it; it will unman me." And then kissed the caressing hand humbly, as though to atone for his words.

It seemed a long drive to all three before they were set down at the vicarage. The vicar was in the dining-room awaiting them; a bright fire burned cheerily; breakfast was already laid on the table, and Deb came up with the steaming coffee-pot soon afterward. Short as was the interval that had elapsed since Robert had left them, Mary and Deb had already got through half the packing, and Garton's presence was urgently required for its completion.

"We have brought Miss Maturin," said Robert, leading her in. "I thought you would take care of her, Austin, while Gar and I finish going through the papers. I will bring him back as soon as possible," he added gently, as he placed Rotha by the fire. Tired and sick as she felt, she could not help giving him a grateful look; its sweetness lingered long with him through the wretched time that followed. He could not fail to remember afterward that she had acquitted him of blame.

Rotha sat quietly by the fire after the brothers had left the room. Gar had given her one long, wistful look as he went out. Highly as the vicar esteemed her, he never fully realized her gentleness and unselfishness till this moment. Robert's kindness had roused her from the bewildered state into which Garton's agitation had thrown her, and she was now quite collected and full of thought for them all.

"Do not mind me," she said to the vicar, as he hovered near her anxiously. "We shall have plenty of time to think of ourselves and our own loss afterward. Do go to Garton. I am sure he wants all the help you can give him." And, as he quitted her reluctantly, she followed him and begged him to be sure and tell Mary to put her presents just inside the trunk, that he might see them the moment he opened it.

When she was left alone she cast about in her own mind how she might comfort him. She would hardly have a minute to exchange a word with him, perhaps; and then the others would be with them. And yet she longed to say some such word of comfort to him.

There was a little worn Testament which she always carried about with her, and which had belonged to her mother, and her name and her mother's name had been written in it. After a moment's hesitation she thought that would do, and sat down with trembling fingers to pencil a few words on the title-page. The effort made the tears spring to her eyes, but she wiped them courageously away. "It will never do for him to see that I have been crying," she thought; but, notwithstanding the resolution, one or two drops blurred the handwriting. Garton afterward read these few tender words, the noblest farewell that any lover could pen: "The Lord watch between me and thee when we are absent one from another. You faithful friend, ROTHA MATURIN." How many Mizpahs are set up between loving hearts in this earthly wilderness!

After that she sat herself down again with the book on her lap and patiently awaited their return. Robert came in first and began arranging and sorting some papers. He looked up a little surprised when Rotha rose suddenly from her seat and offered to help him. "No, no; you are too tired," he began, but at her reiterated request he gave way. She stood beside him, following his directions with a quiet intelligence that won his good opinion. She never asked after Garton or seemed the least impatient till he returned. Robert gave her more than one curious look of mingled admiration and pity when she was too much engaged to notice it. The white fur cloak, the starchy flowers in her hair, and the unglowed hands sparkling with rings, all came under his notice; but, most of all, the wistful young face with its quiet air of sadness and its patient droop of the head.

The vicar came in next, and then Garton in his dark tweed travelling suit, and afterwards Mary, who came round and kissed Rotha without a word, and then began pouring out the coffee. Mary looked as though she had been crying, and there were dark lines under the pretty eyes, but she spoke with her old cheerfulness now and then. The rest gathered round the table and made some pretence at a meal, as though to set Garton an example; but he told them he had already supped, and only wanted a cup of coffee. Rotha made him break bread, however, and then he sat for a long time with his hand drawn silently over his eyes. He started up presently from his place as though he had forgotten something.

"Rube; I have not wished my poor Rube good-bye."

"There is no time now," returned Robert; "besides, the whole house is asleep."

"Yes, I know;" and Garton sat down again with a heavy sigh. "No one thought of rousing him, I suppose? and now it is too late. Poor Rube," he went on in an agitated voice, "how unhappy he will be to wake up to-morrow and find me gone!"

"No, no; nonsense, Gar," said Robert, with a touch of kind peremptoriness; but Rotha stopped him. She put her hand gently on the young man's arm.

"You can trust him to me, Garton, can you not? I will go to him to-morrow myself, and if he frets I will take him home. You know he belongs to me now as well as to you."

"Trust him to her?" Rotha might well treasure the smile with which he answered her; the rugged brown face worked and softened with conflicting feelings. "Come, Mary, I am ready to go up and wish Belle and the boys good-bye."

"Go, my dear fellow; we have only seven minutes," called out Robert, and Gar nodded in answer. Rotha had slipped the little Testament into his hand as they sat at the table. He had a choked sort of feeling that his good-bye would be as mute as hers when it came to the point. He hardly understood himself what the bitter ache at his heart meant, but it almost sufficed him.

Arty was fast asleep in his cot, and murmured drowsily in answer to his uncle's kiss. He had all the contents of his Noah's Ark littered on the coverlet, and the elephant and a cassowary reposed on his pillow.

Gar lent over the little fellow fondly. The other boys had been roused at the last moment by Deb, and sat shivering and miserable on the respective edges of their beds, especially Laurie, who began to cry. Garton kissed them and bade God bless them one after another, and sent his dear love to Rube; and then he went to Belle, who was waiting up for him.

Belle had never got on very well with Garton, and Mary was surprised to see how much she seemed affected at saying good-bye to him. She turned quite pale as he leant over to kiss her.

"Good-bye, dear Belle; get well soon and marry Robert." And Belle folded her arms round his neck just as though he had been her brother.

"Good-bye, dear old Gar. Forgive me for having been so often cross with you. I never meant to be so, dear. I always loved you, Gar."

"And I you, dear. There—there is Robert calling me, and I must go to Rotha. Don't come down with me, Mary; better not, better not." "Oh, Mary!"—and he leant against the half-closed door with whitening face—"I feel as though I shall never come home again, and as though this were good-bye forever."

"Gar! Gar! don't let Belle hear you, my dear boy. This is very, very wrong." And Mary put her hand tenderly on the dark, closely-cropped hair.

"I can't help it. Hark! is that Austin's voice? Good-bye, dear sister; take care of her for my sake."

"You have only two minutes, Garton. Robert is having the luggage put on the fly. Go to Rotha, my dear boy, and the vicar put his hand on his shoulder and led him gently in.

"Not good-bye," said Rotha, putting her soft hand over his mouth as though to silence him; "not good-bye. I like farewell so much better."

"Farewell, then," returned Garton, taking her in his arms; "farewell, and God bless you. If I kiss this dear face for the last time, His will be done."

"My own Garton," murmured the girl, putting back her head that she might look at him,——"my own Garton, you do not fear to go now, do you? You would not have it otherwise?"

"No; not otherwise," he repeated; and the mournful steadfastness of his look haunted her long afterwards; it reminded her much of a martyr's look,——"not otherwise, while I have this talisman." He held up his ring, that she might see the glittering cross. "In hoc spero. Beloved, that must be our motto;" and before she could answer he closed her fair face suddenly between his hands. For a brief moment she heard the beating of his heart and his whispered "God bless you!" Another minute his hand was within the vicar's grasp; and then he was gone.

THE QUIET CORNER.

BY THE BISHOP OF EASTON.

XXIII.

Whatever God has consecrated to Himself has a claim to our profound respect. Reverence is due to the meekest house that is called by His name, nor should we apply to common uses the things specially associated with the divine service.

But men are prone to run into extremes—either to despise that which God hath sanctified, or else to attribute to it a virtue which belongs to God alone. A brief reference to the circumstances which brought the Ark into the house of Obed-edom will illustrate this observation.

In the days of Eli, the high priest, the Jews, as a punishment for their sins, were sorely smitten by the Philistines. Instead of inquiring of the Lord the cause of their misfortunes, they bethought themselves of the Ark. Said they: "Let us fetch the Ark of the covenant of the Lord out of Shiloh unto us, that, when it cometh among us, it may save us out of the hand of our enemies."

This was presumption. It was attributing to the Ark power that belonged to God only. For this they were punished. There was a great slaughter, and there fell of Israel thirty thousand men, and the Ark of God was taken. Thus, while we ought to love and value sacred things, to trust in them is ruin.

The Ark was now in the hands of the Philistines. They had the symbol of God's presence and favor, without the reality. They possessed the Ark, of a covenant to which they had not subscribed. They do, indeed, seem to have regarded it with superstitious reverence; but it was for its own sake and not for God's. Need we, then, be surprised that it brought upon them such distress and affliction that they were glad to get rid of it on any terms?

Even so are religious ordinances, privileges, and sacraments a curse to those who have the form without the power, the sign without the thing signified.

When the Ark was restored again to Israel some dared to look into it, and the Lord smote of the people more than fifty thousand men.

When David was firmly established on his throne, he determined to bring the Ark to Zion with proper ceremony. But on the way Uzzah so far forgot himself as to put forth his hand and take hold of it. And the anger of the Lord was kindled against Uzzah, and God smote him there for his error, and there he died by the Ark of God. So David was displeased and vexed, and desisted from his attempt to carry it to his city.

Thus far we have seen the Ark failing those who trusted in it, an injury to those who abused it, and death to those who profaned it. Serious lessons are these: warning us not to rest our confidence on any religious privileges however great; not to regard them with indifference, and not to profane them by lightness and unholy familiarity.

Great is the error of the man who cries "the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord are these;" but equally great is the error of him who counts that common which God hath sanctified: who speaks lightly of the ministry, the sacraments, the rites and ordinances which God has appointed to convey to us grace and blessing.

And now when all were afraid of the Ark and exclaimed we die, we perish, Obed-edom opened his doors to receive it with the reverence due to its sacred character. We read that "the Ark of the Lord continued in the house of Obed-edom, the Gittite, three months; and the Lord blessed Obed-edom, and all his household."

We know that the Ark has long since vanished among those things which were but shadows of the true.

But the things of which they were the types are open to us in the Church of Christ, and every faithful worshipper has abundant access to the Holy of Holies, and, bowing at the mercy-seat, may plead the covenant in Christ.

Whosoever endeavors to order religiously the lives of himself and of those that specially pertain to him; who, besides "going to church," brings into his home, the Church, in the fullness of her influence, may be said to have the Ark abiding in his house. We may well see then the great blessing this presence of the Ark, reverently and affectionately entertained, brings to the family.

When the Ark of God is received into a house, there enters with it a spirit of forbearance and patience.

Every household consists of individuals who differ in their tastes, their habits, and their modes of thought. Nearly every one has peculiarities which it needs some patience to bear with. Every one of us is by nature selfish—tempted to seek our own indulgence, without due regard to the comfort of others. The spirit of the Gospel is eminently forbearing and unselfish. It bids us to seek, not our own, but another's wealth—i.e., welfare; in honor to prefer one another—that is, willingly to resign our pretensions in favor of another. In fine, while those who live for this world are struggling for the largest share of its riches, honors, and pleasures, it admonishes us that "it is more blessed to give than to receive."

When the Ark of God is in a house the bands of discipline are strengthened. The duty of each to the others is clearly defined. Authority is tempered with gentleness. The husband is the head of the wife; but he must love her "as Christ loved the Church." The wife must be subject to her own husband in everything; but that is not a hard saying, for the husband is taught to love his wife "as himself"—"as his own body." Children must obey their parents in all things; but lest they be discouraged, the parents must not provoke them to wrath, but bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. Servants must obey in all things their masters according to the flesh, not with eye-service, but doing the will of God from the heart, or doing service with good will. But then the master, and the mistress too, must forbear threatening—i.e., scolding—and give to their servants that which is just and equal.

These and many like results attend upon the presence of the Ark in the home. We may not extend the enumeration. But underneath them all, and including them all, is that subtle, indescribable personal blessing of the God of Covenant.

When we say the Lord blessed Obed-edom and all his house, it means that that was fulfilled to them which the priest was wont often to invoke: "The Lord bless thee and keep thee; the Lord make his face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee; the Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace."

"FIGURING THEREBY THY HOLY BAPTISM."

First Prayer in Baptismal Service for Infants.

There are two alternative prayers in the Baptismal Office. The second is from the use of Sarum, but this is not found in the old office of the English Church. It is probably of great antiquity however. Luther translated it into German from the old Latin, and it appears in the "Consultations" of Archbishop Herman. A translation of the latter shows that in its form in the English book this prayer was somewhat modified. The older form touches upon the judgment for sin in the two events of the deluge and passage of the Red Sea, as well as the safety of Noah and the children of Israel. This is a very ancient thought, which seems to have been laid aside, doubtless for the sake of the greater simplicity of the idea to be presented, viz.—of salvation through baptism. Yet in the two examples selected, of the use of water this thought is implicit. In the first clause of the prayer—the words "by water" are connected not with the nearest verb "perishing," but with the previous one "save;" or, rather as the peculiar position of the words show, the water is the element both of safety and of destruction. It is therefore highly emphatic, but it is very difficult to read it so as to give the right impression. "Saved by water" is the word used by St. Peter (1 Peter iii. 20). The second clause is also a close following of the prayer in Herman's Office, except that it omits the destruction of Pharaoh and his army in the Red Sea. That this was a figure of baptism does not rest merely on ecclesiastical tradition or patristic interpretation, but is of the clearest scriptural authority. See 1 Cor. x. 1-4. It is there said, "they were baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea." Probably St. Paul mentions both of these because he had in mind both the outward and visible symbol, and the spiritual grace and benediction. The cloud represents the spiritual resting of the Holy Ghost, a guide by night and day, a defence and enlightenment. The passage through the Red Sea, leaving behind the bondage of Egypt, and entering on the journey to Canaan, escaping the pursuers, all make this very wonderfully typical. "Didst sanctify water to the mystical washing away of sin." There is no mention of any such doctrine in Scripture, and yet every ancient baptismal office contains a reference to it. Of course the office of baptism was well established long before the earliest parts of the New Testament were written. There is however reference to water as part of the mediatorial agency, on our Lord's own part, as in His words to Nicodemus, so that this expression, "to the mystical washing away of sin," is fully justified. The translation of Herman's Consultations gives this evidently from an original. "Which didst consecrate Jordan with the baptism of thy Son, Christ Jesus, and other waters to holy dipping and washing of sins."

In the next clause the italicized places begin—viz., whether singular or plural, male or female. And here it is desirable to mention that sponsors should be very careful to inform the officiating minister of the sex of the infant before the ceremony. In large parishes children are often brought at stated times without previous notice, or very brief notice, perhaps merely given to the sexton. "Sanctify him with the Holy Ghost." This is a plain declaration that the Holy Spirit is given in baptism, and therefore a reason why the sacrament should always be afforded to infants. The belief that baptism is a mere sign that a child is born of baptized parents is in no wise the belief of the Church. On the contrary, it holds that all children are the proper subjects of baptism, and provides sponsors in case that parents are unfit or incapable to take the proper religious care.

"The ark of Christ Church." This is the recurrence to the same metaphor with which the prayer begins—viz., the influence of water both for death and life as shown in the ark of Noah. To this the Church is compared. Then follow the spiritual conditions of the life of a Christian. "Steadfast in faith." Faith is here used in the subjective sense—viz., the believing on the part of the disciple. The objective sense would be the thing believed—to wit, the Christian faith. That this is so appears from the version of the "Consultations of Herman." That reads: "May confess and sanctify Thy Name with a lusty and fervent spirit and serve Thy kingdom with constant trust." This last is equivalent to "steadfast in faith." "Joyful through hope." Hope is the second of the three conditions given by St. Paul (1 Cor. xiii.), and joyful is its proper working. The phrase in the "Consultations" is "sure hope." "Rooted in charity" is a happy addition of the Reformed Book, though it is open to the objection of being a mixed metaphor. But the idea is that "charity" the charity (or love) of St. Paul's Epistle, is the essential of the Christian life. "The greatest of these is charity." "If I have not charity I am nothing," etc. "May so pass the waves of this troublesome world." Here the metaphor of the ark is resumed, and also it applies with equal correctness to the passage of Israel through the Red Sea. "May come to the land of everlasting life." That corresponds also to the new earth which Noah disembarked upon, and to the safe shore to which the Israelites came, and further on the Land of Promise, the Canaan, which is the type of the heavenly inheritance. "There to reign with thee." Baptism makes each true believer, who is faithful to the covenant, king and priest with Christ. The word is in the version "attain to the promises of eternal life with all the godly."

SKETCHES OF ENGLISH TRAVEL.

Ely.

BY M. MEDLICOTT.

In recalling what one has seen and done in any country, especially a country so closely connected with us as England, whose early history belongs to us as a nation, as one branch of the English peoples, it is very hard to say what has most interest, or stands out most vividly in mind. Everything and every place has an interest and a history of its own. And while in London, so truly the heart of the country, all that is best and most interesting seems to centre, so much is said and written about London on this very account, that I think my readers may prefer sketches and impressions of other places.

Next to London and Westminster Abbey—to which no other cathedral can approach in the multitude of thoughts and associations which cluster about it, from the time of its foundation by Edward the Confessor, more than eight centuries ago, the mausoleum, as it is, of England's honored dead—next to this, I think, the cathedral and town that will hold an unique place in our minds, will be with each one of us the first one visited. This one me (London, although first visited, being ruled out for the present), the old cathedral and town of Ely has a tender place in memory.

I hardly know what was the cause of its being first visited; chiefly the force of circumstances, as after spending a fortnight in a little seaside village on the Suffolk coast, I found I could take Ely on my way to York. Also, for we all know how our minds are influenced by trifles, I had always been charmed by a photograph in my own home of this beautiful cathedral at early evening, with the glory of the setting sun shining softly and brightly through the windows. Thus, one thing helping another, a summer evening, toward the end of August, found me alighting from a roundabout journey at the town of Ely. Not knowing my way I took the coach in waiting at the station, and drove to the quaint and comfortable Lamb Inn, half a mile away, and was pleased to find it so near the cathedral itself. It was too pleasant not to stay out of doors till dark. After thoroughly inspecting the surroundings and outside of this venerable and beautiful building, we wandered some time about the town itself. It is very quiet, pretty in parts, nothing remarkable about it. The whole country is level, and the cathedral stands on nearly the highest ground in the Isle of Ely, the great "fortress of the Fens." Ely is not the only town or cathedral thus built upon an island, they were often selected in old times as places of greater security. Even Westminster Abbey, as we know, originally stood on a small island, the "Isle of Thorns," though now all the smaller streams surrounding it are covered over. The Abbey of Croyland and the Abbey of Glastonbury were likewise thus built, as was the famous monastery at Lindisfarne, or Holy Island, presided over by the revered and saintly Hilda.

The town, or more properly the city of Ely, lies on the River Ouse, and consists of one long street, with shorter ones leading from it in various directions. Some quaint old buildings may be found, and one is well repaid for a stroll through the quiet streets. The history of the place dates from the foundation of the great Benedictine monastery in 673, by St. Etheldreda, wife of Egfrid, King of Northumberland, who afterward became its first abbess. The church of this monastery later became the cathedral, but the present building dates from 1082, though not completed till 1584. Thus it embraces a variety of styles of architecture, from the Norman of nave and transepts to the decorated English of the side-chapels or chantries at the end of the choir-aisles, and of the lady chapel. These, however varied, are so beautifully and harmoniously blended, that one's first impression is that of majestic beauty. The extreme length of the nave adds to this effect, it being the second longest cathedral in England, ranking next to Winchester in this respect. The first view, as one enters at the west door, through the beautiful porch, is very striking, and for a time we can only stand still to wonder and admire, gradually taking in one detail after another. The heavy stone pillars, in columnar groups, making massive arches between and corresponding arches of the triforium above, forming a walk around the sides of the nave; the lofty roof, painted in panels, with subjects from Holy Scripture, reminding us a little of Michael Angelo's ceiling of the Sistine chapel, though on much smaller scale, but very beautiful and interesting; while below the roof and above the triforium, the row of clerestory windows shedding their light seem only to add to the height; the much lower, stone-vaulted roofs of the side-aisles, with their fine windows, all are beautiful separately, and together are almost perfect.

But the most noteworthy and unique feature of Ely Cathedral is its octagon, at the juncture of nave and transepts. This is impossible to describe, its beauty must be seen to be felt, and having been once seen will never be forgotten. The vistas in each direction—through the elaborate carved oak screen and gates of finely-worked brass, into the choir, with its richly-carved oak stalls, beautiful Gothic arches of the triforium and clerestory windows above, the fan-spreading vaulting of the roof crowning all, and beyond still the rich light of the east lancet-window, or through the arch leading into the nave, with Norman arches, and triforium, and painted roof, or again through each side arch into the transepts—are very beautiful. But these are not all. Notice how the corners of this intersection are cut off to form the octagon, each with a beautifully arched and carved doorway, and the fine window of rich glass above; then above and within these again the eight windows of the smaller lantern leading the eye upward, a crowning glory throwing soft radiance down below, and say if it is not exquisite! Well, methinks, has it been described as "perhaps the most beautiful and original design to be found in the whole range of Gothic architecture." Truly that was a fortunate accident when the old tower fell in 1322, to be replaced by this beautiful lantern, under the direction of the sacrist of the cathedral at that time, Alan de Walsingham, whose name should well be held in high esteem. What of modern architecture or modern times can surpass or even equal the work of the middle ages, the dark ages, as we sometimes think of them, when men put their hearts as well as their lives into their work, building not for a day, or in a day, but for time to come, and spending a life-time—nay, many generations—in doing so? Is not our best work now the restoring or copying this work of the past? May it prove as honest work.

But all this leads us away from the study of our cathedral, and indeed it is hopeless to try and describe all. One feature after another, of beauty and delicacy, yet massive strength, is pressed upon us, till we are bewildered with the detail. One visit is not enough. We go and come, again and yet again. For not content with daylight, we wander out in the long summer twilight, and finding the Lady Chapel, one of the most beautiful of chapels, used now as a parish church, open, we wander in, to take part in Evening Prayer, and witness the sacrament of Holy Baptism; a pleasant incident, is it not? to linger in our minds in connection with this venerable building, the more memorable that it was the only time we took part in this special service in our mother country.

We could go on to specify much; our walk through the triforium, looking down into the body of the church, and across to see the nearer beauty of the windows and arches on the opposite side; the different features, in their varied beauty and interest, of the choir, with its exquisite carving of foliage on the arches and capitals of pillars; retro-choir and side-chapels, and monuments; the upward (and hot) climb to the top of the massive tower at the northwest corner of the building, with its fine outlook over the fen country, too hazy, though, to see far away as Cambridge, with her many towers and spires, and colleges, sixteen miles off. All this must be imagined! For we must not neglect a walk around the outside of the walls of our Zion, to mark its grandeur and majesty. See how the wide, rich sweep of meadow stretches away to the south and east, and presently mark how the cathedral rises up (as seen from this point) in its dignity and grace. The great length is so broken by the beautiful octagon in the centre, that we do not realize at first how it stretches on either hand from us, and the rich setting of grass and trees only add to, not detract from, the harmony of tower and lantern and pinnacle, roof and window and buttress. Then as we wander around it in the sunset light, see how beautifully the rays of the passing sun shine through the windows of the Lady Chapel, into which we soon enter. In the heart of the cathedral close, with the pretty and homelike dwellings of dean and canons surrounding it, and the bishop's palace close by on the other side, our cathedral is also the heart of the town. The cloisters have long since disappeared, and here and there traces show of their extent, as of other buildings connected once with the old monastery, some of the buildings having been turned to other uses. The deanery has been constructed from what was probably the old guest hall; while some distance to the south, opening from the main street of the town, stands "Ely Porta," the great gate of the monastery. The room above this gate, which is very fine, is appropriated to the use of the King's Grammar School, founded by Henry VIII.

Oh, how charming it all is, and memory lingers fondly over it, over the stroll through the beautiful so-called park lying south of the cathedral, past the ivy-clad, venerable-looking buildings lying between this and the main street, for as we said above this was the first cathedral town visited, thus seeming different from all others. Fortunate, too, were we in seeing this one at such a season of the year, as so much of its beauty is owing to the rich luxuriance of nature. Life must flow smoothly and pleasantly here, one fancies, free from many of the cares and troubles of the world. Yet who shall say? Did the monasteries and convents of old, into which men and women shut themselves to lead more "religious" lives, did these gray walls shut out temptation and suffering? And can quiet fields, and even the sacred walls of God's house, ensure peace and rest always?

Here, too, we recall the lines of our own "Church poet," as he may well be called, fitting in as they do with our train of thought how

"When old Canôte, the Dane,
Was merry England's king,
A thousand years ago, and more,
As ancient rymours sing.
His boat was rowing down the Ouse
At eve, one summer day,
Where Ely's tall cathedral peered
Above the glassy way.

"Anon, sweet music on his ear,
Comes floating from the fane,
And listening as with all his soul,
Saw old Canôte, the Dane.
And reverent did he doff his crown,
To join the clerky prayer,
While swelled old lauds and litanies
Upon the stilly air.

"The Church that sung those anthem prayers
A thousand years ago,
Is singing yet by silver Cam,
And here by Hudson's flow.

And where are kings and empires now,
Since then, that went and came!
But holy Church is praying yet,
A thousand years the same!"

The Diocese of Ely, set off in 1107 from that of Lincoln, then the one of greatest extent in all England, comprises parts of four counties, Suffolk, Cambridge, Bedford and Huntingdon, and in old times its temporal jurisdiction was very great, and many privileges were granted to its lord abbot and then to the lord bishops of the see. It was in royal charters, sometimes called the "county palatine of Ely," a title retained by the sister see of Durham till the time of William IV., but by Ely only till during the reign of Henry VIII.

FROST AND COLD.

BY HARRIET F. HUCE.

My waterfall is still to-day—
Only a gentle murmur tells
That under the chrysal roof still dwells
The brook that comes from the hills away.
Only last night I was charmed to sleep
By the music ringing clear and deep
From the shining drops that broke and fell
Through the moonlit air, and none may tell
Nor voices sing that glorious song.
Far back the rocky way along
The burring waters seemed to throng,
Then, leaping, tumbling, foaming, came,
Eager, triumphant, all to claim
Voice in that wondrous, wondrous rush
Of harmony—

I listened till all my soul was filled
With rapture born of a grief that was stilled
By those wonderful tones. They filled all the night,

The hills and the woods and the sweet moonlight,

Till my eyes were wet with blessed tears,
And my heart grew light of its weary cares.

I looked this morning, and all was white—
The frost and cold had come in the night;
Rhythm, cadences—all were gone—

A white, still harmony reigned alone;
Only a sweet and muffled hum

Down under the ice—its seams to come
Like a sad miserere, chanted low,

As one sings to himself, softly and slow.

But no cry for pity, no sob of pain
Comes from my brook; it's the old soft strain
Of the maiden's crooning, and now, as then,
It brings the sweet breath of the pines again.
With the same glad tone it ripples and sings—
Singing forever of happy things—

And still it is cheery and loving and bright, Though under the chain that was bound last night.

Then I bent my head, ashamed, and said,
"And I must mourn when hopes are dead—
Must sob, and weep, and make sad moan—
Cry out and say that life is done!
My heart, we'll toil no more in sadness,
But sing, like the brook, with joy and gladness."

THE RIGHT INTERPRETATION OF THE SCRIPTURES.

BY R. GOODMAN.

It would relieve a good many minds and render nugatory much of the blatant and coarse criticism of certain portions of the Bible if the rules of interpretation, which have been laid down by those qualified to do so, were better known and applied by preachers as well as hearers of the Word. To assign to early ages the excessive artificiality of the nineteenth century, to gauge the consciences and actions of the nomads of the earth's childhood by the civilized denizens of its maturity, when the light of the Gospel casts its full rays upon them, are as inconsequent as to hold the Arabs with whom the English are warring to the same accountability for the breach of any of the rules of modern warfare as the latter are subject to. We cannot read into primitive history the complicated and far-fetched notions of modern society, and we must take the writings of the prophets, palmists and apostles, as speaking according to the common notion of things, and the prevalent and current views of the world around them. The Rev. F. W. Robertson, who held the Bible to be inspired, not dictated, and that there could have been no progressive dispensations if inspiration had produced absolute perfection of human knowledge, also held that a spiritual revelation from God must sometimes involve scientific incorrectness. In the history of creation, for instance, if the cosmogony had been given in terms which would satisfy our present scientific knowledge, the men of that day would have rejected its authority, and said, can we trust one in matters unseen who is manifestly in error in things seen and level to the senses. A preacher of our day who is trying to fritter away the world-wide significance of the call of Abraham and the "Exodus of Moses" and other notable events recorded in the Old Testament, and resolve them into mere legends, has been compared to Robertson, who, it is said, stood thirty years ago in advanced criticism where the clerical iconoclast stands to-day. But let us try him by that stumbling block to criticism, the story of the sacrifice of Isaac. Robertson does not say that it was a sanction of human sacrifice, that Abraham had murder in his heart, and the like. On the contrary, that Abraham living in a country where human sacrifices were common, was familiar with the idea, and his moral conscience was not outraged by the command; and taking the history as a whole, the conclusion as well as the commencement, God did not require the sacrifice; he tested the faith of Abraham, and required and obtained the surrender of his will, and whatever Robertson's deviations may have been from the orthodox teachings of his day, he was always reverent—he rejoiced in finding within the Church room to expand his soul and freedom for his intellect, and however much some persons may have disagreed with his views on certain questions, they could not but sympathize with his Christian feeling and noble thoughts. "I think," says the late Mr. Maurice, "I first saw light about the Canaanites in this way. Sterling had convinced me most clearly that Alexander, instead of deserving to be denounced was doing a mighty work in bringing Greek civilization to bear upon Asia, yet he was utterly horrified at the Jewish wars. I asked myself why—what was the end of each, and if it was an end for humanity? was it wrong to say, God was the author of it?" It has been said with too much emphasis, perhaps, that the Bible is a sealed book to all who are unspiritual, but there can be no doubt that the revelation of moral and religious truth is the sole end of its teachings, and we ought to distinguish between the commandments, which are of eternal and universal obligation, and those which are transitory in their nature and only applicable to those to whom they were directly addressed. As Dr. Arnold shows, the revelations of God to man were gradual, and adapted to his state at the several periods when they were successively made. The command of Moses to spare only the virgins among the women of Midian, as the only way to prevent those to whom it was addressed from plunging into those sensual excesses to which the grown-up women of Midian were addicted as a part of their religious rites, would not have been abhorrent even to the ruling ideas of a later age, as we see by the advice of Agamemnon to Menelaus, not to spare a single Trojan, and by the sweeping execution of all the female slaves of their household by Ulysses and Telemachus.

The imprecatory and denunciatory portion of the Psalter have much exercised the minds of religious people because they have failed to recognize the peculiar characteristics of the Jewish people, whose life was bound up in their religion and its author, and any aspersions of either became a serious matter and deserving of the strongest anathemas. As Coleridge says, it was in the entire and vehement devotion of their total being to the service of their Divine Master that we can find a rousing example of faith and fealty, and it is because zeal for God and the ideal had eaten up the Psalmist and burnt out personal feeling that we condone or even approve these denunciations. Every day of his public life, says one whose long residence in the East has made him familiar with its present customs and inherited traditions, David knew that he had about him men whose words of friendship went along with calculations as to the advantage of killing him. Had we, therefore, a collection of Oriental lyrics, expressing truthfully the feelings of a man as real poetry does, and yet find no trace of fear in them of his fellow man nor aspirations that his enemies be confounded, we might conclude that the author was some recluse, but certainly never that he was an Eastern king.

The Bible has its human as well as its divine side, and criticism has its place, but it should be "a finger post at the crossing, not a toll bar at the entrance of the road; a pruning knife, not an axe at the root of the tree." Like the people, which is its main subject, it is a fact, as well a record of facts, and we are bound to construe it according to well-known rules, and not burst old skins by putting therein new wines. The light of modern criticism is more penetrating because it is the creation of stronger forces, just as our gas and electric luminaries are of higher power than the oil and candles of our forefathers. Persons who have no opportunity to cultivate their understanding are saved from perceiving apparent difficulties, which if they did perceive them they would be incapable of solving, but the increased intelligence of our age has brought into view every jot and tittle of the Scriptures, and the most powerful lenses have been used in the effort to discover something which may on the one hand tend to strengthen their authenticity, and on the other to impair and weaken their teachings. There never has been a period when not only the clergy but the laity gave so much attention to the study of the Bible as now, and certainly the aids by commentaries and expositions were never more numerous and able. But yet the young especially are liable to be blown about by the diverse winds of criticism, and the pulpit teachings certainly should be conservative, for it is much easier to root up a good principle than to plant it and leave it grow again after its severance from its native soil. If we can be taught to read and study the Bible in the light of the ruling ideas of the times in and for which its several portions were written, we will escape many false conclusions and not feel that shock to our sensibilities which comes from want of proper comparisons. As the Bishop of Peterborough says: "The Bible is in a sense in which it is true of no other book, God's book and God's word; but equally true is it that the Bible is man's book and man's word. . . . The human nature, the human individuality, the human peculiarities of the writers remain untouched because God was speaking through the lips of real men."

If we melt the ideas and actions of civilized nations as they existed only a century ago in one crucible we shall discover but little refined gold according to our notions, and look upon the penal laws of England, where hanging was the punishment for innumerable offences, as essentially barbarous; the laws of war, when cities and towns were given over to the rude soldiery of the conquering foe, as most atrocious, and even the ordinary intercourse of society as coarse, if not vulgar. But we measure these actions by the ideas of that age, and do not pass judgment upon their authors in the light of the present. We are not justified in stigmatizing the Patriarchs as we do the Mormons for their harems, nor can we fitly apply coarse epithets to Abraham for his concealment of the truth about his wife, nor to Jacob for outwitting his brother, knowing that with those sheiks veracity and uprightness did not hold the theoretical high place they do with us, though practically, notwithstanding the lapse of centuries, we are not greatly in advance of them when our material interests are concerned, even with our greater moral enlightenment. They lived before the commandments, and "sin" is "not imputed when there is no law." And for Jacob it can be said that he did not seek by his artifices the increase of his earthly possessions, for he went away to seek his fortune and left to the elder brother his share of his father's wealth, and he only obtained the first-born's blessing which had been promised to him by prophecy, which his father was disposed to annul. "The Old Testament is a vast lectionary of political and social philosophical history," to be used and construed on its human side in accordance with the ideas of the ages in which it was written, but far beyond that it is the Word of God, which appeals to the conscience, and was primarily given for the revelation to man of the one grand fact of a personal living God in human history; and on this side we do not study it as we should a systematic treatise moulded by one of ourselves. Even if the "higher criticism" could dissever from the divine element the historical and scientific accuracy of the Bible, the value of the spiritual teachings is so immense that they can never be surrendered; but as that separation is not a likely process, we can best guard the truth enshrined within them by treating the historical portions of the Scriptures with becoming reverence, and, if our faith has fallen through, remember that there are multitudes of others who yet hold to beliefs which no negative criticism can destroy.

"It shall greatly help ye to understand Scripture if thou marke not only what is spoken or written, but of whom, unto whom, with what words, at what time, where, to what intent, with what circumstance, considering what goeth before and what followeth after."—Prologue of Miles Coverdale.

CHANGE—FOREVER CHANGE.

We mark it in the fleecy clouds,
That ghost-like wander by;
The brightest flower has but its hour,
To bud and bloom, then die.
'Tis read in old familiar things,
And in the new and strange,
Where'er we go, what'e'er we know,
'Tis change—forever change.

'Tis written on the tranquil waves,
Oh, fearfully and strong;
The rivers that now calmly glide,
In torrents gush along.
The birds that glad our native woods,
Have each their hour to range;
The leaves must fall, the doom of all
Is change—forever change.

But, oh, not only in the woods,
The streams, the flowers, the trees—
Do we appear, from year to year,
Less changed than aught of these!
Old loves we leave, old links we break,
Old friends as no grow strange;
The saddest emblem of the heart
Is change—forever change.

OLD KIRSTY.

BY MRS. FLEMING JENKINS.

Old Kirsty lived by herself in a cottage down by the loch side. She was said to be more than a hundred years old; she had been born in that cottage and had lived in it all her life, seeing father and mother, and, at last, some twenty years before I first knew Kirsty, her only sister, carried thence to be rowed across the loch to their graves. She had never married, and, as time went on, had become more and more solitary and reserved in her habits, entering no man's door, and bidding no man enter hers. In all her hundred years she had not been four miles away from home. I used often to meet her in my walks; a tiny, shrunken, smoke-dried old woman, tottering along to the spring with a pail for water, or to the farm with a jug for milk. On Sundays she would come out in her best clothes, a clean natch and a bright tartan plaid, and, with her Bible folded in a pocket-handkerchief would take a trembling Sabbath saunter all alone. When she saw me coming she would step off the path and dive behind the brushwood, loitering there until I should pass by, so that for a long time we never exchanged even a nod—words we could not, for she had no English and I had no Gaelic. But one day I came upon her on the shore half a mile or more from her home, dragging along the root of a tree cast up by the tide. It was a good big snag, a world too heavy for her dwindled strength, but she was struggling bravely with it, evidently bent on taking it home for firing. Eager to help, and intending to carry it for her, I ran and seized upon it; but she, poor soul! thought I wanted it for myself, and resisted my efforts to get hold of it with all her might. When, after quite a tussle, I succeeded in wresting it from her, she flung up her hands and cursed me—I knew by the tone and gesture it was a curse, though it was uttered in Gaelic. I managed to haul the thing along the shore, and when I had got it to her house, I laid it down by the locked door and waited. When she, still groaning over her loss and muttering at my tyrannical rapacity, arrived and saw her lost treasure restored, her astonishment was great; greater still her remorse for having wrongfully suspected me. She caught my hands in hers and kissed them, kissed my sleeve, and then stooping, kissed literally the hem of my garment. She never invited me into her house, to which, as I have said, she admitted no one, but from that day forth she and I were good friends, always smiling and nodding and talking uninielligibly each to the other when we met.

One evening a message was brought to me that old Kirsty was very ill—would I go and see her? I went at once, taking with me the keeper as interpreter. We found the cottage all dark, and though we could hear Kirsty's heavy breathing, could not at first make out where she was. I sent the man for a light, and we then found that she must be in the inner of the two rooms into which the cottage was divided. The opening between them was barely five feet high, and very narrow, so that I had to stoop and squeeze myself through. As I lifted my head in the inner room I felt a soft filmy curtain or drapery flap across my face. Glancing up I saw that every beam supporting the low, slanting roof was hung with festoons of some delicate black tissue, waving softly in the wind that blew under the gaping eaves. Wind fairies draped the chamber with these inky hangings in readiness for poor Kirsty's lying-in-state? Next day, by daylight, I saw that these black veils were long cobwebs thickened by the peat smoke of years into a substance like the finest India muslin, only jet-black.

We applied what remedies we could, and soon Kirsty felt better and said she wished to be left alone. We demurred, but she insisted. I begged that she would at least let us leave a light burning by her, but she said no, and bade the keeper tell me that God could see her as well in the dark as in the light, and what for would she need a candle? She was not alone when He would be with her. So we left her "not alone." She was better again after that for some days, then weaker; and as she grew weaker she became less farouche, and would let my servants be about her. Then a relation was sent for and came. One afternoon I had been across the loch in the boat, and on my way home called to ask how Kirsty was. The relation, a quiet, kindly woman, came out crying. Kirsty had died an hour before. She had seemed well and quite easy, and had eaten a piece of bread and jam—then had suddenly risen from her bed and come out unhelped on the stone before the door, had "lookit round to the hills and the water with a sort of a smile as though she would say farewell to them all, for had not she passed all her days among them? and so just laid her down and died."—Highland Crafts, in Good Words.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

A NEW SONG.

BY E. B. S.

Will Wentworth was trudging homeward from "Three Rock Pond," his fish basket slung over his shoulder, and his pole and lines looking as if they might have done good service; but Will evidently was in no pleasant mood.

Johnny Beale, who was swinging on the carriage-drive gate as he went by, accosted him with, "Hallo, old fellow! Had good luck? How many fish?"

And Will snapped back: "What's that to you?" and marched on.

Johnny's eyes opened widely, and his mouth puckered up into whistling shape as he looked after him.

"What has crossed his track, I wonder? Guess the fish didn't bite; and yet Will can always coax 'em if anybody can! What's he done with Ralph, though? They went off together!"

So they did, and that was the secret of Will's discomfort. In the first place, Ralph had the good fortune to catch the first fish, and the second, and the third, before Will's usual luck began; and Ralph showed his delight too plainly, and "bragged a good deal too much," Will thought and said. Then they had a hot dispute over a fish which Will jerked up just to the surface, and then lost. Will declared it was a splendid pickerel, and Ralph stood to it that he saw it plainly and it was a roach.

Next, when Will rowed to a capital fishing ground, as he believed, Ralph insisted that there was a much better place beyond Second Rock, for his uncle had caught lots of fish there the day before.

"I know this is a good place too," said Will, doggedly; and he dropped his lines. Unfortunately he did not have a bite very soon, and Ralph began to urge trying the other spot. Then hot-tempered Will pulled up his lines and rowed directly to the shore, where he jumped out.

"There!" cried he, "you can fish just where you like best. I can't suit you."

It cost Will his last half dime to get a boy who was just pushing out to row him over to their starting place. And he carried with him an uneasy conscience, remembering Ralph's dismayed look as he jumped off from the boat. Ralph was not much accustomed to manning a boat, and, as Will knew, would hardly have gone off fishing alone; at least, his mother would not have consented to it.

Long before Will drew near Johnny Beale's house he was thoroughly ashamed of himself, and therefore doubly uncomfortable. And after he reached home he watched out for Ralph, and felt very much relieved when at length he saw him plodding by.

"He's safe, any way! Hope he didn't lose the oars, or forget to tie up the boat!"

"Come, Willy," said Mrs. Wentworth that evening, "shall we look over the next chant in the service? It is a psalm this time; after the first evening lesson."

Will had been much interested in studying with his mother the anthems and hymns of the Morning Prayer; but he now took up his book rather listlessly. Mrs. Wentworth noticed this, and waited for him to speak.

"Do you mean this, mother;—'Cantate Domino'?" and Will glanced over the well known words.

"I don't see how we can think of this as a 'new song,'" said he; "at least in our church; for our choir sing it over and over, every Sunday!"

"We might sing it every day, and oftener, my son, and still have something new each time to thank God for."

"New mercies, each returning day,
Hover around us while we pray:
New perils past; new sins forgiven;
New thoughts of God, new hopes of heaven."

Mrs. Wentworth repeated these sweet words very feelingly, and Will was struck with them, although he made no remark about it, but asked some question about the other verses of the psalm. Will did not feel in thankful mood just then.

The next day when Will went out to play ball with Johnny he hoped that Ralph would come along and join them; but Ralph did not appear that day, nor the next. Towards evening Will heard that he was very sick.

"What is the matter with him?" he asked of the friend who mentioned this.

"I did not find out exactly," was the reply; "it is not very long, you know, since he had that nervous fever, and I believe he got over-tired or excited in some way a day or two ago, and it has upset him."

Poor Will! How remorsefully he thought over all that had passed between them on that day!

"As if I mightn't have remembered," he said to himself, "that a fellow who had been so sick had a right to be a little fussy. Poor old Ralph! how pleased he was to go with me—and to think how I left him!"

From what had been told him Will took to himself the whole blame of Ralph's relapse and serious illness. The fact was that the younger boy was scarcely fit to go out in the boat, even with an older person to depend upon, and Will could not have guessed how dangerous a little over-excitement would be to him.

When left alone in the boat Ralph was really alarmed, but he kept near the shore for some time, hoping that Will was only playing a joke on him, and would soon rejoin him, for a projecting point hid the other boat from his view, and he did not see him set off to recross the pond.

He tried throwing out his lines to pass away the time; but at last, thoroughly perplexed and troubled, he concluded that there was nothing for it but to row across as best he might. It was a heavy task for his feeble arms, and the results we have heard.

A week passed, and Ralph Dana was no better. Weary and anxious days they were to Will, and he could hardly have borne the suspense and self-reproach if he had not confided the whole story to his mother.

"If I could only do something to prove how sorry I am mother!" he exclaimed, when he had talked it over. "Do you suppose it is good for a fellow that's always flying into a passion to have to wait, wait like this?"

"I hope it will prove good discipline, sonny," she answered; "but do not forget that there is one thing we can do for poor Ralph."

"I haven't forgotten that, mother."

That evening a message came to Will Wentworth from Mrs. Dana: Would he be willing to watch with Ralph that night?

The sick boy was very nervous, he was told, and could not bear any one to nurse him except his mother, and one friend, who had relieved her all she could. He had called for Will very often, crying: "Oh, Will, do come!" And this had suggested the idea of sending for him.

"You will not have any trouble about the medicines," said the messenger, "for Mrs. Gray will be watching with you close by, and she will give them to you; but she will keep out of sight for fear of worrying poor Ralph."

"Do you think you can keep awake, Will?" asked his mother.

Will nodded. "I don't believe I shall feel like going to sleep, if Ralph really wants me," said he, "but—I'm afraid—"

"Well, you had better try, my dear," she answered; and Will promised to go.

How like a culprit he felt as he set forth that evening. If Mrs. Dana had been only known how unkind he had been, he was sure she would not have sent for him. And Ralph must have been delirious when he called him. What if the sight of him should bring it all back and make him worse!

A lonely whip-poor-will had lighted on a rock in a field as he passed, and was repeating its cry.

"Whip away!" muttered our poor Will, "I'd rather take a caning than go through this!"

Mrs. Gray took Will aside when he arrived at the house.

"Ralph is asleep," she said, "and I have sent his mother to take some rest. But he is very weak to-night. We must watch him carefully. Now please come and sit near him, and be ready to speak to him quietly when he wakes, for he is apt to be much distressed then."

Will obeyed, and drew softly near the sick bed. How ill poor Ralph looked! Will watched every breath and motion anxiously.

After half an hour more of uneasy sleep Ralph suddenly opened his eyes and looked at Will. He closed them again, but soon moved a little and gazed eagerly at him. Will gently took his hand saying:

"How are you now, dear Ralph?"

"Oh, you have come back, you have!" exclaimed the sick boy. "Don't go away again. Will; say you won't!" Then holding Will's hand tightly, he again dozed off.

Mrs. Gray stole softly around and bent over him, then nodded and smiled at Will.

"If you can only keep him quiet a little while," she whispered.

So Will sat, bending forward, that he might not disturb Ralph by withdrawing his hand. And Ralph slept, but he seemed to grow more pale and wan, and the nurse looked anxious as she wet his lips and at last went and spoke to his mother.

Will never forgot the watch of that next hour or two. He felt sure that Ralph was dying, and indeed the sinking turn lasted a long time. But at length, to the great relief of the anxious watchers, the sick boy revived.

He took some nourishment, smiled at his mother, and then looked gratefully at Will.

"You were so good to come!" he said; "and we're safe home now, aren't we?"

Will nodded; his eyes filled with tears, but Ralph did not notice this, for he had fallen asleep again.

Mrs. Dana drew Will gently away from the bedside, and beckoned him into the next room.

"You must come away now, dear boy, and get some sleep. This has been a hard night for you, but I thank you so much for coming! I think you have

Mrs. Dana wanted Will to go upstairs and lie down, but, as he could do nothing more then, he preferred to run home, and rest there.

The day was just breaking as Will started out—tired, indeed, but cheered and hopeful now. He chose a short cut through the woods, and, as he was pushing his way along, he was suddenly arrested by the sweet song of a little bird in a tree just before him.

The little fellow sat on a high bough and sang with all his might, rousing his sleepier comrades with his melody.

Will stopped and listened.

"Ah, birdie," he cried, "you have a 'new song' this morning, and so have I. Sing for me too!"

"A new song." The words lingered in his mind:

"He hath put a new song in my mouth, Even praise unto our God."

"They think he is better, mother, dear," was all he said, as his mother opened the door for him. But there was something in his quiet smile which showed her that the night's dreaded task had done her boy no harm.

"A new song!" repeated Will, as he laid his head on his pillow. "Oh, if the Lord will make Ralph well again, I will try not to forget to sing it!"

Ralph did grow better from that time. It was many days before his boyish strength returned and he was able again to mingle among his old playmates. But one, at least, spent many of his play hours with him, patiently trying to amuse and cheer him, with no trace of the fiery Will of a few weeks before.

Will Wentworth was slowly learning the parts and harmony of a song that will be always new.

"THE LITTLE FELLOW SANG WITH ALL HIS MIGHT."

done Ralph good, and it was very kind of you."

"No, ma'am, it wasn't," said Will, hastily; "and you don't know—I left him that day we went a-fishing because I got vexed, and I'm afraid that was what made him sick again."

"You must not blame yourself too much, my dear," said Mrs. Dana, soothingly. "I ought not to have let him go at all. But we will hope the worst is over now; he is certainly gaining a little."

RUNAWAY FREDDIE.

BY V. G. HOFFMAN.

It was a bright June day, all the earth lay warm and green under the blue sky. Soft little clouds hurried to and fro and the tall tree-tops waved in the gentle breeze. The bees buzzed in and out among the honeysuckle, and the hollyhocks that grew by the fence stood stately and tall with all their pink, red and white cups opened to the full to catch the sunshine. The birds sang merrily as they darted hither and thither.

"I dess I've had 'nough of dis, I do and see the baby," said a little boy to himself that was playing in a big, old-fashioned garden. Baby was a neighbor's child who lived at some distance down the road.

"You know mamma has forbiddeu you to go outside the gate alone," said a small voice, so close to Freddie's ear that he turned to see if any one was answering him. There was no one to be seen, and only a little cock-sparrow, who sat on a low limb with his head on one side, in a most knowing way, could have heard.

He stood for a minute looking at the little cock-sparrow, and the little cock-sparrow looked at him. He dropped his spade and away flew cock-sparrow with a chirp as much as to say, "Don't you wish you could go too!" This was too much, so off he started after the sparrow as fast as his fat little legs could carry him.

He reached the big gate but found it fastened; nothing daunted, he crept through the bars. How much nicer it was out here than in the garden—such lots of daisies, and inside there were nothing but roses.

He clambered over the stile and started off across the meadows, remembering that this was what nurse called the short cut. Nurse had gone away for the day, and that was why he was having such a good time alone.

The tall grasses shut him in on every side; how pleasant the little breeze sounded as it blew gently through them, swaying them back and forth to a tune of its own. What lovely flowers grew among their tall stems. He would get a beautiful bouquet for baby.

So he sat down and began to gather those near him, using both his chubby little hands to pick a big scarlet poppy, which sent him rolling over on his back. He laughed and thought it great fun.

He scrambled up on his feet and trudged on holding fast to his big red poppy. What a very long short-cut it seemed to be, but he thought he saw the fence at the end with the stile that led into Baby's garden. Then what a nice time he would have and how that funny baby would laugh to see him.

Just then a big yellow and black butterfly came sailing by and poised quite on the top of a tall grass that swung across his path.

"Ou velly pitty fing!" he cried, and reached out his hand to catch it. But the butterfly was too quick for him, and off he flew. Instead of flying straight up, he started off in and out among the grasses, and Freddie after him, such a scamper.

The tall grasses tried to hold the foolish little boy back, and then the butterfly would rest and seem to wait to be caught up with. At last one piece of grass wrapped itself around his tired little feet. Down he went, and off flew the butterfly.

He lay still for a minute, all ready to cry, but remembering that papa told him that little men ought to make the best of things as big men had to do, and never cry, he rubbed his knuckles hard into his big brown eyes, gave a gulp, and bravely swallowed all his tears, and then tried to find the way back.

But how tired he was, and where was the path? Tall grasses closed him in on every side, no matter which way he went. He looked up, and could only see a little patch of blue sky, over which a fleecy white cloud was hurrying.

Oh, dear! oh, dear! how nice the garden seemed now. There was the hammock hanging idly under the trees, and the beautiful ditch with the bridge across which he had been making; even the despised roses seemed to grow in beauty. What would his mamma say? His pretty little mamma, who was such a jolly playfellow.

"She'll fink I didn't love her 'nough to stay and take care of her, as papa said I must when he's at hifness. Oh, dear! oh, dear! I see such a velly naughty, naughty boy!" and in spite of all his manliness, two big round tears stole down his rosy cheeks, and fell with a splash on his pinafore, while another ran dimly off the end of his nose.

He sat down, and gave himself up to the most gloomy thoughts. The sad tale of "The Babes in the Wood" came to him, and he looked around to see if there were any robhins to cover him up; but no, there was only tall shining grasses swaying around him, and no birds at all. Besides he was only one "babe," and perhaps they wouldn't take so much trouble just for one.

He heard a little rustle in the grass close beside him, and looking down, spied a field-mouse creeping softly out of a hole. He kept very still, and pretty soon out came four tiny little mice, all gray, with pink to their tails and ears. Such cunning little things! He lay gently down, so as to be nearer them, and off they scampered.

Soon, however, when all was again quiet, they came back, and he heard the little ones say, in a funny, squeaky voice,

"Mother, what's that lying there?"

"That, my dears, is a foolish, naughty little boy, who ran away from home and is lost in our field."

Then one of them stood up on its hind legs and looked at Freddie, who at any other time would have laughed to see how funny the little creature looked, balancing itself on its haunches, with its little pink paws hanging down in front; but now he only felt what a miserable, naughty little boy he was.

"Very silly," sniffed the field-mouse, and ran off. Another of those big tears rolled from under his drooping lids.

"Yes, very silly," said the old mouse, "to leave a beautiful garden—though I, myself, don't care much about gardens; but I have some distant connections who live in one, and they say it's very pleasant—and his dear mamma, who, no doubt, must be very much alarmed by this time. My children," said she, standing on her hind legs and shaking her little paw at them, while she looked very stern and severe, "if you ever do such a wicked thing, I'll never forgive you."

"Oh, mother, dear," squeaked the little ones, "how could we?"

Poor Freddie's heart was almost broken. He wondered if his mamma would feel so, and then what should he do? A faint sob shook the little figure, and away ran the mice, all except one, who, way down in her mousey heart, felt sorry for the forlorn little boy.

She stood up and looked at him thoughtfully for a minute, and then scampered off towards the foot-path, which she knew very well. When she reached it she stood for a minute with her head on one side and listened. Far off she heard the barking of a dog—nearer and nearer it came—her heart beat violently against her sleek little sides, but she was a brave little mouse and stood her ground. The next bark came so loud she fairly jumped, and just then, on the other side of the narrow path, appeared a dog's head. He spied her standing there, and with a bound flew after her. But Miss Mousy was too quick, and off she started towards Freddie.

Such a dreadful race for poor mousey. On, on they went, she thought she should drop, but the thought of the forlorn little boy in the grass gave her strength, and she ran on till she came to Freddie, and then she ran right across his face. He jumped up with a start, and threw his arms around dear old Brann's neck.

"O, you dear, dear doggie, did you tum to find ou naughty Feddie?"

Brann licked his face soothingly, and forgot the field mouse, who by this time was safely at home, and no one knew but itself what a brave thing it had done.

Freddie, now fully on his feet again, took hold of Brann's collar, who soon led him back to the path, where they met mamma, tired and warm, hurrying home as fast as she could. She had been over to Baby's, and not finding him there, was going back to see if anything had been heard of him at the house.

Such a sorrowful little boy as met her—his hands and face were scratched and his short yellow curls were full of seeds and bits of grass.

He looked pleadingly up into her face, remembering what Mrs. Mouse had said—but mamma only took him up in her arms and said with tears in her pretty eyes—

"O Freddie, how could you, how could you."

But he felt as if his heart was broken, and papa would never leave him to take care of his dear mamma again.

The Churchman.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 22, 1885.

We take a special pleasure in publishing the very remarkable article by Dr. Dix upon the University of the South, and especially at this time when, as never before in twenty years, the unity of the country and of the hearts of its people is uppermost in the minds of men.

SOME of the English Church papers discuss the Prayer Book Annexed with scarcely less interest and thoroughness than they might be expected to do if it immediately concerned themselves. The Guardian devotes to it an elaborate review, approving of many of the proposals, but thinks that a fuller ritual study will result in a more cultured ritual and in a more delicate appreciation of rhythm. It would be better, the Guardian thinks, if subjected to a deliberate recension which, if approved by the Convention of 1886, might be fully adopted by the Convention of 1889. The Church Times, which devotes to the subject the first in a proposed series of editorials, is altogether dissatisfied, not to say disgusted. It says the Prayer Book Annexed, "cannot possibly be adopted by the Church and must be dismissed as a dismal fiasco, to be dealt with anew in some more adequate fashion." It is probable that the committee and especially the General Convention to meet next year, will duly take account of these criticisms, but they will bear in mind that the work is one which especially concerns the American Church.

PAPAL RESENTMENT.

The present pope has shown singular energy and determination, as witnessed in the late case of Cardinal Pitra, and in several other instances, in enforcing discipline among the higher ranks of his clergy, and binding them first of all to bow before his lately promulgated absolutism. The recent appointment of Mr. Keiley to the American Legation at Rome has been generally attributed to the influence of the Archbishop of Baltimore, whose special henchman Mr. Keiley is said to be.

For some time past a second cardinal's hat has been promised to the Roman obedience in America, and it has been always supposed that it would be given to the Archbishop of Baltimore, who is the primate of the Roman communion in America.

Now the cable announces from Rome that this hat has been given not to the Archbishop of Baltimore, but to the Archbishop of Boston. Some extraordinary reason must have occurred for passing over the former, who both as primate, and from the influence of his see, seemed entitled to this honor. And the question arises whether this may not be intended to mark the displeasure of the pope with Archbishop Gibbons for his indiscreet and officious effort to force a faithful subject of the pope into the position of minister to an excommunicate court.

Leo XIII. feels so strongly on this point that last year when the Crown Prince of Germany visited him during his stay in Rome, he was requested from the Vatican not to come in the carriage of the German Ambassador to King Humbert, and as the German Minister to the pope, M. Schloezer, did not keep a carriage, the Crown Prince was forced at the last moment to have himself conveyed to the Vatican in a hired carriage.

A pope who would not allow the carriage of an ambassador to the Italian King to enter his court yard, could not have been pleased with the readiness with which the Archbishop of Baltimore was willing to imperil the soul of one of his flock by forcing him as a minister to the Quirinal.

THE WHITE CROSS.

The Bishop of Durham takes occasion, in one of the English publications, to commend the White Cross movement as the best way of dealing with social impurity. The essential truth of the revelations put forth in one of the English weeklies he takes for granted. Their dreadful character he does not pretend to deny. The evil is so alarming and so ominous that, in his opinion, no time must be lost in taking it in hand. It concerns one of the greatest and most difficult problems of the time, and, as for that matter, of all time. It lies at the very foundation of social order and social well-being.

Of course, there is no subject to be handled with greater wisdom and greater care. Legislation cannot hope to do in the case what it can openly and boldly do in other directions. It can approach the subject, as it were, from the outside; it can block up some of the passage-ways to the citadel and tear down some of its defences; but the enemy is too deeply entrenched and too strongly fortified to be dislodged, and still less destroyed, by acts of the Legislature.

No more can the subject be approached in hardly any way without incurring some risks. It is a thankless task to legislate on the subject—that is, with a sufficient knowledge of the facts to legislate with wisdom, and it is equally thankless to have to do with it in any official and familiar way. Nevertheless, the evil will not cure itself, and unless looked at as it is by somebody, will in some way force itself upon the attention of the whole community.

Bishop Lightfoot lays much stress on the fact that the White Cross makes much of that chivalrous element which played so prominent a part in the Middle Ages. All young men who are worth their salt, he says, have a sense of honor. The five-fold pledge of the White Cross makes the most of this feeling. They promise to treat woman with respect, and to endeavor to keep her from wrong and degradation, because the doing of this is prompted by an instinctive feeling in all noble natures. They will endeavor to put down all indecent language and coarse jests, because they are wanton and offensive and an index of degeneracy and depravity on the part of those who make use of them. They will make the law of purity to be equally binding on men and women, because the law of God makes no distinction, and the law of society should not.

It is a fortunate circumstance, we think, that a movement which the Bishop of Durham has such faith in and so heartily recommends is being introduced in this country, and especially in connection with the Church. That something of the kind was demanded is seen in the growing interest in the movement, and in the starting of the order in connection with several parishes. So far as we can see it can do no harm, and is in a way of doing very great good. Even the best-instructed and purest-minded lads can learn nothing to their injury, while they who are something less than either will find themselves put under such a combined sense of honor and of religious obligation, that it cannot fail to guard and fortify them against an evil than which none is more seductive, wide-spread and too often disastrous.

THE UNIVERSITY OF THE SOUTH.

Having just returned from a visit to Sewanee, Tennessee, and being deeply impressed by what I saw and heard at that site of the University of the South, I ask your kind permission to give your readers some information about a work of which so little is known among us. I went to Sewanee, curious to learn for myself what the University is; I return with the conviction that it is already doing a great work for letters and religion, and that, unless all signs should fail, it has reached a point from which the advance will be rapid and sure.

The direct route, for us, to Sewanee, is from New York to Philadelphia, thence to Harrisburgh, and then, by the Cumberland Valley Railroad, to Hagerstown, Md., where the traveller strikes the Shenandoah Valley, and proceeds, through some of the loveliest scenery in this country, by Bristol, Roanoke and Cleveland, to Chattanooga. There, taking the Nashville, Chattanooga and St. Louis road, he reaches Cowan, passing around the storied "Lookout Mountain," where the battle in the clouds was fought. I cannot pause to describe the beauty of the views as one descends the long valley, flanked on either side by mountains of bold outline, and watered by rivers and lesser streams.

The region recalls to memory the Tyrol and parts of the Scotch Highlands.

Arrived at Cowan, a little village with tall chimneys and a blast furnace, the traveller finds himself at the foot of the Sewanee Mountain, a spur of the great Cumberland range. There he is presently taken in tow by a powerful locomotive, which drags the luggage and passenger cars at the end of an interminable queue of coal and iron vans, at a grade of one hundred and twenty-five feet to the mile, right up to the top of the hill. This road is the property of a mining corporation, extending some twelve or fourteen miles, and constructed for the purpose of transporting coal and iron; it gives facilities to visitors to the University, who, after half an hour of tugging, puffing, and laborious ascent, find themselves at a substantial stone station, and actually within the precincts of this home of the arts, science and religion.

But where is the University? At first the traveller is puzzled; what appears is a somewhat thinly settled but not unattractive country village. It is situated on a plateau, many miles in extent, and so thickly wooded that he finds it hard to believe that he is on the summit of a mountain 2,100 feet above the level of the sea. At certain points only can a side-long view be had of the plains below; but the prospect, when attained, is simply magnificent. For the rest there is nothing to be seen but roads lined with shade-trees, and back from these are dwelling houses and cottages. There is also a hotel, which already three times enlarged, is still too small to accommodate the increasing number of visitors. After a while one comes to the buildings of the University, scattered along a semi-circle of half a mile, and including St. Augustine's chapel and its bell-tower, Forensic Hall, the Chemical and Philosophical Hall, St. Luke's Hall, and the Hodgson Library, besides several smaller halls erected by the literary societies for their meetings and exercises. Beyond St. Luke's Hall is a parade ground with a flag staff and two pieces of artillery, and still farther on is the broad Campus, surrounded by stately oaks, where the young men play base ball and hold their athletic exercises. The residences of the chancellor and vice-chancellor, the faculty, and several of the Southern bishops who make this beautiful place their summer home, the houses in which the students are lodged, as will be hereafter described, and the dwellings of other residents of the place, make up the rest of this unique settlement.

The University corporation hold in fee a portion of the plateau some eight miles in length by two in width, and containing about 10,000 acres. The soil is thin and porous; the rock is a sandstone cap over limestone; moisture sinks through it immediately; dampness and malaria are impossible. The water is deliciously cold, and so pure, that it is used in the laboratories, or for medical purposes, without distillation. The atmosphere is fresh and bracing; the timber is heavy and abundant; nothing can be imagined more delightful than the contrast between the intensely deep green of the trees and the equally intense blue of the sky, especially when the great white round-topped clouds come up in the summer noon. Storms here are grand and awful. The winter climate is cold; but winter is vacation time in the University, while, during the summer they are all hard at work in their lecture rooms. The title of the corporation to its domain is absolute; none of the land will ever be alienated in fee; the leases contain stringent provisions against nuisances; and not a liquor saloon, billiard saloon, or any similar place can be found within ten miles of the University.

The society at Sewanee is of that kind which attracts refined and cultured people who dislike noise, crowds, and feverish excitement. Among the permanent residents and habités, are representatives of some of the best and oldest families of the South. Bishop Green, Chancellor of the University, now in his 88th year, Bishop Quintard the Diocesan of Tennessee, Bishop Gregg of Texas, and Bishop Galleher of Louisiana, have houses here; others of the Southern bishops may be met here in the summer. Here also resides the widow of the former beloved Bishop of Georgia, and the mother of the present Bishop of Western Texas, Mrs. Elliott, a lady of the old school, surrounded by her family, and dividing with Bishop Green the homage of those who venerate the ripe and beautiful old age in Christ, and the memories of the past. The house of the Bishop of Tennessee is filled with memorials of men, places, and incidents connected with the work of his life; there may be seen portraits, letters, and autographs of English prelates, his friends; and in his private oratory are some windows filled with rare old glass which was brought across the sea from a ruined church in Sussex.

The doors of the house of the vice-chancellor, the Rev. Telfair Hodgson, D.D., stand open all day long. The University owes him a debt which it can never pay, for the unselfish labors of seven years, and for the thorough business capacity, the practical wisdom and good sense, and the marked ability, which he has placed at the disposal of the trustees, without salary, and for the love of God, man, and the Church. Of his accomplished and charming wife the most that could be said in praise would be too little; no one could adorn her position more gracefully, or perform more acceptably the duties which require an infinite measure of tact, discretion, and genuine kindness of heart.

And now let me give some account of the institution itself. The history was fully told by the vice-chancellor in his official report to the Convention of the Diocese of Tennessee, A. D. 1883, and documents may be obtained from him giving full particulars respecting the several schools, the professors, and the students. I shall not repeat these things, but will only observe that the time is short since the resumption of the work which was so rudely broken up by the storm of our civil war. What is now seen at Sewanee is the outcome of not more than ten years of recovered life; and memorable to relate, it has been done without one dollar of endowment, and with very little attention from the outside world. The men at Sewanee have worked there on small salaries or none; some have resisted the temptation of lucrative and important positions elsewhere. The history is one of self-sacrifice, zeal, and devotion. And verily they have their reward, and must surely see, hereafter, the fulfillment of all their desires. The wonder is how so much could have been accomplished in so short a time.

For it is a great system, well devised, and capable of immense expansion; one, moreover, which has peculiar features worthy of note by those who are interested in the problem of education. Let me try to convey a clear idea of it.

The supreme government is vested in a Board of Trustees, which now consists of the Bishops of North Carolina, East Carolina, Georgia, Florida, South Carolina, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, Louisiana, Texas, and the two missionary jurisdictions within the latter State, with clerical and lay deputies from each diocese. This board holds its annual meeting at Sewanee, at the time of Commencement, the session lasting about one week. It elects a hebdomadal council of seven members, including the vice-chancellor, to which is confided the care and discipline of the institution during the year. The chancellor is a titular officer, whose sole duty is to preside over the annual meeting of the board.

The system of education is as follows:

First, there is a grammar school. After passing through it, the boy enters the University, and becomes a "collegian."

The University consists of a large number of separate schools, each an entity in itself, and each arranged in a junior, intermediate, and senior department. In each separate school a student may attain, first, a certificate of proficiency, next a bachelor's, and finally a master's diploma, in that school only.

By pursuing studies in a prescribed number of these schools, and attaining the diploma of bachelor in them all, he becomes entitled to the Degree of Bachelor in Arts.

The highest attainable honor is the Master's Degree. This is given only to those who have taken all the attainable degrees in the several schools of Greek, Latin, the Modern Languages, English Literature, Mathematics, and the Evidences of Religion. Not more than two a year, on an average, get this degree.

There is no limitation of time in any course, nor need they be pursued together; a man may be junior in Greek, intermediate in Latin, and senior in Mathematics. Whenever he is ready in the work of any school, he goes up for his examination in that school.

On reaching the rank of senior, the collegian assumes the cap and gown, which are insignia of proficiency and success in passing the lower grades. The boys of the grammar school, and most of the junior collegians wear the gray uniform of West Point, and are subject to military drill. Lieut. Dowdy of the Seventeenth United States Infantry, is detailed as their instructor by the War Department. Evening dress parades occur several times a week, with gun-fire at sunset.

The Theological School, though constituting a part of the university system, is entirely distinct in rules, regulations, and government. The students wear the cap and gown with purple tassel, and the school is admirably accommodated in St. Luke's Hall, the finest and largest building at Sewanee. It was erected by the liberality of Mrs. Henry M. Manigault, a native of South Carolina, now residing in England, who has also given a set of altar vessels inlaid with precious stones, many books for the library, and stoles, altar-cloths, etc., for the chapel. St. Luke's Hall is four stories high, built of stone, and thoroughly well provided for its purposes. It has a little chapel of its own, lecture-rooms, apartments for the vice-chancellor, and rooms for the students, compared to which those in our General Theological Seminary are mere dens. The meetings of the board are held in this building. We have already in the Church some thirty-five clergymen who have been students at Sewanee, of whom about one-third are alumni of St. Luke's Hall, and this although the building was not opened until 1878. Who can doubt the prospective value of Sewanee to the Church?

No one can help being struck by the gentlemanly manners and good behavior of the students; the exceptions to the rule are few. This is no doubt the result of the peculiar system of lodging them. They are divided, grammar scholars and collegians alike, into small groups or "messes" of from twelve to twenty; each section is accommodated in a separate house. The houses thus occupied are presided over by gentlemen of culture and refinement, amongst whom are ladies of the best Southern families. The house is, substantially, the private residence of a lady, and the collegians are her guests. Probably it would have been impossible to carry out such a scheme but for the social conditions produced by the war, the destruction of private fortunes and the necessities which were the consequence. But the result is wonderful. In each house resides a proctor, whose duty it is to take note of any disorder or misconduct. The lady at the head of the establishment has nothing to do with that. She never addresses a word of reproof or rebuke to any one of her inmates; the proctor has to see to their manners and behavior. Outside, and having general jurisdiction, are other proctors, who report to the vice-chancellor if necessary. It is said that if any boy is found to be vicious and bad, and likely to "corrupt other," he soon disappears from the scene, being quietly dismissed as unfit to associate with gentlemen. Certain it is that I have never seen anywhere so orderly and well behaved a body of young men.

The influence of the services in St. Augustine's chapel is felt throughout the place. Daily services are held there; about one-fourth of the seats are occupied by the members of the University; the remainder are always well filled, and the building is often crowded. The services are very reverently performed, with the aid of a surpliced choir. On Sunday, August 2d, at the 8 A.M. celebration, about one hundred and fifty persons communed, fifty of whom were collegians. Close by the chapel is a tower; the bell rings at intervals, all day long, directing the movements of the community, like the bugles in a garrison, or the forecable bell aboard ship.

The work done here is thorough. I was present at the examination of a candidate for the Greek prize. It was conducted by Professor Wiggins, an alumnus of the University, and continued some two hours, reflecting great honor on teacher and scholar alike. The subject was the "Odes of Pindar." The text used was that of Professor Gildersleeve, of Johns Hopkins University, who gave a course of lectures at Sewanee last year, and whom it is hoped to secure as a permanent summer lecturer. The Latin prize examination was on the Andria of Terence, and also on the whole range of Latin poetry and philology, with everything bearing on the subject. I have never witnessed more searching or more remarkable examinations.

St. Luke's Hall is the centre of an important missionary work in the neighborhood of the University. Some miles away there is a rude population known as "Corvites," and classed by the students with other heathen folk, as the "Amcrites, Hivites, Hittites and Corvites." They are so called from their inhabiting caves or recesses at the foot of the mountain where it dies into the plain. Years ago they lived in utter irreligion, and were noted for the illegal manufacture of whiskey—a kind of Tennessee "moonshiners." When missionary efforts were directed towards these people by the zealous students of theology they resisted with disgust, and finally attempted to kill one of the young men on his way back from a meeting in their domain. But here as elsewhere patience and faith have had their perfect work. A nice little chapel has been built for them, there is a Sunday-school of ninety children, and fourteen were recently confirmed by Bishop Quintard.

It is time to say something about the exercises of Commencement Week. These began on Thursday, July 30th, and ended on Thursday, August 6th. On the opening day service was held in St. Augustine's chapel, at 11 A.M. On that and the two following days there were contests in declamation between the two literary societies, and similar contests between individuals of the several departments, athletic sports, a parade, and anniversaries of the societies. On Sunday, August 2d, after an early celebration at 8 A.M., divine service was held at 11, and the commencement sermon was preached before a congregation which filled every part of the building. On Wednesday Bishop Dudley, of the Diocese of Kentucky, delivered a brilliant oration, taking the place of the Hon. Proctor Knott, Governor of Kentucky, who was kept at home by a dangerous outbreak in some of the counties of his State, which had assumed a very threatening character. In the evening an address was delivered by Col. Arthur S. Colyar, of Tennessee, a most original and entertaining speaker, who kept the audience convulsed with laughter during great part of his allotted time. The alumni enjoyed their annual banquet and reunion at the close of the exercises, which included an essay by the Rev. Stewart McQueen, rector of Selma, Alabama, one of the first graduates of St. Luke's Hall.

As to the proceedings on Commencement Day: the weather was perfect, and the scene a most impressive one. The procession, headed by the Cadet Corps in uniform, and including the surpliced choir and vested clergy, moved slowly round the chapel to the front door, singing the hymn: "Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord God Almighty."

The melody was sustained by a cornet-player in the choir. The chancellor and vice-chancellor appeared in their rich and brilliant robes of office; most of the clergy wore the biretta or "Canterbury cap"; the bishops and many of the priests had on the hoods of their degrees. The service was short and spirited. Among the interesting incidents of the day was the delivery of the medals for Greek and Latin. In presenting the former to the successful contestant, Bishop Dudley took occasion to speak, with great vigor and spirit, in denunciation of the modern assault on classical studies and the Greek language, claiming for those studies, and particularly for that of the Greek, the highest value and importance, while the Rev. Davis Sessoms of Memphis, in presenting the Latin medal, ably seconded the bishop, and asserted the intention of the University—of which he is one of the most accomplished alumni—to maintain her position as defender and zealous promoter of classical learning. A reception and lunch at Dr. Hodgson's house followed on the closing of the commencement exercises. The lads, acting as a light artillery corps, fired a salute of thirteen guns, and a ball concluded the proceedings of the week, to the great dejection of the young people, who kept it up till half-past-four of the following morning.

I wish to add a few words by way of conclusion. First, then, Churchmen ought to know what a work is in progress on Sewanee Mountain. Secondly, they should lay it to heart that this has been accomplished without one dollar by way of endowment, and that it could not have been done at all but for the devotion and self-sacrifice of a rare body of men and women. It is all but incredible that so much has been accomplished in little more than ten years.

But, thirdly, the Church ought to know the wants of this University. It does not, indeed, come before the country or the members of our communion in forma pauperis, begging for help. But there is no reason why people should not know that needs are pressing, and that the opportunity is a golden one. Of the buildings, two only, St. Luke's Hall and the Hodgson Library (the latter the gift of the vice-chancellor) are of stone; a third is part of stone and part of iron; the rest, including St. Augustine's chapel, are wooden structures. The chapel has grown and spread over the ground like a melon-vine. The shingles on its roof denote, by their varied degrees of freshness, the successive stages of enlargement. There is need of a stone church to contain at least 1,000 persons, of other halls of substantial material, and especially of endowed professorships. Here is such a foundation as was rarely laid. Why should rich men, with hearts full of loving thoughts and minds inspired by lofty projects, overlook such a work as this? Why should one of our wealthy and honored citizens of New York have recently given $500,000 to a Methodist college in the State of Tennessee, passing by this vigorous child of the household of his own faith?

There is no such work as failure for Sewanee. But there ought to be no such words as long waiting and hope deferred. No doubt the beginnings of most of our great institutions were small and their growth was slow; yet, considering the wealth and influence of our Church, there is no reason why we should not do better by this grand enterprise. Ultimate success seems to be certain. On the day of Commencement two pieces of good news were in circulation: that the Diocese of Kentucky was about to join the rest and send its representatives to the board, and that there were already sixty new applicants for matriculation. Every sign is favorable. What next is to be desired, but that some of our wealthy and liberal citizens, South or North, seeing the opportunity and realizing the promise of this day, will come up and lay on this mountain altar worthy offerings to the glory of God, and for the good of the rising generation? The influence of Sewanee is already felt through every Southern diocese, and, by reflex, in the North. There seems no limit to the good that might be done with ample appliances and means; and I cannot but believe that the men and women are now living and known to God, who will give what is required to push on the work, and thus advance the cause of sound education, thorough culture, righteousness and true godliness, throughout our borders.

MORGAN DIX.

S. BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY; OR, THE STORY OF THE NON-CONFORMISTS.

On S. Bartholomew's Day, in 1662, more than a thousand ministers gave up their livings and went out from the Church. Whatever we may think of the merits of the case, it was a brave act, and the descendants of these men may well be proud of such a proof of their fidelity to principle. It was neither the first nor the last time that Englishmen have been ready to make similar sacrifices for conscience sake. The loyal clergy, in the civil war, in rejecting the Solemn League and Covenant, and the Nonjurors in refusing to take the oaths to William and Mary, did the same. All must have their due. Loyalist and Puritan, Non-conformist and Nonjuror, were alike staunch and true men. They differed greatly from each other, but they were alike in the strength of their convictions and in the courage to stick to them to the bitter end.

But while all can agree in honoring such men for their honesty and courage, there will be wide difference of opinion as to the merits of the cause for which they suffered. Especially is this true of the Non-conformists. The English dissenter is never weary of sounding their praises. In his eyes they are "the noble army of martyrs," and the day of their expulsion is "the saddest day for all England since the death of Edward the Sixth." Such exaggerated language as this provokes a smile when we hear it on the platform or find it in the pages of those who love to stir up the dying ashes of party feeling. Unfortunately it is not confined to such places. It finds its way into what professes to be history and passes itself off as a calm, judicial judgment of the past.

Notably is this the case in the work which stands to-day first among the popular histories of England. "Green's Short History" is perhaps the best epitome we have. It is hard to say too much in its favor. In its choice of material, in its clear flowing English, and in its power of holding the interest, it stands far before all others. Freeman justly calls it "a book of astonishing knowledge, insight, and power of writing;" but with equal justice he adds, "a book which abounds in errors, errors which one is amazed to find." Nowhere are these errors so gross and so numerous as in the account of this fatal S. Bartholomew's Day. His whole account of the Puritan movement is a highly colored sketch taken from the Puritan standpoint. The laws of proportion have been utterly disregarded by the artist, and the figures of the Puritans tower like giants above their opponents. Yet this passes as history, and is the picture of the past most likely to come before the eyes of our young people.

Take the picture in its best light and it is a sad one. No Churchman can take pride in recalling it. The mere fact that so many Christian men felt compelled to go out of the Church is enough to sadden any one who longs for the unity of Christ's Church. Still more sad must be the thought that a more kindly spirit and a broader Christian charity would have prevented all this, closed the breach, and kept these men within the fold. But in Green's account the fault is all on one side. The Church has to bear all the blame. Worst of all, the very facts in the case are strangely misrepresented.

In the first place, the number of the sufferers is greatly exaggerated. Green says: "Nearly two thousand rectors and vicars, or about a fifth of the English clergy, were driven from their positions as Non-conformists. No such sweeping change in the religious aspect of the Church had ever been seen before." (Short Hist., p. 607.) Now, this number is nearly twice too large. True, Hume, Hallam, and Macaulay give the same estimate; but they have all followed Baxter. Now he included in his list schoolmasters and students, as well as all those removed many months earlier to make room for the loyal clergy on their return. This fact is conceded frankly by Stoughton. He puts this last class alone at six hundred, and this is probably a low estimate. The Act of Uniformity did not drive these men out of place, for the act was not yet written. There was no question even as to their views. The point at issue was a very different one. These six hundred held places belonging of right to men who had been ousted from their twenty years before. From their hiding places these men came forward and claimed their own again. For all these years they had been deprived of glebe and parsonage for being faithful to Church and king, and now in their old age they claimed their former homes. Even the most bitter partisan cannot deny the justice of such a claim. Stoughton, the latest authority on the Non-conformist side, after deducting all these, says: "The number of those who were deprived on that day would amount to about 1,200. I do not see how more than that number could have been displaced. I am induced to believe there were scarcely so many." (Stoughton Hist. of Restoration—Note.) Blunt, in his history, puts the figures still lower, and claims that the number cannot have exceeded 800. Yet many of these, like Tillotson, afterward conformed, and were ordained.

Yet, even if Green's exaggerated estimate were correct, it would be far less than the number driven out twenty years before by the "Solemn League and Covenant." All the authorities admit this. Macaulay says: "The dominant party exultingly reminded the sufferers that the Long Parliament had turned out a still greater number of royalist divines. The reproach was but too well founded." (Mac. Hist. of Eng., vol. 1. p. 142.) Stoughton makes every effort to reduce the number as low as possible, and puts it between 2,000 and 2,500. Walker and Southey, on the other hand, claim that at least 7,000 were driven out, while White, one of the Parliament commission, boasted in his book, published in 1643, that he had had a hand in driving out 8,000. (Lathbury Hist. of P. B., p. 201.) Amid such conflicting statements, it is impossible to reach any positive result; but there can be no doubt that the change thus wrought was a far more sweeping one than that made by the Act of Uniformity.

Yet while our historian sheds so many tears over the sufferings of the Non-conformists, he has not one for those earlier sufferers. As far as he can, he ignores their hard fate and bitter wrestlings with poverty during those long twenty years. When at last he refers to them in telling the story of S. Bartholomew's Day, he has not a word of sympathy for them. Nay more, he does all he can to slight and defame them. "The parsons expelled," he tells us, "were expelled as Royalists or as unfitted for their office by idleness or vice, or inability to preach" (p. 607). There is no excuse for such language as this. Even Macaulay, in spite of his bias against Church and king, can hardly restrain his honest indignation as he recalls those dark days which Green describes as so fair and lovely. "The Puritans in the day of their power had undoubtedly given cruel provocation. They interdicted under heavy penalties the use of the Book of Common Prayer not only in churches, but even in private houses. It was a crime in a child to read by the bedside of a sick parent one of those beautiful collects which have soothed the grief of forty generations of Christians. Clergymen of respectable character were not only ejected from their benefices by thousands, but were frequently exposed to the outrages of a fanatical rabble." (Mac. I. pp. 130-131). Hallam, whose bias is still more decided, admits that most of these men were driven out "for refusing the covenant and for no moral offence," and that many among them were "the most distinguished by their learning and virtue in that age." (Hallam Constitutional History II. 163-164). Their names are enough to prove this. Among them we find Hammond, Chillingworth, Sanderson, Bishop Hall, Pococks, Pearson, Cosin, Frideaux and Jeremy Taylor, a galaxy of divines of which any age might well be proud. These were giants in those days. Yet no pains were lost to blacken their fair names. The commission invited anonymous charges from every quarter. No trial was had, but the accused was thrust out as "a scandalous minister." It would have been strange if among ten thousand parish ministers there had been no black sheep, but most were driven out, to be remembered, "for no moral offence." To wear a surplice or to bow at the name of Jesus was enough to make one "a scandalous minister." At a later date the covenant simplified matters, and the mere refusal to sign that pledge "to expropriate prelacy" sealed the doom of thousands.

Many of these sunk under their sufferings. Old age and poverty soon thinned their ranks, and when the restoration came only nine of the bishops were left. Some after being deprived were allowed to return or to take other positions. Isaac Walton tells how strangely Sanderson regained his place. Selden's influence restored Pockock to his chair at Oxford. Pearson was deprived of his prebend, but suffered afterwards to minister at the little church of St. Clement's, Eastcheap, where he wrote and preached that course of sermons on the Creed, so well known to every student. Jeremy Taylor taught a little school in the mountains of Wales.

To go back to St. Bartholomew's Day. Most of our popular histories agree in representing the Non-conformists as throwing up their positions because the Act of Uniformity imposed some new test, unheard of before, and required them to do what as honest men they could not do. This is only partially true. The Act of Uniformity required every clergyman to give his loyal assent to the Prayer Book, and if he had not received episcopal ordination, to be so ordained. On these conditions the Puritans and Presbyterians might keep all they had. How much that was, Green can tell us. "The bulk of the great livings throughout the country were in their hands. They stood at the head of the London clergy. They occupied the higher posts at the two universities." This was not due simply to their learning and ability, though this is the inference we are expected to draw. For twenty years they had had full swing, and they had profited by it. The well endowed London rectory, and the comfortable chair at the university had been given of course to men of their own party. This had been done irregularly, in most cases, during this long interregnum, and it is hard to see on what pretext they could expect to hold such posts, unless they were now willing to comply with the law. Remember, "Episcopacy and the Liturgy had never been abolished by law." (Macaulay History I., p. 128.) All the legislation on these points by the Long Parliament was imperfect, and in the eyes of the law null and void. The Act of Uniformity only put things back in their place. As Hume states it. "This bill reinstated the Church in the same condition in which it stood before the commencement of the civil wars." (Hume VI., 21.)

Yet this act is denounced as a fresh proof of the narrowness and intolerance of the Church. "For the first time since the Reformation, all orders save those conferred by the hands of bishops were legally disallowed." (Green, p. 606.) The same charge is made by Hallam and Macaulay, and repeated on every side. It seems to rest entirely on one of good Bishop Burnet's loose statements. In his history of his own time, he says: "Those who came to England from the foreign churches had not been required to be ordained among us; but now, all that had not episcopal ordination, were made incapable of holding any ecclesiastical benefice." (Vol. I., p. 322.) Observe his words refer only to those ordained abroad. Moreover, he gives not even a single instance to sustain his assertion. Individual bishops may have winked at such irregularities, but the instances usually cited are hardly to the point. Bucer and Martyr were welcomed to England; but the places they were given, were chairs at the universities, and Martyr at least had received Holy Orders. Moreover, even laymen like Casaubon, were allowed to hold ecclesiastical positions, though they exercised no spiritual functions. Whatever may have been the practice, there can be no question as to the law. The Preface to the Orinal is very clear and emphatic. Now that was written by Cranmer's own hand, and stands to-day with no substantial change. Dr. Drumm in his learned work, Vox Ecclesiae, has gone into this question very thoroughly. Calamy is however an unexceptionable witness. His words are "By divine appointment, and from the days of the Apostles with me is all one." "The whole Book of Ordination is bottomed on that supposition as its foundation. If there were those such orders from the days of the Apostles, they must be by divine appointment." (Lathbury History of P. B., p. 573.)

The question of ordination presented no real difficulty to Baxter and others, for they had received episcopal ordination. The pledge of conformity to the Prayer Book was where the shoe pinched. For years they had denounced that book as the accursed thing. When asked at the Savoy Conference to point out the particular changes they wished to have made, they handed in a long list of places which they condemned as absolutely sinful. It is sometimes said that a very few changes would have satisfied these men, but this is highly improbable. It was really a question as to Prayer Book or no Prayer Book. If the Churchman was stiff and rigid and unwilling to bend, the Presbyterian was captious and obstinate. Neither was willing to make large concessions. One must read the history of that time to understand the temper of both parties. Liberty of conscience is a plant of very slow growth, and the day for broader views and a more catholic spirit is not yet here.

While then the story of St. Bartholomew's Day is very sad, yet it is a story for which both parties must bear the blame. There was much to excuse the mutual bitterness. The House of Commons was made up of country squires, "more zealous for royalty than the king, more zealous for episcopacy than the bishops." There were old injuries they found it hard to forget. At home the churchier woodwork and blackened walls of the hall reminded them of the day when the enemy fought with them hand to hand. At church the shattered stained glass and the broken altar brought back the time when ribald soldiers lighted their bonfires with the Prayer Book and stabled their horses in the chancel. Such things made men hard and bitter, and anxious to wipe out old scores. On the other hand, the Puritan had been for twenty years a law unto himself, and was not disposed, without a struggle, to submit to restraints which he had looked upon as things of the past, and to bishops whose tender mercies had been at times somewhat cruel. In their fault-finding mood, as Taylor quaintly puts it, "They thought it a greater sin to stand in a clean white garment than in separation from the Church." Let us hope that the time is not far distant when an historian will be found to do full justice to both Cavalier and Roundhead, Non-conformist and Churchman. Meanwhile let us try to avoid the errors of both, and to exercise a broader charity for all whose ways are not as our ways.

THOMAS R. HARRIS.

ENGLAND.

THE BISHOPRIC OF SALISBURY.—The bishopric of Salisbury has been offered to the Rev. John Wordsworth, a nephew of the late Poet Laureate.

The Rev. John Wordsworth was ordained Deacon in 1867 by the Bishop of Oxford (Dr. Wilberforce), and priest in 1869 by the same prelate. He is Oriel Professor of the Interpretation of Holy Scripture at Oxford, and, in virtue of this professorship, Canon of Rochester. He is Fellow of Brasenose College, Oxford, and chaplain of that institution. Under his relative, the late Bishop Wordsworth, he was examining chaplain to the Bishop of Lincoln.

DEATH OF THE REV. C. R. CONYBEARE.—The Rev. Charles R. Conybeare died at the rectory of Ichenestoke, Hants, on Monday, July 20th, after a few hours' illness.

THE REVISED AMERICAN PRAYER BOOK.—The Church Times has begun the publication of a series of articles on the Revised American Prayer Book, which it proposes to continue for several weeks. "The judgment," it says, "that must be pronounced on the work as a whole, is precisely that which has been passed on the Revised New Testament, that there are, doubtless, some few changes for the better, . . . but that the set-off in the way of petty and meddlesome changes for the worse . . . has so entirely outweighed the merits of this work that it cannot possibly be adopted by the Church, and must be dismissed, as a dismal fiasco, to be dealt with anew in some more adequate fashion. . . . It falls so very far short of what might fairly have been expected, its faults of omission and commission are so serious, that it would be a grave calamity to the American Church were it adopted as its stands."

THE BISHOP OF TRURO AND CHURCH DEFENCE.—The Bishop of Truro speaking recently at a dinner at Kilkhampton, said that after the need of the Church for the continual outpouring of the Holy Spirit, she required next to be let alone. He wished they could convince the Non-conformists what havoc would ensue by drawing Churchmen from their proper spiritual duties to fight for the defence of the Church. What could he (the bishop) do, if the next twenty years of his life were spent on Church defence committees, and his time and attention distracted from his spiritual work? It was impossible to improve the Church by destroying her.

IRELAND.

THE CHURCH OF IRELAND AND THE GOVERNMENT.—The Archbishop of Dublin and a deputation of the Standing Committee of the Church of Ireland, called on the new Lord Lieutenant, on Monday, July 27th, to present an address of welcome. The primate, the venerable Archbishop of Armagh, could not be present, owing to age and infirmity, but sent a letter, and the address was read by the Archbishop of Dublin. It was noticed that the Lord Lieutenant, in his reply, carefully avoided the use of the name of the Church, and always spoke of it as "the Church," or "your Church." It is announced that the decision has been come to by the government to refuse the title "Church of Ireland" to the Church, and in official documents to designate it as "The Protestant Episcopal Church of Ireland." That this trucking to the Romanists will really be of any advantage to the new government in Ireland, is not believed, and it cannot deprive the Irish Church of its designation, which it has borne since there was a Church in Ireland. The only present effect is to dissatisfy the Churchmen, who are not disposed to submit, and are not the contemptible handful that they are generally considered. The Archbishop of Dublin, on Wednesday, July 29th, made a speech at Bray, in which he spoke forcibly on this subject of the Church's title, and what it involved. "It would be admitted," he thought, by "every student of history, whatever his position might be, that there existed for seven hundred years after the advent of St. Patrick on these shores a national independent Church in Ireland, which was not in any way subject to the authority of Rome. It would also be admitted by all, that the Church was an Episcopal Church. He asked this simple question—was there any other body of Christians in Ireland, calling themselves a Church, that could claim at the present time to be at the same time free from any allegiance to Rome, and form an Episcopal Church? Therefore for that reason he claimed they were still abiding by their former designation, their old designation of the Church of Ireland. Again, it was admitted by all, he thought, whatever their views on the subject of episcopacy might be, that the bishops of the Irish Church are those who by direct lineage are descended from the bishops of the ancient Church of Ireland. He did not enter into any question as regards the grounds of what is called the apostolic succession. He spoke now of the historical continuity, and he asserted that as a matter of historical continuity it could not be denied that the bishops of our Church are descended by direct lineage from the ancient, independent bishops of the Church of Ireland. He believed it was the duty of every Churchman belonging to the Anglican communion to call them by that title. They must not allow it to be thought for a moment that their claim to the title of Church of Ireland depended on what the State may say or how the State regarded them."

The Clerical Society of Meath, on Tuesday, July 28th, adopted a resolution approving the act of the General Synod, and stating, "That on the ground of the succession, orders, and identity of doctrine, this Church maintains its inalienable right to the title it has hitherto borne, by which it has been designated in successive Acts of Parliament, and confirmed by the order of its incorporation.

It is a general feeling among the Irish Churchmen that they will insist on an uncompromising use of their old title, and the recognition of no other.

EGYPT.

THE GORDON COLLEGE.—The Bishop of Carlisle has written the following letter to the London Times:

"In the year 1883 a number of English Churchmen, deeply impressed by the sense of the responsibility cast upon this Church and kingdom by English ascendancy in Egypt, founded an association, with the sanction of the Archbishop of Canterbury and of many of the bishops, for the 'furtherance of Christianity in Egypt.'

"The association has since its foundation been quietly and unobtrusively at work, making inquiry and carrying on communications with the ecclesiastical authorities in Egypt, with a view to ascertain what kind of effort could be most hopefully made for advancing the work which it was proposed to undertake.

"The result of their investigations was to convince the association that the Christian future of Egypt is closely bound up with the life and efficiency of the Coptic, or native Egyptian Church. This Church, owing to external isolation, internal dissension, and Mohammedan oppression, is in a condition of extreme weakness and inefficiency. Its chief need, and one without which all other help may be regarded as useless, is that of a priesthood sufficiently taught and trained, both in theological and secular knowledge, to lead the people and to meet their spiritual wants. But the attempt to supply this need is one which must be made with much caution and delicacy; it is possible that kindly-meant efforts may have the result of increasing the difficulties and consequent weakness of the Coptic Church by stirring up within it jealousy and disloyalty, and by producing a feeling of distrust which must necessarily paralyze all attempts at friendly co-operation. At the same time it is vain to expect that any efforts in the direction of improving the education and consequent status of the priesthood should emanate from the Coptic Church itself; its depression is too great to render such efforts probable or even possible. Help must come from without, if it comes at all; and the help must be wisely and lovingly administered. On whom does the duty of supplying such help rest more clearly and more weightily than upon the Christian people of England?"

"In these circumstances it has been determined, with God's help, to establish in Cairo a high-class resident school for boys, in which an excellent secular education, together with careful religious and moral training, will be given. It is proposed that the school shall be open to all—both Christians and Mohammedans; it is believed, however, that it will be the Copts who will chiefly take advantage of it, and as the Coptic priests are selected from the general body of young laymen, without special preparation, it is pretty clear that the result of the school, if it succeeds, will be that improvement of the Coptic priesthood which the association have chiefly at heart. It is thought necessary that, though a distinctly Christian school, it should be open to all who wish to use it; and it need hardly be said that no unfair attempts will be made to proselytize.

"The above is a sufficient description of the scheme which has commended itself to the association as the best for Egypt of which existing circumstances admit. It is in no sense a humble scheme, but it is very practical, it does not involve any prodigious outlay, it is one which can be carefully watched by its supporters, and, moreover, it is one which can scarcely fail to be a blessing to Egypt, whether it realizes the hopes of the association or not. I have only to add that in considering what name they should give to their institution one name and one only suggested itself. What name should that be? but Gordon! Let it be distinctly understood that the association do not wish to use this name merely as one to conjure by; they proposed their scheme as one which they believe to be for the benefit of Egypt—call it by what name you please; but as they need a name for their institution they thankfully and with reverence adopt one which will be honored through the ages both in Egypt and throughout the civilized world.

"I commend the proposed 'Gordon College' to the judgment and the Christian feeling and love of Englishmen."

NEW YORK.

NEW YORK.—St. Andrew's Cottage.—The Rev. J. O. S. Huntington, Superior of the Order of the Holy Cross, has addressed the following letter to the Evening Post, of this city:

"Sir: Last spring you very kindly noticed our plan of a trade-school for poor boys at St. Andrew's Cottage, Farmingdale. The plan has been put to the test this summer with marked success. We have received nearly one hundred boys already this year, and a number of them have been at the cottage for two or three months. The way in which some of them have dropped their city ways and talk and become healthy and happy country lads, is as remarkable as it is encouraging. We write now to ask your readers to send us $300 or $3000 to enable us to carry through the work of this summer. We want to keep the cottage open until cold weather. The expenses this year have been necessarily large. We have had to buy stock, tools and fodder, and have not yet had an opportunity of realizing much out of the ground. It will be our first failure if we are obliged to close the cottage prematurely, but we do not think we shall be forced to do this. The very generous response of the public to our printed appeal last spring encourages us to hope that we shall not be left without the little help that we still need. We shall be glad to acknowledge any gifts in your columns, if you will kindly allow us so to do."

NEW YORK.—St. Mark's Chapel.—This chapel, in charge of the Rev. J. E. Johnson, is doing some excellent summer work, more especially in the interest of the older boys and the young women connected with the parish. As a rule, this class of persons are not wanted at the summer homes, and yet their exacting toil winter and summer makes a little respite most needed and most welcome. In some cases persons of this class or their families are so poor that they cannot afford to be absent in the country even for a week, though the visit costs them nothing.

The home to which the parties are taken is about three miles from Morristown, New Jersey. The place, which consists of a farm of about five acres, together with a large farm house, was put at the service of the Mission by the Van Buren family, connected with St. Mark's church. To this place it is the custom of Mr. Johnson, having made up a party of about forty persons, to take them on Saturday, bringing them back at the end of the following week and taking out others. Mr. Johnson, who also officiates at the chapel on Sundays, superintends the work, sometimes staying at the home through the week and looking after the welfare of the visitors. They spend the week in rambling about the fields and woods, gathering flowers and berries, etc. Some of them have never seen the country before, and the enjoyment, as also the benefit of their visit, is found to be very great. The cost of carrying on the work is about $100 a week, this sum being largely provided for by St. Mark's.

This church is closed for the summer, and will not be reopened until October. In the meantime the church will be repainted and upholstered, etc., while a painting will be placed over the chancel. The work will cost between $8,000 and $9,000.

NEW YORK.—House of the Holy Comforter.—The House of the Holy Comforter, the Free Church Home for Incurables, at No. 18 East Eleventh street, which was founded as a work of faith by the late Sister Louise, is now without funds to continue its work. It has no endowment, and if speedy help is not received from the public, the hospital must be closed. The institution is under the care of the Sisters of St. John Baptist. Its inmates number, on the average thirty-six helpless women and children, who, as they are suffering from incurable diseases, cannot be received into other homes for the poor.

This institution's work is not by any means obtrusive, but it is effective, and it is to be trusted that the good work so quietly carried on, with such good results, will not be allowed to languish or die for want of support.

NEW ROCHELLE.—The Huguenot Society.—This association, formed of the descendants of Huguenots, will hold its first summer meeting on Monday, August 24th, the anniversary of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew's. New Rochelle has been chosen as founded mainly, if not entirely, by fugitives from La Rochelle, and therefore emphasizing the historical associations with the early Huguenots. The morning meeting will be held in Trinity church (the Rev. C. F. Canedy, rector,) where appropriate services will be held, and an address of welcome from the descendants of the Huguenots and other citizens of New Rochelle will be made. Excursions will then be made to points of interest, especially Davenport's Neck on Long Island Sound, where the Huguenots first landed.

In the afternoon a meeting will be held, the president, the Hon. John Jay, presiding. A paper will be read by the Rev. Dr. C. E. Lindsay on "The Huguenot Settlement of New Rochelle," and one by C. M. Du Puy, Esq., on "St. Bartholomew's Day: Its Causes and Results."

SOUTH MIDDLETOWN—Grace Church.—This parish (the Rev. William McGlathery, rector,) has been steadily making improvements both in its church edifice and in its services. The church was recently remodelled and fitted up handsomely. A surplised choir of thirty chorists made its first appearance on Saturday, August 8th, at a memorial service for the late General Grant. The Burial Office, set to music by the choir-master, Prof. J. J. Miller, was sung. The rector made an eloquent address, which was attentively listened to by about one hundred members of the General Nathaniel Lyon Post, G. A. R., who attended the service in a body.

LONG ISLAND.

BROOKLYN—St. Mary's Church.—In connection with the recent commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the ordination of the rector of this parish, the Rev. Dr. D. V. M. Johnson, the Rev. W. C. Hubbard, rector of St. Paul's church, Brooklyn, paid the following tribute to his venerable brother: "There are many quiet lives, not blazoned abroad by ostentatious parade or swung aloft upon the wings of popular favor, but which, nevertheless, have shone brightly in the community which has known them and called them its own. One of these more retired lives is waning in your midst, my dear friends of St. Mary's parish. A life—in one short week to write after it—a half century of work for the Master! And what a wealth of meaning is summed up in that fact—fifty years an ambassador of Christ. And such an ambassador! Where can you find a more spotless record, where point to a more saintly service, where stand so worthily your generous and grateful praise? Almost two-thirds of this beautiful pilgrimage has been passed in your service. From the day of small things into the present harvest of great and glorious deeds for Christ a man of God has walked in and out among you, with willing feet, with outstretched hands, with loving speech, to guide, to greet, and to bless. In times of tribulation what comfort came from him to you! In times of prosperity what rejoicing with you! As a preacher, what earnest, holy, God-given truths have been uttered within your hearing! As a shepherd, what anxious care, what devoted solicitude have been unceasingly and unwearyingly lavished upon you! As a priest, how can I hope to express even in the faintest testimony to his holy zeal! Let the children who have been baptized at yonder font, let the host of confederates who have knelt before this altar, let the prayers of faith sent up to God from the side of the sick-bed, let the memory of your holy dead draw aside the veil which obscures the past, and let memory take you by the hand and lead you through the years that have been hallowed by his blessed work in St. Mary's."

In a letter written for the same occasion, conveying his congratulations, the bishop of the diocese said: "How few in this sacred office, at the end of half a century of active and devoted service, have been preserved in such vigor of body and mind as you have. How few, whatever their term of service, have such a record of ministerial work. For twenty-five years, seventeen of them in the episcopate, I have had personal knowledge of your labors, and shepherding the sheep of Christ's fold, and during all that time I have known no one more faithful and devoted to a lofty ideal of 'the ministry of reconciliation.' Strong and earnest in the pulpit, and with an admirable method of liturgical ministrations, you have been preeminent in the gifts and graces always regarded as of foremost importance in the cure of souls. Christ's poor you have always had with you, and these you have never neglected. Christ's sick, and needy in soul and body, have always fallen under your pastorate in a singularly large proportion—to these how constant, how faithful, and loving you have been. What a multitude have you baptized; what companies of souls have you presented to your bishop for confirmation—in all, some 850 during my episcopate; what vastly greater companies have you fed with the bread of life and instructed in the riches of the word."

By the wide circle of Christian people who have known and appreciated the successful labors of Dr. Johnson, these tributes will be accepted as eminently fitting.

WESTERN NEW YORK.

THE CHURCH IN ALLEGANY COUNTY.—In Allegany County there are six parishes, Angelica, Wellsville, Belvidere, Belmont, Cuba, and Canaseraga. All of these are now without rectors, perhaps with the exception of Belmont, where the Rev. Mr. Scofield gives them a service once each Sunday. The Rev. Mr. Warner, after a faithful rectorship of several years, has been compelled to resign Angelica for the want of adequate support. During his rectorship the parish has been much strengthened, and the church building repaired in a churchly manner. The parish at Wellsville, by a most unfortunate debt upon the parish, lost their neat little church, which is now used as a meat market. For a few years past they have had such occasional services as could be given them by the rectors of neighboring parishes. Belvidere is rather a mission than a parish. During the short rectorship of the Rev. Mr. De Mille, at Belmont, he gave them occasional services. Mr. De Mille was compelled to leave Belmont for the want of suitable support, although much beloved by the people, and during his short rectorship a good work was done there, a rectory was bought and paid for; but as the parish received no assistance from the Diocesan Board of Missions, it was unable to pay a supporting salary to a resident clergyman. On account of failing health, the Rev. Mr. Goodhue was compelled to resign Cuba after a rectorship of three years. The parish has received the fostering aid of the Board of Diocesan Missions, and hence has been more fortunate than some of its neighbors. A heavy mortgage debt on their church building and a floating debt of several hundred dollars have been discharged during the rectorship of the Rev. Mr. Goodhue, and he leaves them united and already looking for another pastor. Canaseraga met with a severe loss in the death of their beloved rector, the Rev. Mr. Teller, who, as long as any strength was spared to him, wisely and faithfully cared for the interests of this parish. This leaves the Church field in Allegany county without any pastoral care from any resident clergyman—a most lamentable state of things in so important a field, a county that is rapidly increasing in population and wealth.

The small parishes in this county are constantly sending out families from their number to our cities to add strength and numbers to parishes already strong and large. This depletion of these parishes keeps them weak and depressed, but still of great importance as feeders to our city parishes.

There are also in the same county several places of importance where hopeful mission work has been done, especially in the "oil region" of Richburg and Bolivar; indeed, the whole county is still a missionary field, but there is a good hope that in the not remote future the parishes in Cuba, Belmont, Angelica, and Canaseraga will become self-supporting and independent parishes, though for a time they may need the fostering care of the Diocesan Board of Missions.—Church Calendar.

NEW JERSEY.

OCEAN BEACH—Church of the Holy Apostles.—This beach parish, of which the Rev. W. A. Newbold has the temporary charge, is prospering during the present season. The Sunday congregations are large and intelligent, and indicate that not all the Church people visiting the sea side are neglectful of their Church privileges. In addition to the regular morning service on Sunday, there is also a children's service in the afternoon, followed by the evening service. The Holy Eucharist is celebrated on the first Sunday of the month, and there is always a good attendance. On Sunday, August 2d, the services were conducted by the minister in charge, assisted by the Rev. Dr. Wilbur F. Watkins, who preached and celebrated the Holy Communion. On the following Sunday, August 9th, the bishop of the diocese visited the parish and confirmed three persons, presented by the priest in charge. The morning service was said by the Rev. H. H. Cole, assisted by the Rev. Dr. W. F. Watkins. The bishop celebrated the Holy Eucharist assisted by the priest in charge, and preached. Prior to the sermon the bishop made a brief address, expressing his gratification that the parish was progressing so well, and that, spite of the absence of the large summer population, the services were maintained all through the winter. He then adverted to the subject of the missionary work of the diocese, stating that he had been surprised at learning from the treasurer of the convocation that but $100 was in the treasury to pay $700 of stipends due the missionaries on August 1st. The missionaries could not be left without their stipends, so he had borrowed the money, and trusted to the parishes in the convocation to help him meet the note. A large offering was the result of this appeal.

On Friday, August 14th, a lawn party was held on the grounds of one of the residents, on the south side of Silver Lake, in order to raise funds to decorate the chancel of the church, which is still undecorated, and to continue the services during the winter. Thanks to the energy of the resident parishioners, assisted by the visitors, a large tent was beautifully fitted up on the grounds of Mr. S. C. Force, who also threw open the lower floor of his house. During the afternoon sales were held, with amusements for the children, and in the evening, when the grounds were beautifully lighted up, there was an amateur concert, at which a programme of a high order was excellently rendered. The results were very satisfactory to all concerned, and it is hoped a sufficient amount to carry out both purposes was realized.

NORTHERN NEW JERSEY.

NEWARK—St. Barnabas Hospital.—The patients of St. Barnabas Hospital were given an excursion by the Sisters and friends of the hospital on Monday, August 10th. The party numbering about thirty, among whom were several sick and crippled children, took a train at the Chestnut street depot for Jersey City and there embarked on the steamer Richard Stockton, going up the Hudson. They watched with pleasure the beautiful scenery and enjoyed themselves immensely. At noon they enjoyed a plentiful lunch, served by the Sisters, and were afterwards treated to ice-cream, candy, etc. The bright and happy faces of the patients, especially the children, were pleasant to see, and doubtless the Sisters felt themselves fully repaid for all their labor. The party returned to the hospital about 7 P. M. All agreed that they had thoroughly enjoyed themselves, and that the occasion was one long to be remembered. The friends of the hospital who contributed toward the expenses have the happy consciousness of having cast a gleam of sunshine into many a sad life, and they will receive the approbation of the Master, who has said: "Inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of these, ye did it unto Me."

SOUTH ORANGE—Church of the Holy Communion.—This parish has sustained a great loss in the resignation of its rector, the Rev. H. S. Degen, who for twelve years has devoted himself to the building up of this parish and the promotion of its interests. He was a man of scholarly attainments, and his kindness of nature, and the performance of his duties as a parish priest, will long be remembered. A testimonial, bearing the signature of nearly every member of the congregation, and expressing their warm respect and regard for their rector, and their sorrow that the parish is so soon to be deprived of his ministrations, has been sent to Mr. Degen, who has also been made Rector Emeritus by the vestry, with an annual salary of six hundred dollars.

EAST ORANGE—St. Paul's Church.—The Rev. James P. Faucon, lately assistant minister at Trinity church, Newark, N. J., has begun his labors as rector of this parish.

St. Paul's, East Orange, was started in April, 1869, through the instrumentality of the Rev. Dr. William H. Carter, then rector of Christ church, Bloomfield. Later a lot was presented by Mr. Chas. F. A. Hinrichs, and on it a small chapel erected, which was opened for service January 30th, 1870. An afternoon service was held here regularly by Dr. Carter and his successor, the Rev. T. J. Danner, until August, 1875, when the lot was sold and the building moved to its present site on Dodd street, and considerably altered and enlarged. The rector of Christ church, Bloomfield, and his assistant continued for a year longer to conduct the worship, but at Easter, 1876, the relation to the parent church ceased, the Rev. William White Wilson was called, and in November of the same year, a parish organization was effected with admission to the convention. A further enlargement of the building followed, and an encouraging growth in membership and general church activity.

Mr. Wilson was, in 1880, succeeded by the Rev. George H. Edwards, who was assisted by his venerable father, the Rev. D. J. Edwards. These gentlemen continued in charge until the beginning of 1885. Mr. Faucon, who succeeds, finds a widely scattered constituency, the congregation at the present time being composed of people who reside in East Orange, Bloomfield and Glen Ridge. The building is ill adapted to the wants of the congregation, and is not favorably situated in relation to neighboring parishes. A new, larger and more beautiful edifice, differently located, is desirable, and will in due time be secured. A plot of ground on Prospect street has been generously offered to the church by a gentleman who contributed $1,500 towards the present edifice. This would be an admirable site, being in an attractive quarter, and equally distant from Grace church, East Orange, Christ church, East Orange, and Christ church, Bloomfield.

PENNSYLVANIA.

CHURCH GROWTH IN THE DIOCESE.—A careful study of the journals of the diocese for the last ten years shows a most decided growth in all branches of Church work, so that they are not to be relied upon who say that it is not lengthening its cords and strengthening its stakes. In 1875 there were 20,906 communicants, there are now 29,362, an increase in ten years of 8,456, or more than 40 per cent. In that time there have been 36,810 baptisms, 19,516 persons confirmed, and 10,128 couples married. There have been 25 corporations laid, 29 churches consecrated. There were 101 churches and 11 chapels in 1875, now there are 121 churches and 30 chapels. The 47 Sunday school buildings have grown to 76, the 43 rectories to 68, the 41 cemeteries to 50, the clergy from 181 to 215. The seating capacity of the churches and chapels was increased from 59,952 to 70,760, or more than 18 per cent. The aggregate value of church property in the diocese in 1885 was $5,973,300.00, in 1885, $9,550,000.00, a gain of $3,576,700.00, more than 60 per cent. The money receipts from all sources during the decade was $7,309,227.71. This includes only what passed through the churches. The many magnificent gifts of individuals and the numerous lesser sums privately contributed form no part of this large amount. Besides the churches erected and reported, there have been very general improvements in the interiors, new chancels have been built, towers finished, larger organs have taken the place of large ones. Workingmen's clubs have been established, and a vastly greater life infused into the many details which go to make up a working parish in these days of activity. He who had been absent from the diocese for ten years would find great changes and improvements in the smaller and rural churches as well as in the larger ones in the centre of the city. Since the convention of the diocese adjourned early in May, the new Church of the Annunciation, (the Rev. Dr. Battersen, rector,) has been completed and opened for service. It has a seating capacity of 600, and replaces a small frame structure. Two large churches, the Church of the Evangelists and the Church of the Ascension, have been begun and will be rapidly pushed to completion, the parish building of the later will be erected at once. Contracts have been signed for the building at once of a school building and sexton's house for the Church of the Redeemer, Bryn Mawr. An addition to the Church of the Beloved Disciple, Columbia avenue near Twenty-first, is just completed, which will increase the seating capacity about one-fourth; this church has also just finished a building which serves as choir and infant school rooms. Two new missions are about to be started under the auspices of the Southwest Convocation, and several of the other convocations have committees considering the advisability of starting others within their boundaries. Thus there is every probability that the strong growth of the diocese during the last ten years will increase rather than diminish.

PHILADELPHIA—Death of Moro Philips.—Mr. Moro Philips, who died at Spring Lake, N. J., on Sunday, August 9th, was a vestryman of St. Mark's church, Philadelphia, and St. James the Less, Falls of Schuylkill. His remains were laid at rest in the churchyard connected with the latter church on Thursday evening, August 13th. His gifts to the church were large. He placed the first metal rod screen erected in America in the Church of St. James the Less, to the memory of his wife, where he also built a handsome stone altar. The very fine white marble reredos and east window in St. Mark's church, Philadelphia, are his gifts.

BRYN MAWR—Church of the Redeemer.—Contracts have just been signed for putting up immediately a parish building and a house for the sexton to the northeast of the church. The parish building is to be 70x80 feet. Part of it will be a large room for the main Sunday-school, with an open-timbered roof. The other portion will be two-storied, the lower of which will be fitted up as an infant school room; the upper, which will be approached by an open outside stairway, for parish purposes. It is to be built of stone. The architecture of the building is early English, in keeping with the church. The main entrance will be by an open wooden porch, the interior finish yellow pine oiled, the windows cathedral glass. The sexton's house is to be a two-story structure, 30x24 feet, also of stone, and adjoining the parish building. These will meet a long-felt want, and, with the church and rectory, form a fine group of buildings.

MARYLAND.

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Church of the Epiphany.—The work on the enlargement of the Mission House has been completed at a cost of $2,000. A porch, new rooms, kitchen and other useful conveniences have been added, and the building presents an attractive appearance. $500 of this sum were contributed by a member of the parish who has long been associated with the mission, and who has thus proved faith by works and sincerity of well-wishing by liberality in well doing.

WEST WASHINGTON, D. C.—St. John's Church, Georgetown.—The report of this parish, (the Rev. Dr. J. S. Lindsay, rector,) given in the convention journal, and repeated in this paper two weeks ago, stated that the gross receipts for the year ending May, 1885, were $4,257.08, and the expenditures in the parish $358.70. It is proper to say that the report is incorrect. The sum collected in St. John's church during the year ending May, 1885, was over $6,000, and the amount expended within the parish exceeded $4,000.

St. PHILIP'S PARISH—St. Philip's Church, Laurel.—The new rectory which this parish (the Rev. A. C. McCabey, rector,) has erected, is creditable and a valuable addition to the property of the congregation. The joint value of church and chapel here is upwards of $4,000, on which is carried an insurance of $3,000. All Saints' Mission, Centralia, Annapolis Junction, has been furnished anew and practically enlarged by the addition of seats, made needful by the growth of the work at this point. $3,000 have been raised in the year past for parish and other work. The rector is instant in season and out, and prayers and sermons are multiplied, and some forty communicants added to a list, which now numbers about one hundred and forty.

KING AND QUEEN PARISH—Christ Church, Choptico.—The memorial window lately placed in the chapel, in honor of the late Bishop Pinkney, is a fitting act and object, though not costly, it is a beautiful work of art. The chapel has been otherwise improved and decorated by an artist from Washington City, rendering the chapel of All Saints' churchly and pleasant to the eye. The old colonial church underwent improvement during the rectorship of the late rector, the Rev. Mr. J. G. Gantt, now of St. Luke's, Wheeling. The Rev. Mr. Theodore Reed of Baltimore has been chosen rector of this parish.

FORESTVILLE—Church of the Epiphany.—This parish (the Rev. W. Brayshaw, rector,) used to be called "the little Epiphany," but under the present rector it has ceased to merit the title. He has gathered sixty-five families since the commencement of his rectorship, numbering three hundred and fifty souls.

During the last year forty infants and three adults have been baptized, and one hundred services have been held; the church has been insured for $2,800, repaired and improved, and the chancel and altar made churchly and seemly. There are one hundred pupils in the Sunday-school, and six teachers. A rectory has been built, on which there now remains only a small debt of about $200; and the cemetery has been put in perfect order. The yearly gifts of the parish amount to $750.

WEST VIRGINIA.

COAL VALLEY—Catskill Church.—The Rev. F. K. Lovell, rector of this parish, which is purely a mission field, writes, under date of August 6th:

"I am reminded of a friend's advice 'to keep my work before the public.' This seems to be the usual way with gleaners of the mission fields; so there must be something in it. I labor publicly and sounding the trumpet. It is to me the most trying thing in my work to be continually probed and held up for inspection, whatever good may result from it, as if I were a martyr or so. For seven weeks past my hands have been idle by reason of a fever, not violent, but slow and confining, and fatal to all my plans for pushing the work. So be it. If you see fit you will publish the following in the interest of my behind-hand rectory building, for which I have collected about one-half enough, and which must be built this fall, if possible.

"These are said to be hard times in trade and commercial circles. They must be adamant in the Church, and not wholly for the same reason. The Church papers picture an age of appeals and of clerical pauperism. Were Churchmen disposed to respond, many would be at a loss to know which was the greatest need, the best investment for their benefactions. Not by way of adding to the embarrassment of these good souls, may one be permitted to urge once more upon the Church benevolent the needs of the work among the coal miners and railroad men in the Kanawha Valley of West Virginia. For seven years this most appealing work has been carried on, growing steadily in importance (if possible) and interest, and not without God's blessing. Churches and school-houses have been built, mearer to the eye than any which the Spirit of Missions pictures; but paint and carpets and comfort are easily dispensed with. In the mission schools, largely dependent on outside aid as yet, some seventy children were instructed in Church principles last session, and many more in the Sunday-schools. The belief is held here—perhaps more than elsewhere—that all these people have souls. Was Archimedes a sort of missionary? He asked for a standing place in order to move the world. The missionary here asks for a standing, sitting, and sleeping-place to move some of the world, flesh, and devil from a teeming population of workmen. If this meets the eye of some Churchmen who have just been lavishing money on summer excursions and pleasure living for self, may I suggest that for His sake, who never did so much for Himself, they send the writer one August day's expenses for this purpose, and something more for the suggestion, if they like it. Only a few hundred dollars are needed to secure a cheap residence. Shall it be forthcoming?"

INDIANA.

NEWCASTLE—St. James's Church.—A little over a year ago the bishop of the diocese held the first service at this place. He was followed by the Rev. J. W. Birchmore, of Muncie, who held week day and an occasional Sunday service. After him and in December last, the Rev. Willis D. Engle took charge, dividing the Sundays between this point and Columbus. There are but sixteen communicants, none of them of much financial ability, yet they have so successfully labored, that by the help of the Diocesan Church Building Fund an extremely neat frame gothic church was opened for service on June 24th, the Rev. Dr. E. A. Bradley preaching at the opening service on "An open door." There were present the Rev. J. W. Birchmore, who preached at the eucharistic service on the following (St. James's) day, the Rev. W. W. Raymond, and the Rev. G. B. Engle, of Indianapolis, and the minister in charge. The nave of the church is 20x37; the chancel, separated from it by a neat rood screen, 20x14, with all proper furniture (except chairs) and stalls for a choir of eighteen. A choir, properly vested, will at an early day be introduced into the public services. Mr. Engle, as a layworker, introduced into the Church of the Holy Innocents, Indianapolis, in 1873, the first vested choir in the diocese, which was maintained under his leadership for over ten years, before the second vested choir was organized, that of Christ church, Indianapolis, which led the music at the opening service. The Sunday school, numbering forty scholars, holds weekly sessions, and a woman's guild is actively working. On Saturday, August 1st, Mrs. Engle held the third service at Cadis, seven miles from Newcastle, and is to open work at Kennard's Station, eight miles distant, on August 13th.

WESTERN MICHIGAN.

GRAND RAPIDS—Memorial Services.—Memorial services for General Grant were held in St. Mark's church, on Saturday, the 8th of August, at 10:30 o'clock, A.M. Owing to the absence of the rector, (the Rev. E. S. Burford) the discourse was delivered by the Rev. J. Rice Taylor; the Rev. F. De Rosset leading the service and the surpliced choir. The emblems of mourning (which had been present since the time of his death), together with the chanting of the burial service, accompanied by the deep tones of the organ, rendered the occasion solemnly impressive.

Memorial services were also held at St. Paul's, on the West Side, in the afternoon of the same day.

FOND DU LAC.

MARINETTE—St. Paul's Mission.—On Thursday, August 6th, the new parsonage of this mission (the Rev. William Dafter, missionary,) was formally dedicated with a service of benediction. The bishop of the diocese was present, and conducted the services. The mission is to be congratulated at having reached this point of growth. With a good church and a home for its minister, it is fully equipped for work. There was an early celebration in the church, at 7 A.M., with special Collect, Epistle (Isaiah xxxii, 13-19) and Gospel (St. John ii, 1-12), and a special prayer before the "Blessing of Peace." At 6:30 P.M., there was Even Song with special lessons, and the special prayer repeated. After which, the bishop, clergy and cloisters proceeded to the parsonage singing Hymn 190. At the door, the bishop gave the Salutation of Peace, with the Gloria Patri, and the versicles: V. This is the gate of the Lord. R. The righteous shall enter into it. V. O Lord, hear our prayer. R. And let our cry come unto Thee. The Lord's Prayer and a collect of benediction of the doors followed, after which, Psalm cxxi was sung. Entering the parlor the bishop then said, "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers, for thereby some have entertained angels unawares." V. The Lord your God loveth the stranger in giving him food and raiment. R. Love ye, therefore, the stranger, for ye were strangers in the land of Israel. V. O Lord, hear, etc. R. And let, etc. A collect of benediction of the guest-chamber was said, followed by Hymn 291. Entering one of the sleeping-rooms, the bishop said: "Save us, O Lord, watching, guard us sleeping, that we may watch with Christ and rest in peace." V. I will lay me down in peace. R. And take my rest. V. O Lord, hear, etc. R. And let, etc. A collect of benediction of the sleeping-chambers was said, followed by three verses of Hymn 339. In the study the bishop said: "Every scribe which is instructed unto the Kingdom of Heaven is like unto a man that is an householder, which brought forth out of his treasures things new and old." V. Give instruction to a wise man, and he will be yet wiser. R. Teach me a just man and he will increase in learning. V. Teach me, O Lord, the way of Thy statutes. R. And I shall keep it unto the end. V. O Lord, hear, etc. R. And let, etc. Then was said a collect of benediction of the library or study, followed by Hymn 362. In the dining-room the bishop said: "The eyes of all wait upon Thee, O Lord, and Thou givest them their meat in due season. Thou openest Thine hand and fillest all things living, with plenteousness." V. The poor shall eat and be satisfied. R. They that seek after the Lord shall praise Him. V. O Lord, hear, etc. R. And let, etc. A collect of benediction of the dining-room was followed by Psalm xxiii.

The bishop then said: "Be kindly affectioned one to another in brotherly love, in honor preferring one another, not slothful in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord. Above all things have fervent charity among yourselves, for charity shall cover the multitude of sins." After a brief address and the singing of Hymn 454, a concluding collect of benediction of the house, and the Collect for St. Michaels and All Angels were said, and the bishop pronounced the Benediction "The Blessing of God Almighty, the Father, Son and Holy Ghost, be upon his house and all who dwell within it, Amen." After which the clergy and cloisters returned to the church singing Hymn 317.

ONEIDA—Hobart Church.—The bishop of the diocese, accompanied by the Rev. Dr. Ashley of Milwaukee, visited this church, on the Tenth Sunday after Trinity. The day was bright and the atmosphere delightful. As usual, the tribe turned out in full force to greet their spiritual father. The capacity of the church was too small for the occasion, and many had to content themselves on the greenward about the building. The Rev. E. A. Goodnough, the missionary, said Morning Prayer and the Litany in the Oneida tongue. The Rev. Dr. Ashley baptized two adults and an infant. The bishop confirmed twenty-six Indians, one of whom was a man of ninety-six years of age. The address was made by the Rev. Dr. Ashley. The bishop celebrated the Holy Communion and preached on the Gospel for the day, adding some words of encouragement about the building of the new church. A very large number received at the Holy Communion. The service, as to length, was very satisfactory to the Indians, being just four hours long. It will be remembered that these Indians, by the failure of a savings bank and other mishaps, lost the accumulation of the self-denials and labors of fourteen years just as the contract for the new church had been made in their behalf by the bishop and missionary. They have resolutely faced the exigency. Every Monday many of the men spend at their quarry, hewing the stone for the building. Three hundred cords in all are needed, of which two hundred are out and on had loved, and with whom she had borne through her own happy married life, and whom Austin had cherished for her sake with more than a brother's patience?

And as it was with them, so it was with the boys. No need to hush their noisy footsteps and merry voices now, as the lady crept about the house bating their very breath for fear Aunt Belle should be disturbed. Aunt Belle, who had never won their boyish confidence, who had never tried to win it, on whose knee they had rarely clambered since their babyhood, and whom they had always held in an awe and reverence which their mother with her open arms and ready kisses had never inspired.

It was strange to see the lads waiting upon her; Guy especially, who was in reality her favorite, was very helpful and zealous in her service. It must have given Belle many a pang to remember how little she had interested herself in Mary's boys—their very affection was a reproach to her. Arty one day got into her lap and put his arms round her neck. "Dear Aunt Belle," said the affectionate little fellow, "why don't you get well when we all love you so? It makes mammy so unhappy."

"I don't think you can love me much, Arty," replied Belle, fixing her hollow eyes mournfully on the child. "I have not done much for you; I have been very selfish and wicked, Arty." And then, before the boy could answer, she pressed him to her closer than she had ever done before and burst into tears.

Mary, who was working at the other end of the room, hurried across and lifted her boy off his aunt's lap.

"Oh, Arty," she exclaimed reproachfully, "you must not tire poor Aunt Belle so." But Belle, struggling vainly with her emotion, said, "No, it is not that, dear Mary; let him stay—it is not Arty that tires me, it is only"—drawing her sister's face down to hers and kissing it remorsefully—"it is only because it makes me so unhappy, Mary, to think how little I have done for you and your boys."

Poor Belle! Always self-tormented and self-absorbed, worn to a shadow by consuming sadness, shedding bitter tears over a useless past, and fighting against the doom she feels is irrevocable—baffled, weary, and unconvinced—so did she drag on her heavy days. Willingly, right willingly, would Austin have ministered to her sick heart and soul, but Belle shrank from his loving counsel. "Ask Austin not to come and read to me," she said more than once to her sister; "it looks so as though I were dying. If I grow worse I will send for him." And the vicar, albeit with a heavy heart, forbore out of consideration for her morbid fancies. "It seems wrong, but what can I do?" he said once to Rotha; "her mind is harassing her body, and both are alike sick, poor soul! but she will have none of my healing." But Rotha only murmured quietly, "Leave her alone, Mr. Ord. Belle is like no one else; she is fighting it out with herself. By and by her weakness will overcome her, and she will cling to your every word as eagerly as she now repels them; but just now she only remembers that she is unhappy."

Rotha's unspoken sympathy, so intense and so delicately manifested, did much to win Belle's wayward confidence. Her soft voice and quiet ways were very pleasant to the sick girl, whose shattered nerves could bear so little; she felt Rotha's presence a rest, and grew more reconciled to her sister's brief absences from her room if Rotha could take her place. In many ways she suited her better than Mary. Mary, oppressed with many cares, had lost much of her wonted cheerfulness; faint streaks of gray were plainly discernible in the mother's pretty hair, her smiling face had grown worn and anxious-looking; it was not always easy for her to conceal her uneasiness when Belle coughed or looked more than usually ill; and Belle, who disliked to be plied, would turn impatiently from her questions and caresses. She would have deceived them all still, and cheated herself too, if it had been possible.

But Rotha's face, grave only with reflected sadness, grew daily more necessary to her. She would watch for her coming every morning, and brighten perceptibly at the sound of her footsteps. She could always bear her to talk to her when Mary's voice fretted her into a fever; and her reading was a real refreshment during the long twilight, when she lay and waited for Robert.

Rotha did not always go home at these times. Robert always looked for her, and expected her to be there. Since the day of their reconciliation, when he had owned and acknowledged her as a friend, Rotha had no reason to complain of his manner to her. As far as she was concerned, he was an altered man.

He never met her now without a kind smile and a hearty grasp of the hand. If she stayed late at the Vicarage, however tired and jaded he was, he would always walk up with her to her own door.

Others beside Rotha noticed the almost deferential reverence with which he addressed her; it seemed as though he were always trying to make amends for his past injustice to her. The vicar openly congratulated her on his happy condition of things, but Rotha just now was a little silent over the whole matter. If the truth must be told, she felt somewhat oppressed by it all; in her humility it was almost painful to feel herself so watched and considered.

She was somewhat perplexed too at his sudden change of opinion; but at her first timid questioning on the subject Robert had stoutly denied that it was sudden.

"I had my doubts a long time before I would own to them," he said to her, with the rare honesty which had first won her esteem for him; "but I think it was that talk down on the sands that first shook my faith in my own judgment. I would not give in at the time—but it somehow conquered me; and then your giving everything to Gar; that did not look like covetousness—did it?"

"I wish he would come back!" sighed Rotha, touched by this reference to her lover. "How many days is it since he went away—hardly a week yet, Mr. Robert?"—turning to him half seriously, half playfully—"you had as much right to come up to Bryn and steal some of my property as to send away Gar."

She was afraid she had hurt him, for he did not answer. But a moment afterward she saw his eyes fixed on her with a strange, indefinable expression.

"Send him away? Yes, you are right. I am afraid it was my doing. Evil for good—not good for evil. Miss Maturin, I wish I could have gone in his stead. Yes, I wish to heaven I could have gone in his stead!"

"And left Belle? Oh, for shame, Mr. Robert!"

"Yes, and left Belle. What is Belle to me or to her now? Shall we ever be man and wife? Oh, my poor girl! How little I knew when I gave up everything for her sake that we should ever come to this! Miss Maturin," turning on her abruptly, "do you believe in long engagements?—I do not."

"I don't know," faltered Rotha. "I think it is a great test; it was so in Jacob's case. Seven years is a long time, Mr. Ord?"

"Why will people always quote Jacob as an example?" replied Robert impatiently. "An exception is nothing to the rule. Did Rachel's beauty fade, I wonder? Did Jacob eat out his heart with that long waiting? Do you think it well that all freshness should wear off? Do Belle and I love each other the better for knowing each other's faults and learning painful lessons of forbearance for half-a-dozen years? Does not the heart grow old too sometimes?"

"No," replied Rotha indignantly. "If that be your man's sophistry I repel it entirely. 'Many waters cannot quench love,' we read, and many years ought not to exhaust it. Belle may try you, Mr. Ord—you see I am speaking plainly—but she never loved you better than she loves you now."

"I do not deserve it," he returned in an agitated voice. "Ifeel you are right—women always are. Never mind if I meant what I said just now. Heaven knows I would cut off my right hand if I could make amends to her for what she has gone through for my sake; and if she may only be spared to me for a few years I will guarantee that I will make her happier, poor child, than she has ever been before."

"I am sure of it," replied Rotha, and then the subject dropped. But she never forgot his words; they convinced her that her suspicions were true—that Robert Ord's remorse was greater than his love; that, however noble and faithful he had been in his allegiance to his betrothed, the engagement had been a hasty one; and that in spite of his warm affection Belle was not loved, never had been loved, with the whole strength and passion of his nature.

Rotha hardly knew whether she resented this for Belle's sake; but it was certain that this instinctive perception of his lukewarmness kept her a little aloof from Robert, and caused her to redouble her tenderness and pity to Belle; for she now watched jealously for every symptom of coldness on his part, but could not find the slightest fault with his manner. Never since the days of his early love, when her beauty and her too evident affection for himself had tempted him from his prudence, had he been so gentle, so devoted; and less keen eyes than Rotha's would have judged that his was the deeper affection of the two.

But alas! alas! though in his remorse and pity he would have cut off his right hand to have been allowed to call her his wife, her face was not the dearest to him, neither was her name the oftener on his lips. But those who saw his altered looks and marvelled at his sorrow never guessed Robert Ord's secret, and least of all she who

ART.

Recent progress in the multiplication of important pictures by photography suggests a most desirable extension of art-education, outside of costly private collections and handsome fortunes. Valuable art has remained quite too long an inaccessible luxury for the masses of our population. This may account in part for the rapid growth and popularity of illustrated journalism. Even an illustrated "daily" has wide currency, and while there is almost no end of weeklies and monthlies, some of the latter having achieved unprecedented circulation both at home and abroad. It is no disparagement to their brilliant literary quality to suggest that the publishers find their account rather in the brain of the engravers than in the brains of their contributors.

Unfortunately we have as yet few public galleries opened freely and conveniently to the public. And under the leadings of our form of government and in the absence of a decided public spirit, it is not likely that such collections will be made as are found in every considerable European city. The popular distribution of excellent pictures through the photographer is an immediate benefit, hardly second to the multiplication of standard, classic literature at popular prices.

There seems no reason why Raphael, da Vinci, Murillo, and Keulbaech should not be as easily accessible as Goethe, Dante, Shakespeare, and Wordsworth. Many of the great masterpieces have for years been "transcribed," as one might say, in photographic art, and distributed where original works in oil are never found. Also multitudes of popular compositions, as genre, Schreyer's studies of Arabian horsemanship, Meyer Von Bremen's and Jean Francois Millet's best productions.

Indeed the commercial enterprise developed in this direction is something enormous. Hanfstaengl of Munich, a leading house in this trade, it is said made thirty-five negatives of Erdmann's idyllic "Health of the Bride," producing from them two thousand copies daily. Of one of DeFrager's charming compositions forty negatives were made and fifty thousand copies have left Munich in a single consignment. Much of this is supplemented by water colors in sympathy with the originals, but the artistic gain is strongly questioned. Certainly some of the Schreyer Arabian subjects treated in this manner are exceedingly effective, having almost the force of original aquarelles. The cost of these copies is relatively very little, and there are reasons for believing that it will soon be considerably reduced.

There are several lines of suggestion growing out of the topic. There is first likely to be a steady supplanting of trashy, worthless, or worse than worthless, oil paintings with which inland regions are literally flooded—productions of the coarsest, most illiterate sort, swarming in New York—mostly pirated from some reputable work and artist, and caricatured in style, touch and color with detestable ingenuity. An uneducated eye is easily enough imposed upon by these fraudulent exploits, especially when half blinded with an abundance of meretricious gilt framing and the unscrupulous effrontery of a shrewd auctioneer. These new photographs have educational energy, and the eye once opened and instructed will have little pleasure or complacency in mediocrity or charlatanry.

Besides it is not unlikely that the ubiquitous chromo, which has rendered no dispensable service in its day, must also always give place to these photographs. For the artist and his inspiration are wonderfully preserved, and it is to be hoped that the work of reputable houses will prove as durable, in tone at least, as engravings and etchings.

Recently this beautiful industry has made a footing among American print dealers. And not a little pleasing grave from the more popular artists is now reproduced in excellent photography, and finding its way through the channels of trade side by side with the best work of the bookseller.

A CARD.

Appeal is made for the work of the Church Society for Promoting Christianity amongst the Jews, Auxiliary to the Board of Missions. Though Good Friday is customarily and specially recommended as a time for contribution, there is always need of constant and enlarged receipt of offerings, and this is especially true in the present season of business depression, when returns of giving are relatively slower and smaller than in other years.

The work embraces the circulation of the Scriptures and a Missionary literature, the maintenance of Missionaries and Missionary Schools, and the organized co-operation of parish clergy, reaching the Jews with encouraging results in 861 cities and towns of the United States. No temporal aid is given believers.

Missionary pledge must be met, Parish, Sunday-school, and individual offerings are earnestly requested.

RESTORATION BY A STANDING COMMITTEE.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Can the Standing Committee of a diocese, acting as its Ecclesiastical Authority, remit a sentence of deposition pronounced upon a clergyman of the Church? The Standing Committee of Southern Ohio have answered this question affirmatively, and have taken action accordingly. Thus, much we gather from the letter of its president, the Rev. Dr. Benedict, in your issue of August 8th. As is there stated: "This is the first case probably of [an attempt at] a restoration by such an Ecclesiastical Authority," (the words in brackets are our own, and we are not surprised to hear that the validity of such an act has been already questioned by three bishops. The subject is a most important one, and in its far-reaching and possible results may concern not only the Church in this country, but the whole Anglican communion. Such action on the part of presbyters and bishops is to be opposed to all the past history and traditions of the Church.

It has been generally believed among us that none but a bishop could ordain, depose, and restore to the ministry. It is a novel and a startling theory that a Standing Committee, acting as the Ecclesiastical Authority of a diocese, although not competent to confer Holy Orders, or to deprive, or to depose, or to restore from their use, may yet have the power to restore such an one to all his rights and immunities in the sacred ministry. Title II., Canon 11, § ii. is very clear and positive in this matter: "A bishop of this Church may, for reasons which he shall deem sufficient, ordain and dedicate as usual to the episcopate, or degradation pronounced by him upon a presbyter or deacon; but he shall exercise this power only upon the following conditions." Here follow five conditions, all of which, no doubt, were duly complied with by the Standing Committee.

There is not the slightest indication, however, that "this power" could be exercised by any "other Ecclesiastical Authority," or by the clerical members of the Standing Committee. Restoration is placed upon the same level as ordination and deposition. Looking at the subject from our point of view, it seems as though the Rev. Dr. Benedict had misunderstood the meaning of the term "Ecclesiastical Authority," as used in the Constitution and Canons.

He makes it apparently equivalent to the word "bishop" in all places, except those which refer to ordination and deposition. But the former term has a broader and more comprehensive meaning than the latter. A careful examination of these two expressions, as they occur in the Constitution and the Digest, will reveal the existence of a very close discrimination in their use, and would seem to outline the powers of a Standing Committee acting as the Ecclesiastical Authority. As the term "Ecclesiastical Authority" is added to the word bishop, or used independently, it would seem to imply that the Standing Committee, when acting as such Ecclesiastical Authority, could perform the acts therein mentioned, and would lead us to infer that the term was a technical one.

As the clergy of the Convocation of Canterbury, in the reign of Henry VIII., acknowledged the king as the Supreme Head of the Church only "quantum per Christi legem licet," so the Standing Committee is constituted the Ecclesiastical Authority, "as far as it is allowable by the law of Christ," "for all purposes declared in these Canons." They cannot disapprove, or annul, or depose, or restore, or confirm, or to consecrate a church, because these acts belong to the episcopate alone, and no provision is made in the Canons for the discharge of any of them by a Standing Committee.

If a single committee, acting as the Ecclesiastical Authority of a diocese, can exercise the power of the bishop in remitting a sentence of deposition in the case of a priest, what is to prevent (the other conditions being complied with) a majority of the Standing Committees acting as Ecclesiastical Authorities, (if such an event were possible,) from exercising the collective powers of the bishops as described in this same Canon 11, and restoring a deposed bishop to his office?

Such action would appear to be the logical result of the principle set forth by our reverend brother. The only use of the term "Ecclesiastical Authority" in the Constitutions occurs in Article 4, which says that "every bishop shall confirm the exercise of his episcopal office to his proper diocese, unless he is required to ordain, to confirm, or perform any other act of the episcopal office in another diocese by the Ecclesiastical Authority thereof."

Here we perceive clearly that the term may refer to the bishop or to the Standing Committee when constituted as such authority. When we read in Article 6 that "none but a bishop shall pronounce sentence of admonition, suspension or degradation from the ministry on any clergyman," do we not naturally infer the converse of this statement, viz., that "none but a bishop shall remit or terminate any such sentence?" and accordingly we find in Title II., Canon 11, § ii., the clause which we have quoted above. If such a canon there is not the slightest intimation given of this power being delegated to any "other Ecclesiastical Authority."

In all places where the word "bishop" is used in the Constitution, it refers exclusively to the possessor of that office. And now let us consider the use of the word in relation to the canons. Title I., Canon 2, relates to the admission of candidates for Holy Orders. The bishop is mentioned a number of times in the second section, and in paragraph 6 we are told that "a Standing Committee, acting under canonical provision as the Ecclesiastical Authority of a diocese, in vacancy, or for other cause shall be competent to receive and do all assigned to the bishop in the foregoing clauses." If it were already competent by reason of its position as the Ecclesiastical Authority, why should this clause be inserted? Under this same canon there are ten sections, and in § vii. we read that "in any case where the Standing Committee is the Ecclesiastical Authority of the diocese, such committee shall be competent to receive and do all assigned to the bishop in § iii., § iv. and § vi. of this canon."

In our view of the subject, unless these three sections were thus thrown open to the Standing Committee, they could have no exercise of the duties therein imposed upon the bishop, and by this provision they are shut out from taking the place of the bishop in § v. and § vii.

Canon 8 of the same title treats "of admitted candidates." The first paragraph of § 1, informs us that the superintendence of a candidate for Holy Orders, and direction of his theological studies, pertain to the bishop of the diocese." But the second paragraph goes on to state that "in a diocese vacant or otherwise canonically under the Ecclesiastical Authority of the Standing Committee, the clerical members of such committee shall exercise said superintendence and direction." If the church thus limits the superintendence of candidates for orders to the bishop or the clerical members of a Standing Committee, would it be natural to suppose that she would allow the committee as a whole to undertake the much more solemn act of restoring to the sacred ministry one who had been deposed therefrom by the bishop? We think not. Canon 7, § 1, on the other hand, states that "Every deacon shall be subject to the regulation of the bishop, or, if there be no bishop, of the clerical members of the Standing Committee for which he is ordained, until he receive letters of dismission therefrom to the bishop or Ecclesiastical Authority of some other diocese." Here again we perceive a much inferior act than the one we are discussing restricted to the clerical members of the Standing Committee.

From this canon, in Title I., to the close of the Digest, it would appear that whenever the duties assigned to the bishop can be performed by the Standing Committee, the term "Ecclesiastical Authority" is inserted after the words "bishop," or is used independently of it, or the proviso is added that if there is no bishop the Standing Committee can act. But in Title II., Canon 11, on the "remission or modification of judicial sentence," as we have already said, there is not the slightest evidence that these sentences could be remitted by any other Ecclesiastical Authority than a bishop himself.

The action of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Southern Ohio, as stated by its president, is therefore very strange and startling, and the great interests involved in such action to the Church at large ought to be a sufficient excuse for any criticism of so novel a procedure on the part of a Standing Committee.

THE WESTMINSTER REVISION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT—PSALM VIII. 5, VERSUS HEBREWS II. 7.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

St. Paul wrote the Epistle to the Hebrews. So St. Peter decides. "As [in his Epistle to the strangers scattered,] I Peter i.] also in all his Epistles hath our beloved brother Paul written unto you." (II. Peter iii., 15, 16.)

To no New Testament writer, except St. Paul, is this language of St. Peter possibly applicable. The apostle says that St. Paul wrote the Epistle to the Hebrews in the New Testament.

2. St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Hebrews 1. 7, pronounces "angelis" the proper translation of the Hebrew word Elohim. (Psalm civ. 4.)

1. Having thus, Hebrews 1. 7, defined both Elohim and "angels," St. Paul, Hebrews ii. 9, employs these words in precisely the same sense; because he, retaining his previous definitions in Hebrews i. 7, and again, Hebrews ii. 9, defines Elohim by "angels."

4. But Hebrews ii. 9, thus defined by St. Paul, is the exact repetition and the binding application of the explanation which St. Paul in this inspired apostle, who "has the mind of Christ," (I. Cor. ii. 16.)

5. The Westminster Revision of the Old Testament translates Psalm viii. 5, "little lower than God," in place of the version in the Bible of King James I., both in Psalm viii. 5 and Hebrews ii. 9, "little lower than the angels."

6. The contradiction of St. Paul by the Westminster Revision, Psalm viii. 5, is the necessary conclusion from the present demonstration.

7. St. Paul, Hebrews i. 7 and ii. 9, not only fully justifies, but also authoritatively demands the translation of the common version. (Psalm viii. 5.)

SAMUEL FULLER.

A REMARKABLE OPPORTUNITY.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Pending our efforts to secure the means to pay the salary of the Rev. Sherman Coolidge, and to build him a mission-house and home, the Rev. J. Roberts, the head of the Indian Mission in Wyoming, writes, of date August 4th, as follows:

"The —, by their bigotry and rashness, have lost Lander. The mission is abandoned, and the missionists sent to the Arapahoe camp of Wind River follows. All this happens through lack of policy and steadfastness of purpose."

I wrote to the — to ask him to sell the mission building in the Arapahoe camp down the river. He wants $1,000 for it. It is a well-built house of two stories, and cost to build about $2,000. I told Mr. Coolidge to offer him $500—that is all he would get for the material if it were hauled away—$250 to be paid down, the balance to be paid by the first of November; if not then paid, interest to be given at ten per cent. I believe we can buy it on these terms. We will know in two weeks.

Now, this mission building is just what the Rev. Sherman Coolidge wants. It is a location chosen with the proverbial wisdom of those who built it. Who will give $500, or what two persons will give $250 each, to enable me to take advantage of this rare and most providential opportunity? Will you who would aid me herein communicate with me at once!

NEW BOOKS.

THE INFLUENCE OF THE APOSTLE PAUL ON THE DEVELOPMENT OF CHRISTIANITY. By Otto Pfleiderer, D.D., Professor of Theology in the University of Berlin. Translated by J. Frederick Smith. (The Hibbert Lectures, 1863.) [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons,] pp. 358. Price $2.

We will say in the outset that these lectures show a remarkable and, on the whole, a satisfactory grasp of the great controversy between Jewish and Gentile Christianity—a contest which is but too often kept out of sight in the desire to magnify the perfections of the Apostolic Church. But whoever reads these pages should do so on other points with great allowance. Dr. Pfleiderer, if he accepts (which is very doubtful) the doctrine of the Trinity at all, does so in a way which is open to very serious criticism. It is more than doubtful whether he allows any personality to the Holy Spirit. He uses language concerning the Sonship of our blessed Lord which seems to us precisely that of a high Arian, such as the early Unitarians were in the habit of using to explain away difficult texts. Again, he gives to the entire body of Christian truth a markedly subjective aspect, so much so as to all but deprive it of its character of a revelation. But that which most of all would vitiate its whole authority with English readers is that he adopts as conclusive the biblical theories of the Tübingen school. He regards the Pastoral Epistles, those to the Ephesians and Colossians, the Epistle to the Hebrews, and the Book of the Revelations as spurious—that is, as being the work of later authors. He does not say in so many words that St. John's gospel is of the same character, but he uses language concerning St. John's reputed authorship of the Apocalypse which is incompatible with a belief that he wrote the fourth gospel. He considers the accounts of the conversion of St. Paul contradictory (though two out of the three are in St. Paul's own words) and unhistorical. He will not say that there was no objective reality to the Lord's appearing, but he is strongly disposed to believe it a mere vision, and that the whole was the result of a mental and moral conflict in St. Paul's own mind. Of course we have no room here to take up and controvert these propositions. We have but one answer to make to the whole system of the neological German writers, and that is that it is based upon the tacit assumption of the impossibility of the supernatural. Their criticism is purely destructive, and when carefully weighed against itself is forced, contradictory, and sophistical to the last degree. Its theory of a Pauline, Petrine, and Eirenec literature of the second century, in which the names of apostles long before dead were forged to documents written in the interest of their supposed beliefs, is one which is too preposterous to need refutation. It is a theory which no critic has ever dared to apply to secular literature.

But where a more purely historical question has to be dealt with, the German mind and the German temper of dealing with Scripture is more successful. Where there is no secret work against the supernatural to be done, no covert motive for perverting facts, its speculations are almost always bold, ingenious, and often valuable. We cannot say that we altogether agree with Dr. Pfleiderer in his views as to the doctrinal differences which at first divided Jewish from Gentile Christians. We lay far more stress upon the matter of mere observances, the daily habits, the thousand and one little jarring points which must have made Jewish and Gentile equality and fellowship in the Church, so hard to bear. We recognize the tendencies which were then in the Church toward this or that form of essential doctrine, toward Ebonite asceticism on the one hand and Gnostic Platonism on the other; but we hold that (unless human nature be utterly changed since then) the real burning questions were in matters of food, dress, speech, habits of practical morality, and familiar usages of the law. It was the white heat of persecution which welded all these conflicting elements into one. Through martyrdom the Church became catholic.

A COMPANION TO THE REVISED OLD TESTAMENT. By Talbot W. Chambers. [New York: Funk & Wagnalls.] Price $1.00.

"Qui s'excuse, s'accuse." The apologetic tone of this book augurs ill for the success of the Revision. That has been better done in the case of the Old than that of the New Testament. But one cardinal principle was either ignored or lost sight of, and that was "that nothing should be altered which could possibly be avoided." It does not matter that the revisers could improve the Version. They had no business to try to improve, because change on its own account was a greater misfortune than it could possibly for any other reason be a benefit. Only in the case of manifest error had they the smallest right to touch the text of the authorized version. And for this reason, the text as it stood had acquired a power and sanctity not to be trifled with. The real purpose of this book is, no doubt, to defend the American Revision. We think, in some respects, the American was the better. In others the changes were almost puerile. To reject words as obsolete which are to be found in Milton, Tennyson, Lowell, is simply to pander to the corruption of the language. Out of the list of such changes here given, we should unhesitatingly reject one half as indefensible. For instance, "wanderer" for "vagabond," "spring" for "well," "splendid," "stately" for "gallant," are notable examples. We admit the value of the work done. We admit its necessity, but we are clearly of opinion that it has been needlessly, but thoroughly, wrecked by the effort to do too much. The Revised Version of the Old and much more that of the New Testament, will never be substituted for the present one. It must be itself revised ere it can be accepted. Moreover, the much vaunted method by which the revision was accomplished is really the strongest reason against the results. The product was a compromise—and a compromise means "consent in non-essentials for the sake of escaping conflict in essentials." We could point to some striking instances of this in the New Testament if we had space. For this book itself, "the Companion to the Revision," we are bound to say that it is a valuable and able work, and that Dr. Chambers has defended and explained the course of his associates with great skill. It will be useful to every one who studies the New Version. And therein we recognize the great, the true value of the work of the English and American revisers. They have not produced a substitute, perhaps not even the foundation for a substitute, but they have given a great help and impulse to the study of the Bible. We say this the more willingly because our sympathies are altogether on the side of revision, because we recognize its necessity, and our only regret is that it should have been accomplished in a way which defeats its end, and possibly postpones to a far off time the real work.

COLLECTED ESSAYS IN POLITICAL AND SOCIAL SCIENCE. By William Graham Sumner. Professor of Political and Social Science in Yale College. [New York: Henry Holt & Co.] pp. 173. Price $1.50.

Whether the reader agrees with Professor Sumner or not, it is impossible not to enjoy his vivid and trenchant style. That these essays are controversial, is plain from the first page to the last. And we can predict that not a few intelligent readers will find themselves, if not before, at least after perusal, on Mr. Sumner's side of the controversy. The subjects of these essays are "Bimetallism," "Wages," "The Argument Against Protective Taxes," "Sociology," "Theory and Practice of Elections," "Parts I and II," "Presidential Elections and Civil Service Reform," and "Our Colleges Before the Country." Professor Sumner has, we think, taken especial care to avoid writing as a mere theorist or doctrinaire. He endeavors to reach the common sense and practical conclusion, to shun sentiment, and to take facts as they are. If he is to be answered, it can only be some stronger array of opposing facts—provided such can be found. If not, one is obliged to write Q. E. D. after each of his positions. We hope this volume will be widely read. We are glad to see that political and social science is receiving more study than formerly, because the exigencies of the future are very great, and its perils portentous. Men of thought and men of wisdom are needed. The American problem is to be worked out without the practical dangers and safeguards of fixed institutions and controlling classes. If its elements are simple, there is the more fear lest these combine against good government. We are happy to find that Mr. Sumner makes short work of the right of suffrage theory and the equality theory. If we have any fault to find it is that he ignores too entirely the sentimental element in human nature. Men have fought and will again fight to the last drop of blood for an idea without a foundation apparent to practical men. Nevertheless, ideas with a foundation are the better reliance.

LANDSCAPE. By Philip Gilbert Hamerton. Author of "A Painter's Camp," "Life of J. M. W. Turner," etc. [Boston: Roberts Brothers,] pp. 40. Price $2.

Less brilliant and vehement than Ruskin, Mr. Hamerton is perhaps more trustworthy as a critic on art. We do not mean that he has a higher sense of loyalty to absolute truth, but that he sees with a calmer and less prejudiced eye than the great author of "Modern Painters." Mr. Hamerton has written many delightful volumes, but hardly one more delightful than this. Its dominant idea is in general the influence of natural scenery on man, of course drawing very largely upon the twin topics of landscape in literature and landscape in art—word-painting and color-painting. There is an effect in all Mr. Hamerton's books, and not least in this, of breadth and fairness—an effect which leaves a very favorable impression on the mind. It is to this that is owing the evident restraint which checks him from writing as brilliantly as he might. Now and then, at the close of a chapter he has let himself go, and the result is a page of great beauty; but his main aim is to be clear and honest, and, knowing the dangers of impetuous and fervid language, he writes under a perpetual watch. We are reminded of the conversation of a well-trained and able man, who says nothing for effect, but is bent upon giving the best thoughts he has, and the most careful results of his knowledge. Another impression that Mr. Hamerton makes upon one is that of a man who respects other people's opinions, and is courteously disposed to give full scope to all proper differences—a gift which is sufficiently rare both to the artistic and the critical temperament to be the more welcome when found. We do not mean that there is anything commonplace or dull in his writing. "Landscape" is a very fascinating book, as well as a very instructive one. We only wish that he had given much more of his criticism on "Landscape in Literature," and included Browning in his studies.

PLATARCH ON THE DELAY OF THE DIVINE JUSTICE. Translated with an Introduction and Notes. By Andrew P. Peabody. [Boston: Little, Brown & Co.] pp. 78.

In spite of Lord Macanlay's contemptuous criticism, "Platarch's Lives" was once the favorite reading of not a few scholars and men of letters. Of these Dr. Peabody is one who has kept his early tastes. He has here given not only a clear and graceful translation, but abundant and scholarly notes, and has done a good work in introducing to the general reader one of the most thoughtful and striking treatises of ancient heathenism. He has done this, we believe, in the true and reverent temper of a Christian writer. There are those who find Christian truth everywhere velut in the New Testament, and see in the Vedas and Zend-Avesta the originals plagiarized by our Lord and His apostles. But Dr. Peabody fully recognizes in Plutarch that teaching of the Holy Ghost which was not denied to wise and virtuous heathens, and admits the possible unsuspected leavening of Christian thought, though not its direct influence in his writings. The tone of this brief colloquy is high. It is monotheistic in its theology and the principles on which the delay of divine justice is vindicated are such as a Christian writer might have freely used. There is a very pleasing sketch of Plutarch's life prefixed to the colloquy, and a careful index and synopsis given.

FIRST WORDS IN AUSTRALIA. Sermons preached in April and May, 1861. By Alfred Barry, D.D., D.C.L., Lord Bishop of Sydney, Metropolitan of New South Wales, and Primate of Australia and Tasmania. (London and New York: Macmillan & Co.) pp. 37. Price $1.00.

These sermons are fourteen in number. The first three were preached at the welcome and thanksgiving service on first landing, in the cathedrals of Adelaide and Sydney and at Melbourne. The fourth is a Palm Sunday sermon, on the day also of public mourning for the Duke of Albany. Then follows a series of six sermons on the Passion, preached on evenings of Passion Week in the cathedral at Sydney, an Easter sermon, one preached on the day of his enthronement, one at the dedication service in Goulburn cathedral, and one in Sydney cathedral on Ascension Day. Of course there is some necessary repetition in these sermons, but very little. They are very noble discourses, the series on the Passion as especially good, and there breathes throughout a deep sense of responsibility and, as it seems to us, there is displayed a very wise comprehension of the character of the Australian people. When one contrasts the action of the English Church to see how little more than a century ago, and see how much more wisely she has learned to treat colonial questions, one cannot but feel hope for the future.

TALKS APPLIED. About Plants and the Science of Plants. By L. H. Bailey, Jr. (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.) pp. 178. Price $1.

"The author," he says by way of preface, "has written this little volume for those who desire a concise and popular account of some of the leading external features of common plants." We take pleasure in saying that he has done what he has attempted. The work is clear, pointed, capably illustrated and apparently without a superfluous word or sentence. It is not a dull or dry book, as many botanical books are, nor is it one of those desultory studies which are pleasant reading at the cost of all method and precision. For any one who desires to make intelligent acquaintance with plant life, we think this book supplies an admirable beginning—to be followed up by actual open air work. We cannot resist adding here a word of our own as to the exceeding value of such studies for young people who have more time on their hands than they know what to do with, who find "summer resorts" dull without the aid of a constant recurrence of the winter dissipation. The advantage of any pursuit which leads one to familiarity with nature, is that it is hardly possible to be diletante. Nature will not yield her secrets except to patience and perseverance, method and order.

GRADED REVIEW; or, Helps to Teachers and Pupils in Arithmetic, Geography, and Language. Consisting of Carefully-graded Work in these Three Studies, Extending over a Period of Eight Years. By W. M. Giffie, Principal of the Lawrence Street School, Newark, N. J., and David Macure, Principal of the Camden Street School, N. J. (New York: A. Lovell & Co.) pp. 304. Price 40 cents.

We have only to add to the above title that it correctly describes a very useful and carefully-prepared little book; that by "language" is meant the English language, and that the geography seems to be something better than a mere table of the populations of a country whose towns usually double themselves with every decade. We are glad to see a fitting provision thus made for elementary studies which are the proper concern of public schools. Then if a foolish people demands that all the "dogies" be taught a little smattering of knowledge, there will nevertheless be something to show for the money and pains expended. Arithmetic will, of course, be learned, and well learned, by all American pupils, but in the other two studies—viz., knowledge of the land they inhabit and knowledge of the tongue in which they speak—the education of young people is more than haphazard.

GENERAL GORDON, THE CHRISTIAN HERO. By the Rev. Wm. A. Crowell, D.D. "New World Heroes," etc. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.) pp. 376.

We are afraid that this book is a manufactured article. A biography, and especially the biography of such a man as Gordon, ought not to be written in haste. There is nothing we can discover in these pages which has not been given from other sources, and there is yet a great deal for which the public is impatiently waiting, and which will yet be told. The story of Gordon's life is a checkered one. There was an element of something very like madness in his composition, not downright irresponsible insanity, but "peculiarity," which left it always a little uncertain what he would do, and this undoubtedly deepened upon him in his last years. We do not mean by this that his life was not a very noble one, only that it was one which no mere book-maker is competent to handle. It requires the most delicate discrimination, as well as the amplest knowledge, to give a fit picture of the man who was unquestionably one of the great ones, perhaps greatest one of this century.

PRAYER AND ITS REMARKABLE ANSWERS. Being a Statement of Facts in the Light of Reason and Revelation. By Wm. W. Phelps, D.D., Second Edition, enlarged. (New York, Funk & Wagnall, 1885.) 12mo, pp. 456.

Dr. Patton's book is of the popular kind, as distinguished from the learned and profound; and it is not this which has carried it to its twentieth edition. Its obvious acceptableness is, no doubt, mainly due to its clear and comprehensive look over its subject, and the discretion and good judgment which render its conclusions reasonable and safe. It believes in prayer, fully and unhesitatingly, in prayer for all wants, material and spiritual; while, still, it is as well guarded against that fanaticism into which some persons at the present time run. In correction of two prevalent mistakes, the book will be found specially useful; the mistake, on the one hand, of great submission and little faith, and, on the other, of great faith and little submission; in other words, the mistake of that kind of prayer which lacks a distinct and trustful expectation of an answer, and of that kind which demands an answer and dictates what the answer shall be.

FIVE ACRES TOO MUCH. A Truthful Elucidation of the Attractions of the Country, and a Careful Consideration of the Question of Profit and Loss as Involved in Amateur Farming, with much Valuable Advice and Instruction to those about Purchasing Large or Small Farms in the Rural Districts. New and Enlarged Edition. By Robert Barrevelt, author of "Game Fish of New-America," "Superior Fishing," etc. etc. (New York: O. Judd Co.) pp. 329. Price $1.50.

A sustained burlesque continued for three hundred pages is a hazardous experiment. We think Mr. Roosevelt has succeeded as well as one could succeed. There are constantly recurring surprises, all of which are entirely within the bounds of possibility, and each one of which is probably founded on some one's experience. We presume that one who can write so well concerning rural mishaps would have the wit to shun them himself, but they have been the facts of other men's lives. Next to the inimitable "Sparrowgrass Papers," this is one of the most amusing books on country life we have seen. It is as its title implies, a good-natured set-off to the serious work entitled "Ten Acres Enough."

MATERIALS FOR GERMAN PROSE COMPOSITION; or, Selections from Modern English Writers, with Grammatical Notes, Etymological Explanations of Difficult Passages, a General Introduction, and a Grammatical Index. By C. A. Buckheim, Ph.D., Doc. &c. Professor of the German Language and Literature in King's College, London. Examiner in German to the University of London. Ninth Edition. New York and London: U. P. Putnam's Sons.] pp. 298.

To know a language accurately, one should be able to write it as well as to speak it with ease and correctness. We are satisfied, from an examination of this book, that its use will greatly aid the German student. The examples are short, are taken from many authors with considerable diversity of style. German prose composition will be greatly helped, we may say, by an approach to English. The defects of German authors are frequently found in length of sentences, involution of style, and want of antithetical point. These are not essential characteristics of German, and no one need fear lest these English models should hinder a good and readable German style.

HERO AND LEANDER, A POEM. By Carl Robert Zache. (New York: Published by the Author.) pp. 56.

It is a little unsafe to say of any poetry of the new school that it is unintelligible. True, it seems often to be addressed to a new and sixth sense, the literary sense which takes no account of any hitherto accepted rules of expression. "Hero and Leander" may be full of meaning and be very fine poetry, but we fail to see it. The story is too familiar and too pretty for any treatment wholly to fail, but it certainly has met with hard usage on the part of Mr. Zache. We give a single quotation from the enamored speech of Leander, which we think will justify our criticism:

"Yet happy me, no, no, she'll ever say!
And if she say so, she will breathe a lie,
Whose legal tender value would be love's pay."
Or truth's endorsed and flat curacy."

TEN MINOR PROPHETS. With a Commentary, Explanatory and Practical, and Introductions to the several books. By the Rev. E. B. Pusey, D.D. (New York: Funk & Wagnall, 1885.) 2 vols., 8vo, pp. 495, 504.

This, the only American edition of Dr. Pusey's great Commentary, is, in form, more convenient than the English, in binding more durable, in appearance somewhat better, and in price a little less. On the other hand, it lacks the illustrations—few, indeed, but striking and valuable—which are in the English. In type, paper, etc., there is no noteworthy difference between the two editions. Of the Commentary itself, not a word need be said. Its place is recognized and established as the best Commentary extant upon the Minor Prophets, in any language.

LIVES OF GREEK STATESMEN. Select. Themiastokes. By the Rev. Sir George Cox, Bart., M.A., Author of "A General History of Greece," etc. (New York: Harper & Brothers.) pp. 27.

There is a good deal of matter in this book in spite of the limited number of pages. It is closely printed and in fine type. It gives a very valuable outline of Grecian history from the time it emerges from the era of myth and fable, down to the latter days of the republic. Sir George Cox follows the spelling of the names, which is now so common, but which is rather disturbing when applied to the friends of one's boyhood, who were known than "Piastratus," "Aristides," etc., without the addition of the very proper, but decidedly Hellenic vowels.

AN ELEMENTARY TREATISE ON HYDRO-MECHANICS, with Numerous Examples. By Edward A. BOWEN, LL.B., Professor of Mathematics and Engineering in Rutgers College. [New York: D. Van Nostrand.] pp. 298.

As long as water-power is numbered among the aids to man's industry, the subjects of hydro-mechanics will be interesting. It is not one for which everybody cares, it belongs to a special department of engineering, but those who are interested will find this little volume clear, concise, and serviceable.

TALES FROM MANY SOURCES. Volumes III., pp. 367. This contains eight stories, four of which are from the Cornhill Magazine. Number two, by the author of "John Inglesant," is a very perfect story of the old French regime. The other tales are all good of their kind.

LITERATURE.

PEASE'S Singing Book, by F. H. Pease, is announced by Ginn & Co., Boston.

"As it was Written," a story of the Jewish race, by Sydney Lauka, of this city, is in press by Messrs. Cassell & Co.

"ROMANISM Refuted by Rome," a lecture by the Rev. F. N. Atkins, of Denison, Texas, is printed in pamphlet form.

THE Masonic Review for August, contains a paper by Rob. Morris, on "Images and Inscriptions of Christ upon Ancient Coins."

"THE Historical Associations of Riverside Park," the burial place of General Grant, will be one of the articles in the September Magazine of American History.

"THE History of a Legislative Shame" is a scathing review of the failure of the Gas Bill in the last Legislature, published by the Gas Consumers' Association of this city.

AMONG the proceedings of the Grand Commandery of Knights Templar in Arkansas we notice the address of the Rev. T. C. Tucker, of Little Rock, delivered on Ascension Day.

THE Unitarian Review for August contains five articles besides the editor's Note-book and current literature. The first paper is a "Justification of Judaism" by Claude G. Montefiore.

THE Delaware College Review, in its July issue, gives a great variety of entertaining matter for the members of the institution and its friends. It approaches the end of its third volume.

"WORDS OF RECONCILIATION" is a monthly published in Philadelphia and devoted especially to a consideration of the Resurrection. The August number opens with "St. Paul on Retribution."

GOON Housekeeping for July continues its interesting papers on "Model Homes for Model Housekeeping," and has a variety of articles in the line of its title. It should be a boon to housekeepers.

THE August number of the Pulpit Treasury gives a partial list of its contributors for the current year. Among them are many notable names, and they are a guaranty of the value of the magazine.

"CREATION, Man's Fall Explained in the Light of Modern Science" is a pamphlet published by Lawrence S. Benson, New York. It shows skill and close reasoning in handling an abstract question.

FUNK & WAGNALL'S are to publish at once a subscription edition of Miss Cleveland's "George Eliot's Poetry and Other Studies." The book is to appear in Russian, German, French and Italian.

THE article in the North American Review for September that will attract most attention is entitled, "Grant's Memorial: What Shall It Be?" It is a discussion of the subject, from an artistic point, by artists.

THE Bay State Monthly has for frontpiece in its August number a portrait of the late Governor Andrews. Besides other matter, it contains an account of the City of Worcester, with eighteen illustrations.

THE illustrations in the August Builder and Wood Worker relate, as suited to the season, mostly to cottages, giving plans and elevations. There is much in the number to interest non-professionals as well as wood-workers.

The literary gossip of the Art Age for August is especially interesting. There is a sketch of Bruce Crane in the number, with a landscape by him photo-engraved, and the number contains examples of decorative head bands.

In the Homiletic Review for August Dr. Herrick Johnson discusses the "Power of the Pulpit." Dr. John Hall, "Ministerial Education," and Dr. Daniel Curry "Prohibition," and there is much other valuable matter in the number.

THE July Contemporary, Nineteenth Century, Blackwood and Shakespearians, are at hand from the Leonard Scott Publication Co. In the Contemporary is an article on Catholicism and Historical Criticism, by Principal Fairbairn.

THE July American Antiquarian contains a very interesting paper on the ruins of Palenque and Copan, by L. P. Gratacap. The editor has an article on "American Symbolism." The magazine is mainly devoted to the prehistoric antiquities of this country.

THE Contents of "Good Housekeeping" for August are called a "Bill of Fare," and there is an editorial desert. All the writers but two are women, and editorially grasp is treated of as the "Bohon Upas" of the household. The words are emphatic and might be double leaded.

"INITIALS and Pseudonyms," by William Cushing, of Cambridge, who has been assisted by Albert R. Frey, of the Astor Library, will soon be published by Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., of this city. It will contain 10,000 initials and pseudonyms, and 6,500 real names of the authors answering to the pseudonyms. It will be gladly welcomed.

"INITIALS and Pseudonyms," by William Cushing, of Cambridge, who has been assisted by Albert R. Frey, of the Astor Library, will soon be published by Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., of this city. It will contain 10,000 initials and pseudonyms, and 6,500 real names of the authors answering to the pseudonyms. It will be gladly welcomed.

THE Church Review for July has dropped its superfluity of names, and wisely gone back to first principles. It makes a volume of more than 300 pages, and is a credit to our literature in the ability and variety of its contents and in its general make-up. There are in it fifteen articles, including the book notices. Three of them are of a historical character, and were written for Bishop Perry's "History of the American Episcopal Church," but were excluded, not for want of merit, but by the necessities of the book-making art. They are "The Church in Georgia before the Revolution," "The Wesleyans and Whitefields in Georgia," by Bishop Stevens; "Bibliographical Sketch of Clerical Members of the Seabury Family," by the Rev. W. J. Seabury, D.D., and "New York Indian Missions," by the Rev. W. M. Beauchamp. Among the other contributors to the number are the Rev. Drs. Van Densen, J. C. Smith, Cornelius Walker, E. H. Jewett, C. M. Butler and W. Stanton; the Rev. Messrs. Winslow and Cartwright, and Messrs. James Parker and J. B. Wood, and their papers touch upon important questions of doctrine, morality and science.

SUNDAY EVENING BY THE SEA.

BY HENRY SARGENT BLAKE.

Hushed ev'ry sound—
 The earth prepares for sleep,
 For miles around
 Slow heaves the tranquil deep.
 By wavelets kissed,
 The sun sinks in the bay—
 The rising mist
 Weeps for the dying day.

Now sounds a bell
 From yonder chapel spire,
 That seems to tell
 Of pious hearts' desire;
 It seems to say:
 "O, ye who long for rest,
 Why do ye stray
 By doubt and fear oppressed?
 Earth's sun may set,
 But God's eternal light
 Shall glisten yet
 Though worlds fade out of sight!"

ROBERT ORD'S ATONEMENT.

BY ROSA NOUCHETTE CAREY.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Robert Ord's Repentance.

"How sweet is woman's love, is woman's care?
 When struck and shatter'd in a stormy hour
 We drop fortior! and man, with stoic air,
 Neglects, or roughly aids; then robed in power,
 Then nature's angel seeks the mourner's bower.
 How blest the smile that gives the soul repose.
 How blest her voice, that, like the gentian shower,
 Pour'd on the desert, gladdens as it flows,
 And cheers the smiling heart and conquers woes."
Gaily Knight.

The next day was a blank as far as Rotha was concerned.

It was daybreak before the vicar had taken her home; and then she had dragged herself wearily to her bed, too tired and dispirited with the evening's strain to do more than fall asleep with Garton's naue on her lips. She woke late the following morning, and opened her eyes on a wet cheerless prospect, on dripping trees, sea-fog, and all the depressing accompaniments of a hopeless rainy day. Her head ached too, and she felt stiff and jaded with the unaccustomed exercise of the previous evening. She would have liked to have been where she was another hour or two, reviving the bitter-sweet memories of last night, their happy evening together, the unlooked for interruption, and Garton's fond farewell. But, mindful of her self-imposed task, she roused herself with a strong effort and went out in search of Reuben.

It was already so late that she met him coming out of the Grammar School with a troop of boys at his heels, and conveyed him off to Byrn, where she kept him the whole afternoon. She had a little trouble with him at first, as Garton predicted. Reuben burst into a flood of indignant tears when he learnt that his friend had really gone. "He ought to have come and wished me good-bye," sobbed the boy. "I didn't think it of him; he might have thrown a little gravel against my window, as he did once, and then I should have understood in an instant. It was cruel of him to forget me when I never forget him; and perhaps I shall not see him again for such a long time," finished Rube, to whom six months seemed an interminable period, and South America the very end of the world.

"He didn't forget you, dear. Have I not given you his messages? You must not be so hard on him, Rube." Perhaps the task of comforting Reuben was the best thing that could have happened to Rotha. Gar's shadow was next to having Gar himself.

She kept the boy with her most of the evening, and only sent him away because her head ached so that she could hardly bear it. It gave her an excuse for dismissing Meg too. In spite of her pain she felt it would be a relief to be allowed to sit quietly and speak to no one. She was glad that Mary sent round a kind little note instead of coming herself, for she began to feel so wretched that even her friend's society would have been irksome.

Rotha was almost surprised to find how she missed Garton. She had been very brave all day, and had succeeded wonderfully in comforting Reuben, and she had even astonished Meg with her cheerfulness. But toward evening the effort had been manifest; even while she sat and talked to Rube about his studies, a curious sick longing took possession of her—vague feelings of remorse for her neglect last night—a yearning to see him again and hear his voice. Not till he had really gone did Rotha discover how much she loved him, and what a blank his absence would leave in her daily life.

Six months—only six or seven months! Rotha scolded herself, and cried shame on her foolish cowardice; but the pain was none the less real while it lasted. She was spent, too, by physical exertion; and, though she hardly remembered it just now, her heart was very heavy about Helle: undefinable fears haunted her dreams; she had cried herself to sleep like a child, but even in sleep an uneasy pain pervaded her slumbers—all sorts of misty images chased each other across her brain. Garton's sad face seemed always before her; he seemed asking her for some help that she could not give. Once she had a terrible dream, but she could not remember it when she woke. Some haunting terror seemed upon her, and she woke with a stifled scream to find Meg bending over her, and watching her uneasy sleep. That soothed her; and afterwards she fell into a dreamless slumber, and woke no more refreshed this time to find Mrs. Ord by her bedside.

Robert had returned from London late the previous night, and had begged Mary of his own accord to go round to Rotha in the morning and give her the latest news of Garton—a fresh instance of his new thoughtfulness for her, which made the color come into Rotha's pale face.

Robert had seen Garton fairly on board, and had left him tolerably comfortable. Mr. Ramsay had accompanied them to London, and had expressed himself as much pleased with Garton's appearance and bearing. Gar seemed to have plucked up more heart about the whole affair, Robert added, and had entrusted him with loads of messages for them all; and among them a precious little scrap for Rotha, evidently pencilled on the leaf of his pocketbook while Robert was still on deck, and thrust, half-crumpled, into his hand at the last moment.

How strange it was for Rotha to read that queer cramped handwriting for the first time when Mary had gone! She took it out of the folds of her dress, where it lay hidden, and read it over and over again. If only Garton could have seen the way in which she kissed it—though she did not know then that that crumpled paper would be one of her greatest treasures.

"My own Rotha," it began, "how many hours have we been parted! and I have been thinking of you every minute since then. I do not think you knew how full my heart was when I bade you good-bye this morning—farewell, I mean, you like that word better, you said; but perhaps I had better not speak of that now.

"I want to tell you that I have just read your parting message to me. I found it on the title-page of the little Testament, underneath your mother's name. Oh, how I should have loved her, Rotha, if I had known her!

"Dear little book! all marked and underlined, I shall carry it next my heart till God grant it so, we meet. Robert is waiting—they are going to drop anchor—the pilot has just come on board. God bless you, my darling! Yours, in every sense of the word, GARTON.

These few words from Garton made Rotha almost happy. She felt ashamed of the inactive misery of last night. "If Garton were here, he would tell me that I ought not to neglect my work," she said to herself, and, more because she thought it would please him than even from a sense of duty, she went down to the church with Reuben to help with the decorations.

It was rather dreary work in spite of her efforts—the church always brought Garton so vividly before her; she found herself starting at every footstep in the momentary notion that it was his. On all sides she heard whispered lamentations and regrets among the ladies concerning the absence of the young sacristan. The vicar was there and did his best to help and direct the workers; but Garton's taste and ready good humor were not easily to be replaced; he had always been the universal referee on these occasions, and it gave Rotha a heavy pang to see Reuben filling the flower-vases for the altar—a work that had always been his delight. She heard Nettie and Aunt Eliza talking in sympathizing whispers about his lonely Christmas on board, and how he would miss the services; and her eyes filled with tears as she twined long trails of holly and shining evergreens over the chancel-screens.

The vicar noticed her dejected look, and wanted her to leave her work to be finished by Nettie and come home with him; but Rotha quietly refused—it was not her way to shirk any duty, however painful, and she had Garton's work to do as well as her own. So she had a cup of tea at Nettie's and stayed on till everything was finished, and then joined in the even service.

She was glad afterward that she had done so, for it soothed and refreshed her, in spite of the pain it was to her to see the boys walk up to their places in the choir-stalls without Garton at their head. How sorely she missed the dark, earnest face, and the clear, deep voice that had always led the singing! The lessons were read by a stranger; and after the service was over no tall figure went swinging to and fro across the chancel to extinguish the lights and cover up the altar. Reuben performed these offices very sadly and slowly, as though his heart for once were not in the work.

Two things had struck Rotha during the service—the vicar was not in his place, a very unusual thing on Christmas Eve; and the prayers of the congregation were requested for one travelling by sea; and after they had risen from their knees that beautiful hymn for those at sea had been sung. It was evident that some of the vicarage people had intended to be there; but, when Rotha had summoned courage to look round, no one was in the vicarage pew.

This puzzled her and made her rather anxious, and she was not the less so when she found Rufus waiting for her outside the church with a note from Mary.

"I have been all the way up to Bryn," exclaimed the boy, "because father understood that you were not going to remain to the service; and Mrs. Carruthers sent me down to wait for you here. I have been waiting for more than half an hour. I thought they would never have finished that last hymn."

"Why were you not in the choir, Rufus? Yes; was it not beautiful—so soothing, too? How pleased he would be to know we had sung it!" And, without waiting for the boy's answer, she carried the note down to the lich-gate and read it by the light of the street-lamp.

"Dear Rotha," it said, "please come to us. Mr. Greenock has been here, and we have had a terrible scene with Belle. She knows now what is the matter with her; but it has broken her down utterly to have her fears verified, and I dare not leave her. Austin has been obliged to stay at home to tell Robert. He is in a dreadful state, and no wonder. Do come to me at once."

"I ought to have had this note an hour ago," exclaimed Rotha; and, without waiting for Rufus to follow her, she set off for the vicarage at a run that brought the boy panting after her. "Don't knock," he cried, "I have the key; and it would disturb Aunt Belle. I will go and fetch mother." And, almost before Rotha could grope her way through the dark hall, Mary had come to her side silently, and, taking her hand, brought her into her own room and closed the door softly.

"Oh, Mrs. Ord, I am so sorry," began Rotha; "did Rufus tell you I was at church?"

"Hush! yes, I know. I have been wanting you; but it could not be helped, and she is quiet now. Oh, Rotha, what a day this has been!" And Mary began to cry, but in a subdued, patient sort of way that went to Rotha's heart.

"Dear Mrs. Ord, and you are so tired?" said the girl, in a sympathizing voice, at which Mary leant her head against her shoulder and cried more than ever. It was some time before she could recover herself to speak plainly.

"I didn't mean to do this," she said at last, in answer to Rotha's silent kisses; "but I think it has done me good. Oh, Rotha, I hope I am not rebellious, and I have Austin and the boys. But still she is my only sister." And the tears coursed more swiftly down Mrs. Ord's face as her grief resolved itself into words.

"Perhaps it is better so. Oh, my dear, to think of her going day after day to that infirmary without letting us know how ill she was—and all to spare Austin! I cannot bear to think of it. And then for them to say that all this strain and anxiety has been killing her!"

"Who are they? Dear Mrs. Ord, would it not ease you to tell me everything plainly out? Is it Mr. Greenock who has been telling you all this?"

"Yes, Mr. Greenock and Dr. Chapman. Mr. Greenock wished a consultation when he found how things were, and then they told Austin, and he fetched me. They say one of her lungs is quite gone, and that she is in a very precarious state. Mr. Greenock said he could not understand how any one could have suffered so much and have done what she has done; and he declared if it had gone on—all this concealment and strain, I suppose he meant—that she could not have lasted three months."

"But I don't understand. Is it as you fear—is it—?" decline, Rotha was going to add, but she hesitated. Mary shook her head mournfully.

"That is what I cannot find out—neither of them would speak plainly. Mr. Greenock did not say much, but I could see he dreaded the worst. He would not exactly say that she was in a decline, but he owned that she feared it. Dr. Chapman took a milder view of the case. Both of them agreed that a warm climate should be tried without delay. But I noticed that, though Dr. Chapman spoke hopefully of Torquay now and Mentone next winter, and added his conviction that by these means a partial if not a complete cure might be effected, Mr. Greenock only looked grave; and it struck me afterwards that he had recommended it as a last chance, and that he knew it could only prolong her life for a few months; and I can see that Austin fears it too."

"But, Mrs. Ord, would not it be cruel to remove her if they know it is of no use?"

"That is what Austin said. He wanted Mr. Greenock to give us leave to keep her with us; but both he and Dr. Chapman agreed that the March winds would kill her. They want her to go to Torquay in about two or three weeks' time, but she must not undertake the journey this weather in the state she is in. One thing, we are not to allow her to break off her engagement—at least not yet, or we shall take away her last chance. But, oh, Rotha, I know they think that she will never be well enough to marry him."

Rotha sighed heavily. "I am afraid not; but they are right, and it would kill her at once. Oh, Mrs. Ord, how dreadful it will be for him when he knows it!"

"Hush! don't speak so loud—he knows it now. Austin has been with him all the evening. We have had hard work with him to get him to believe it; he fights against it so. I don't think he gives up all hope yet, though he knows he must go without her. He turned round quite fiercely on Austin when he said something about the engagement having to be given up. He declares he will come over in six months' time and marry her. Oh, Rotha, it is plain to see that he is half beside himself with remorse; it is more that than grief that is troubling him."

Rotha leant her head on her hand; she hardly knew what to say. "He ought to have sent her with me," she returned slowly at length; "he knows that himself now. Mrs. Ord, I don't quite know what to do, but I think I should like to go to him. He might listen to me now. Hark! what is that?" she continued, turning very pale. Everything started her just now, but it was only the dining room door opening and the vicar calling softly across the hall for Mary.

Mrs. Ord went at once, and Rotha followed her; the vicar held out his hand to her with a little surprise when he saw her. "Robert has been asking for you," he said. "I did not know you were here; I thought Rufus came in alone."

"I was at church, but I came directly afterwards. Did you say"—turning paler than ever—"that he was asking for me?"

The vicar nodded. "He is in there; he has been asking for you two or three times this evening. He wished me to tell you when you came in that he wanted to speak to you alone."

Rotha looked bewildered, as well she might—wanting to see her, and alone!

Robert was leaning against the mantelpiece, with his back towards her; but he started at her entrance and raised his head, and then, after a moment's hesitation, held out his hand. It was not taken for an instant; perhaps Rotha hardly perceived it, but a bitter smile wreathed his thin lips at what he imagined was her pride.

"You need not to have hesitated," he said sharply—the sharpness of pain, not anger. "I meant to have told you—but never mind, it will keep; the thing is, that I have sent for you. I suppose I ought to thank you first for your kindness in coming to me. Some women would not have acted as you have, but I confess I am in no mood for mere courtesy to-night."

"Neither am I," returned Rotha quietly. His harsh words, his pale face only inspired her with pity. With an involuntary movement she went up a little closer, and looked at him with straightforward honest eyes. "You are in trouble, and you have sent for me," she said softly; "and now what can I do for you?"

"Stop," he said hoarsely. "I don't want pity—least of all from you. Pity her if you will. Good heavens, to think how she loves me, and that I, blind fool that I am, have as good as murdered her!"

"Mr. Ord!" She is constrained to cry out his name, his violence is so terrible to her; and then, with a sudden pitiful impulse, she goes nearer and lays her hand on his arm.

"Have you sent for me to tell me this?"

"Yes, to tell you this—this, and anything else you like. Oh, you may humble me at your pleasure. I am a proud man if you will, but this is your hour of triumph. I would rather have you triumph over me than pity me. Why do you look at me like this, Miss Maturin? Do you think I am mad to-night?"

"I think you are," she returned softly. "God help you! Mad with pain and disappointment and remorse, you are cruel to yourself, cruel to me, to Belle, to everybody. Was it your fault that you were so blind-folded that you could not see the truth?"

"Yes," he returned, with a dogged sort of honesty; "it was my fault, I would not allow myself to be convinced. Is your memory so bad that you have forgotten our conversation down on the sands?"

She dropped her head sadly; she could not help it. Why should he recall those bitter moments? Humiliated—ah, and had she not been humiliated then!

"Well, I see you remember," he continued, watching her; "you tried to convince me then. You would have saved her for me if I had only permitted it; and I let her fade before my eyes, brute that I was, rather than owe her preservation to you. No, do not stop me; if I had not known my motives then, I do now."

"No, no," she cried, putting out her hand to stop him. "Don't talk so—you must not talk so; it was this terrible prejudice against me that hardened you. I came between you and your happiness, and made you mad."

"More shame to me!" he retorted. But she put out her hand again to stop him.

"Ah, you are more cruel to yourself than you have been to me," she exclaimed. "If you mean that you have sinned against me, have I not forgiven it long ago? Mr. Ord, you have sent for me, but it is not Miss Maturin who has come to you now—it is the little sister, Gar's future wife, who prays you to be reconciled to her."

Her hands went out to him tremblingly as she uttered his name; she had forgotten everything at the sight of his terrible grief. If he had wronged her she did not remember it now. "Gar's brother! Poor Robert," he thinks he hears her say so softly. As he turns away and folds his arms over his breast something that would have been tears in other men glistened now in Robert Ord's eyes. Another moment and her hand rests on his outstretched palm.

"Forgive me if you can," he begins in a broken voice; but she stops him.

"Hush! I understand you. There is no need to say anything more."

"There is every need, you mean. Do you think I shall spare myself? You told me that I must never come and offer you my hand till I would own that I had wronged you. I own it now."

"I know it—I can see it. Please spare yourself this."

"Spare myself," he repeated scornfully.

"Oh, I have been so good to you—you may well ask me to do this. Because I envied you your possessions I must look upon your every act and word with a jaundiced eye. I must even sacrifice my poor Belle to my unnatural rancor. Oh, you were right when you said you would rather die than touch my hand."

"I am touching it now; it feels like the hand of a friend. Mr. Ord, these things are all passed and over. I have forgiven them long ago. Why will you recall them?"

"To do you a tardy justice," he replied vehemently. "Because, God knows, I have done you a bitter wrong; because you were as innocent as a little child, and I was cruel to you."

"Not cruel—only hard, and hardest of all to yourself. You were wrong to your better judgment, and now the scales have fallen from your eyes. Indeed it is all forgiven. You know me now, and you know I am your friend."

"My friend!" he muttered, "my friend!" A strange softness crept over his face, and then he turned it away and leaned heavily against the mantelpiece; but at that moment something hard and bitter passed out of Robert Ord's heart forever.

By and by she knew why he had sent for her—not to tell her this, as he reiterates again and again, but to beg her on his knees, if he needs be, to take Belle away. It is her last chance—her only chance, he affirms sadly. And Rotha slowly and seriously grants the request. She cannot tell him what she has told Mary, that she believes it has come too late.

Mary came down presently to tell Robert that Belle was asking for him. "She is growing restless again and wonders what has become of you, dear. She knows now that Austin has told you everything."

Robert turned very pale.

"I did not mean to have seen her to-night," he said. "I am half afraid of what I may say. I think you had better come up with me, Mary." And Rotha was left alone.

She might have been alone about twenty minutes when she heard Mary calling her, and went up at once.

"Belle wants to bid you good-night," began Mary cheerfully as Rotha entered; but Belle's feeble voice interrupted her.

"No, not good-night. I want to speak to you, Rotha. Please come here." And Belle raised herself from Robert's arm, and held out her hot hands to Rotha. How beautiful she looked with that hectic flush on her wasted cheek and her eyes burning with fever.

"Dear Rotha, come here. Tell him—Mary will not—that it is all no use, and that he must not send me away. Tell him it will kill me."

"It will kill you to remain here, Belle. Mr. Greenock and Dr. Chapman both said so."

"That is what he keeps saying. Oh, Rotha, ask him not. He knows that he is going in less than three months, and yet he wants us to be parted. It is not enough that I am never to be his wife, but he will not even let me see the last of him," and Belle flung herself down on the couch again, as though her last hope were taken from her.

"For your own good—only for your good, Belle; it is your last chance. You know they said so."

"But they did not think so," she returned in a voice of despair. "Rotha, does he think that I shall care to live when I am never to be his wife? Tell him to ask me anything but this."

"I cannot," he returned in a low voice.

"Dear Belle, why will you persist in speaking as though there were no hope? Did not Dr. Chapman say that a winter or two at Mentone would set you up? Go with Miss Maturin in a fortnight's time, and I will come down to Devonshire to wish you good-bye."

"Good-bye!" she returned in a bewildered voice. "It is not you who have to say good-bye surely?"

"Yes, for a little while; but it will not be long, I promise you. Only do as the doctors tell you, and in six months or a year's time I will come over myself and take you home with me."

"Take me home! Only hear him," she returned in a faint voice. "He is deceiving himself still. Dear Robert, why will you not understand that we must give it all up? I am your poor friend, dear, but I shall never be anything more to you."

"Dear Belle, do not refuse him; he means it for your good," exclaimed Rotha. "Look at him. You are breaking his heart." For, overcome by her words, Robert had covered his face with his hands. In another moment Belle had flung her thin arms round his neck. Never to her dying day did Rotha forget the look of despairing love on her face.

"Oh, Robert, don't; anything but that. Dear Bertie, put down your hands, and let me see your face. Do you really mean that you wish me to go?"

"Yes, really and truly; for my sake—for the sake of your own love." He looked at her eagerly, almost hopefully; but there was no answering gleam in Belle's eyes.

"For your sake? Yes, I understand. Kiss me, Bertie. I will go. No, not that name—that is what I used to call you. It must be Robert now."

"I like the old name and the old ways best, Belle."

"Do you, Bertie? Ah, there it is again. Are we alone, or is Rotha there?"

"I am here," said Rotha, coming gently to her side. "I am waiting to say good-night, Belle."

"Good-night," returned Belle dreamily. "I thought I was alone with Robert, and that I was, oh, so tired! You will have to carry me upstairs to-night, Bertie. Where is Mary?" But, before her sister could be summoned to the room, Belle, exhausted by her emotions, had fainted away.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Under the Roof.

"To us,
The foals of habit, sweeter seems
To rest beneath the clover sod,
That takes the sunshine and the rains,
Or where the kneeling Hamlet drains
The chalice of the grapes of God;
Than if with thee the soaring wisp
Should fluff him fathom-deep in brine;
And hands so often clasp'd in mine,
Should toss with tangle and with shelia."
In Memoriam.

It was the saddest Christmas Day that the inhabitants of the Vicarage had ever known. Uncle Gar's absence was loudly lamented by the boys who could imagine no holiday without their favorite playfellow and adviser, while it was felt as a very real loss by the other members of the family. Mary especially missed the bright unflinching spirits and helpful good-nature which had gone so far to make Gar's influence with the lads; she had always called him her eldest boy, and had been very motherly and watchful over him, claiming a right to lecture him on all his short-comings, to which Gar had submitted with a tolerable amount of patience. But even Gar's absence sunk into comparative insignificance beside the fact of Belle's failing health, and it was quite sufficient to note the vicar's grave looks and Mary's troubled face to see how heavily this new blow had fallen on them.

If Belle had lacked somewhat in gentleness and warmth to those with whom she lived; if she had been self-absorbed, reticent, and failing in that large influence that might have been hers, it was all forgotten now; and nothing was remembered of her but her sorrow, her passionate devotion to Robert, and the fortitude with which she had borne her ill health; or, if this were not sufficient to win their forbearance, was she not Mary's only sister—the sister whom she roughs, and had toiled over the hills and struggled through the sands of Kent. Even the verger seemed to sympathize with our feelings. For a few moments he was silent; presently he continued—

"'Every the Height, when he was in Canterbury, took the bones, which they was laid beneath, out on the green, and had them burned. With them he took the 'oly shrine, which it and bones is here no longer!'

"Shrine and Tabard. Chapels and Inns by the way, all have gone with the pilgrims of yester-year."

THE QUIET CORNER.

BY THE BISHOP OF EASTON.

XXIV.

When men are reminded of the shortness and uncertainty of life, they often say to themselves this shall not be to us; we will hope for better things; we prefer to found our calculations upon the expectation of long life, and venerable age and gradual decay.

Let us then indulge ourselves in this sup-

We need not trace particularly the changes that come over us in the progress of years. In our mature age we still exult in the consciousness of might, but our blows are not given with as hearty a good-will as when the arm was young. There is a jangling string within, which gives discordance to the sounds that float around us. There seems to be less sunshine, more dark and dreary hours than when we were children. But for all this, in the meridian of life, we are not without enjoyment and endurance and hopefulness.

But the evil days will come; the evil days; and the years draw nigh when thou shalt say I have no pleasure in them. The sun and the light, the moon and the stars shall be darkened.

The old man's latter days are evil; they bring him pains and sorrows, but little else. He looks with apathy on that which would once have awakened all his enthusiasm. His life is a burden. Long custom disinclines him to surrender it; yet he has no pleasure in it. The sunlight no more dances along his path and glistens on the

When we become old, physical infirmities will accumulate upon us. In its prime and freshness the human body is the fairest structure which the hand of God has made, but it suffers much under the assaults of years. Under a variety of figures does Solomon describe its dilapidation.

Where are now the sinewy arms which once provided for the wants of the body and protected it from the invasions of every adversary? Alas! the keepers of the house tremble, their blows are feeble, their grasp is weak. If danger menace, they are no longer strong in defence, but must rather be raised in timid deprecation.

And the strong men bow themselves. The limbs which once bore the man proudly on his errand, whatever it might be, have lost their strength, the joints are stiffened, the back is bowed, the shoulders stoop; rigid nature must, in compassion, lend him a staff on which to lean, and he crawls uncertainly and slowly over the earth which once quivered beneath his manly tread.

And again, The grinders cease because they are feeble, and the doors are shut in the position; let us forget our insecurity, and look confidently to the filling out of three-score and ten or fourscore years. But before we array this closing period in the illusions of fancy, let us hearken to the teachings of experience; let us listen to the Wise Preacher, as with trembling voice and an utterance intensified by his own share in what he delivers he describes to us the sorrows of old age.

When we grow old, we must expect to lose our elasticity and cheerfulness of temper.

Look at a little child. What incessant activity; what restless gaiety; how happy a faculty of finding mirth in everything; how bright to him the sunshine; how sweet the music of the rippling water. He leaps and runs, and is happy in the very exuberance of life; he laughs aloud for the mere happiness of breathing, living, moving. His heart-strings are not yet fretted and out of tune; and because his soul is thus accordant with nature, the voices of nature do ever stir him to gladness. And if his sky be overcast, the cloud doth not long obscure the sunshine of his spirit; he forgets his sorrow, and is glad again.

green leaf; he views everything not as once, thro' the bright prism of hope, but thro' the dull sombre medium of experience. The moon no longer walks in silvery brightness, but is now the cold pale moon; and the stars, which were once to him as the eyes of angels, do now twinkle dimly and burn as the exhausted lights of some finished revel.

And the clouds return after the rain. Once these dreary days seemed few, and the clear shining after the rain seemed to be a recompense of nature for her tears. But now it rains all day, and when at evening he looks up to a little patch of sunshine the clouds gather, and as the sun goes down the chill winds whistle anew and tell him it will be dreary again to-morrow.

This is extreme old age but heaviness and sorrow. Happy as we may have been when we had energy to pursue and novelty to entice, a spirit to enjoy, yet, lingering over long, and with naught else to explore, the flowers are now all withered, and the gold seen to be all tinsel, and the gay laugh hath no mirth in it, and the heart whispers to itself, Man walketh in a vain shadow and disquieteth himself for naught.

streets when the sound of the grinding is low. It is a labor now to take his necessary food, for his cheeks are sunken and his teeth are gone; his lips once parted with the ready smile, and out of them, as from a portal, issued the quick answer and the cheerful word; but now the muscles have lost their play, and those doors it is labor to open, and the sounds which issue from them are faint and husky.

The senses, too, begin to fail: those that look out of the windows are darkened, Solomon mentions as the most excellent of all, that wonderful organ whose range knows scarce any limit, save that of space itself—the window of the soul, through which it scans the doings of the outer world, and through which, in turn, other men may discern the sparkling of the inward fire, the yearnings of affection, the outburst of generous thought. But now the films of age obscure and make turbid that crystal so serene, and its lids do droop, the sight has lost its keenness, and the old man gropes his way, as in anticipation of the land of shadows to which he is hastening.

Besides this loss of mental and bodily vigor, the Preacher specifies sundry other infirmities which it is not easy to classify.

Sweet and sound is the sleep of childhood, and invigorating is the repose won by manly toil, but the old man's slumbers are light and easily broken. He shall rise up at the voice of the bird—the first crowing of the cock recalls him to consciousness, the chirping of a sparrow disturbs his rest.

All the daughters of music shall be brought low. His tremulous fingers have lost their cunning to awaken melody from the harp he loved, and the full chords of harmony fall upon a dull hearing. He says, like Barzillai the Gileadite, "I am this day fourscore years old, and can I discern between good and evil? Can I hear any more the voice of singing men and singing women?"

And for such reasons desire shall fail. He has no appetite for pleasure, no ambition for greatness, which he has lost the capacity to enjoy; and thus old men may persuade themselves that they have forsaken their sins, when, in fact, their sins have forsaken them.

Courage and endurance, too, give way. They shall be afraid of that which is high, and fears shall be in the way. He avoids the height from which he might fall, and covets the safety of the arm-chair and the fireside. He is afraid of risk and exposure, and little inconveniences such as the noise of an insect are overmuch for his fortitude. The grasshopper shall be a burden.

Exod. xv. 20-27.

Verse 20. "Miriam." The same name as Mary, Maria, Mariamne. "The prophetess." Hers was a true prophetic gift. She was apparently the eldest of the Levitic family, as she watched over the ark of her infant brother Moses, and led Pharaoh's daughter to select the mother of Moses, (Jocbebed) for his nurse. "The sister of Aaron." She is so-called because henceforth she is to rank with Aaron, but below Moses, who was henceforth at the head of Israel. "A timbrel." Doubtless the same instrument as is now known by that name. It was used probably partly by itself and partly as an accompaniment to mark the time in chanting the strophes and alternate choruses of the song. It is probable that this chorus was given antiphonally by the women in response to each verse of the song of Moses. "Went out after her." That is, followed her perhaps in a sort of processional march. The word "dances" here indicates a rhythmic movement accompanying the chanting. It was a religious ceremony and usually confined to the women, and at any rate was performed separately from the men.
